Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ity, requisites of valid assistance on the part of the pastor or Ordinary or delegate, requisites of licit assistance, special provisions for particular cases, local extension, prescribed rites of celebration, and registration.

REQUISITES OF FORMAL VALIDITY

CAN. 1094

Ea tantum matrimonia valida sunt quae contrahuntur coram parocho, vel loci Ordinario, vel sacerdote ab alterutro delegato et duobus saltem testibus, secundum tamen regulas expressas in canonibus qui sequuntur, et salvis exceptionibus de quibus in can. 1098, 1099.

Only such marriages are valid as are contracted before the pastor, or the Ordinary of the diocese, or before a priest delegated by either the pastor or the Ordinary, and at least two witnesses, in conformity, however, with the rules laid down in the two following canons, and with the exceptions mentioned in canons 1098 and 1099.

Two different kinds of persons are mentioned in the text as necessary to a valid marriage: the ministers of the Church and witnesses.

1) The ministers of the Church are the pastor or the Ordinary, or their delegate. Who is the pastor? The answer is given in can. 451. He is the priest upon whom the parish has been conferred as his own (in titulum) and who has the actual care of souls by the authority of the bishop. Therefore, a so-called habitual pastor is excluded. Nor are a chapter of canons or a religious superior, even though he be a prelate, if they have only habitual, not actual care of souls, entitled to assist at a marriage.[18]

What about priests in charge of so-called stations or 18 Can. 452 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

missions. If, for instance, a mission is attached to a monastery, which sends a priest once or twice a month, who is the pastor? If the mission belongs to an abbey church, which is at the same time a parish church, the pastor of the abbey church is the actual pastor of the mission church, and therefore has the right of assisting at marriages. Where a parish church has one or more mission chapels attached to the main parish and attended by the pastor's assistants, the latter cannot be considered as pastors,[19] but the pastor of the main parish is also the pastor of the mission chapels.[20] However, in our case, the missions being attached to a monastery, not to a church, the pastor of the mission would certainly be the excurrens or the priest sent by the monastery. Who else could be the pastor? Not the religious superior, because he is at most only a habitual pastor, who has nothing to do with marriages. Nor the pastor of the monastery-church, because the missions are, ex hypothesi, not attached to his church, but to the monastery. Hence only the Ordinary of the diocese would be left, who is and, as far as we know, always has been supposed to give the necessary faculties or authority to the priest who is in charge of such a mission.

The new Code, which is law also in our country,[21]

19 Woywod, Marriage Laws, 1913, p. 10 f.

20 A consequence is that the banns would have to be published in the main church.

21 The decree of the S. C. Consist., Aug. 1, 1919 (Eccl. Rev., Vol. 61, p. 551 f.), seems favorable to our view. The decree refers to can. 1409, 1410, 1415, III. These deal chiefly with endowment. The fact that there may not be an absolutely sufficient endowment, should not prevent the Ordinary from erecting a parish, provided there are prospects that the most necessary revenues will be forthcoming. If a rector is appointed to subsidiary or accessory chaplaincies, what is his relation to the pastor? Suppose a parish organized by decree of the Ordinary comprises one, or two, or even five counties. All the bishop has to do is to define the accurate boundary lines and declare that, for instance, the parish at the county seat is the parish, and the priest in charge of it the pastor. This pastor strictly prescribes the circumscription of parishes and the division of each diocese into parishes,[22] and hence there is but one secure way of settling the difficulty, viz.: to divide each diocese into parishes, no matter how large or small, and assign to each parish definite missions or stations. Since the State is distributed into counties, and the counties into townships, there is no reason for putting off a more definite ecclesiastical division usque in indefinitum. Then the priest who attends a mission or station will be dependent on the pastor of the parish to which the mission is attached, and the latter has to delegate the necessary faculties to him, either habitually — if the priest is merely an assistant of the main pastor [23]— or for each particular case.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Besides the pastor, there are others who certainly meet the requirements of the Code, viz.: (1) those mentioned in can. 451, § 2, n. 2, as taking the place of a pastor with full pastoral powers, i.e., actual pastors of an incorporated parish or chapter; (2) the oeconomi or parochial administrators appointed by the bishops during the vacancy of a then enjoys all the parochial rights set forth in can. 462. He publishes the banns (can. 1023), and it is not necessary that the publications be made in the subsidiary chapel, unless the Ordinary should so order. The position of the rector or chaplain of the subsidiary church is regulated by canons 479–486. However, there can be little doubt that the Ordinary may extend his rights. He may grant him the right to exercise parochial rights in his own chapel, though only under the supervision and with the consent of the pastor. The stole fees must be turned over to the pastor or be distributed pro rata according to the synodal statutes or episcopal provisions. The books must be kept by the pastor and all entries from the subsidiary chapel or church must be made in the parish books. The faculties for hearing confessions and preaching must be expressly imparted by the local Ordinary. Thus, we believe, there would be little difficulty in arranging matters according to the Code, even in case the rector has a residence distinct from that of the pastor. This was the case in former times when there was only one (the cathedral) parish in each city and the smaller rural parishes dependent upon the larger or more prominent ones.

22 Can. 216.

23 Can. 1096, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

parish;[24] (3) Substitutes who take the place of pastors during vacation or a sudden absence, unless the bishop or pastor excepts assistance at marriages;[25] and (4) parochial coadjutors or assistants given to a disabled priest, if they take the place of the disabled pastor in all things.[26]

2) The term Ordinary comprises all those mentioned in can. 198, hence also the diocesan administrator, the Abbas Nullius, the vicar-capitular and the vicar-general, but not the superior of an exempt religious order.

Concerning delegation nothing need be said here, as can. 1096 will call for a full explanation.

3) The witnesses to a marriage must be present simultaneously with the minister of the Church, and both witnesses must be present at the same time.[27]

As to the qualities of the witnesses, a distinction must be drawn between valid and licit assistance.

Valid assistance can be rendered by all persons of either sex who are physically and mentally able to realize the meaning of the marriage contract. Non-Catholics, pagans, and infidels are not excluded. But licit assistance at Catholic marriages can be rendered only by Catholics, unless the Ordinary for grave reasons permits the assistance of non-Catholics, and provided no scandal is given.[28]

With regard to the admission of Freemasons we could find no positive prohibition. However, it appears certain that at least prominent Masons are not easily to be admitted,[29] on account of the scandal that might arise to Catholics. But the Ordinary may judge differently.

24 Can. 473.

25 Compare can. 474 with can. 465, §§ 4 f. Note that the exception must be made explicitly.

26 Can. 475, § 2.

27 S. C. P. F., July 2, 1827 (Coll., n. 794).

28 S. O., Aug. 19, 1891 (Coll. P. F., n. 1765).

29 S. O., Aug. 21, 1861 (Coll. cit., n. 1219) says that these should be treated veluti publici peccatores.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

REQUISITES ON THE PART OF PASTOR AND ORDINARY

CAN. 1095

§ 1. Parochus et loci Ordinarius valide matrimonio assistunt:

1.° A die tantummodo adeptae canonicae possessionis beneficii ad normam can. 334, § 3, 1444, § 1, vel initi officii, nisi per sententiam fuerint excommunicati vel interdicti vel suspensi ab officio aut tales declarati;

2.° Intra fines dumtaxat sui territorii; in quo matrimoniis nedum suorum subditorum, sed etiam non subditorum valide assistunt;

3.° Dummodo neque vi neque metu gravi constricti requirant excipiantque contrahentium consensum.

§ 2. Parochus et loci Ordinarius qui matrimonio possunt valide assistere, possunt quoque alii sacerdoti licentiam dare ut intra fines sui territorii matrimonio valide assistat.

§ 1. The pastor and the Ordinary may validly assist at marriages:

1.° Only from the day they have taken canonical possession of their benefice, or entered upon their office, provided they are not excommunicated, or interdicted, or suspended from office by a judiciary sentence, or declared suspended;

2.° Only within the boundaries of their respective territory, in which, however, they may validly assist at marriages not only of their own subjects, but also of non-subjects.

3.° Provided they are not compelled by violence or grave fear to ask and receive the consent of the parties.

§ 2. The pastor and the Ordinary of the diocese, who can validly assist at marriages, may also grant permission to another priest to assist validly within the limits of their respective districts.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The first paragraph contains three distinct qualifications required in those who may validly assist at marriages:

1) The official or legal qualification is attached to the official character of the functionary, and is twofold, strictly official and juridical.

a) The strictly official character is acquired by the assumption of an office. Hence the Ordinary as well as the pastor must be in actual possession of his office. The Ordinary takes canonical possession of the diocese by presenting his papers (bulls) of appointment either personally or by proxy, to the diocesan chapter or gathering of consultors in presence of the episcopal chancellor.[30]

The same is true concerning the Abbas or Praelatus Nullius, because he must be confirmed by the Pope;[31] the same also concerning the Administrator Apostolic.[32] The Vicar-capitular is in possession of his office after he has been validly elected and has accepted the office.[33] The Vicar-general is in possession of his office as soon as he has received and accepted the appointment.[34] The pastor, in the United States, is supposed, and justly so, to have the title of parish-priest after he has received his appointment to a pastorate. However, our text says initi officii, which means actual entrance upon office. A pastor may enter upon his office by merely taking possession of the parsonage in an informal way, or formally with the usual ceremonies.

b) The juridical qualities are apparent from the nega-

30 Can. 334, § 3.
31 Can. 320, § 1.
32 Can. 313, § 1.
33 Can. 435, § 1.
34 Can. 368, § 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tive description which says: unless they (the ordinary or the pastor) be excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended from office by a condemnatory or declaratory sentence.[35]

Three ecclesiastical censures are here mentioned, excommunication, the interdict, and suspension. No distinction between major and minor excommunication is made by the Code; but the difference between an excommunication inflicted by the law itself and one meted out by a judge is emphasized in the text. The former (iure) requires merely a declaratory sentence after the fact or deed which is proscribed under penalty of excommunication has been conclusively proved. But if an ecclesiastical judge inflicts this penalty for a crime not otherwise punishable by excommunication, he must not only have legal evidence, but formally pronounce sentence upon the culprit. It is immaterial whether the law reserves a case to the Apostolic See or to the Ordinary.[36] The Ordinary may reserve three or four cases, even under censure, and these too only need a declaratory sentence, after the culprit has been convicted.

An interdict is here understood to be a personal one, attended by the consequences which the Code mentions elsewhere.[37] But we believe that for its infliction a formal sentence is required.[38]

Suspension from office implies, as the Code says,[39] the loss of every spiritual power, but not of the administration of temporalities, including assistance at marriages. A priest guilty of trading with masses may be suspended,

35 Compare the "Ne temere": "nisi publico decreto nominatim fuerint excommunicati vel ab officio suspensi." (IV, § 1.)

36 To the Ordinary are reserved by law the excommunications mentioned in can. 2319; 2326; 2343, § 4; 2350, § 1; 2385; 2388, § 2.

37 Can. 2274 f.

38 Comp. can. 2269, § 1: episcopus ferre potest.

39 Can. 2279, § 1; such suspensions are mentioned in can. 2324, 2342, n. 1; 2347, n. 2; 2350, § 2; 2378; 2392, n. 3; 2394, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

but the sentence must be not merely declaratory, but condemnatory.[40] In fact, most suspensions require a condemnatory sentence.

After a priest has been declared excommunicated, interdicted or suspended from office, or condemned to suffer such a penalty, nothing else is required for disqualifying him for the function here in debate, because the Code does not mention a declaration or condemnation by name or public decree. However, it seems reasonable to demand that the parish be notified of the verdict. If this is not done, it might happen that a titulus putativus would arise, based upon a general error. In that case, of course, the marriage would be valid.[41] A bishop may be censured by the Holy See only, a vicar-general, by his bishop.

2) The local condition is expressed by the boundaries: the pastor is authorized to assist at marriages within the limits of his entire parish, the Ordinary within the whole of his diocese. And this holds concerning all marriages, whether the parties belong to the respective parish or diocese or to a foreign parish or diocese. Here is the cardinal change, and a very practical one, from the Tridentine law.[42]

However, as no law can provide for all imaginable cases, this, too, is not without difficulties, not so much concerning the diocese, as the parish. For while dioceses are almost always well defined and circumscribed, parish limits are often uncertain and vague, especially in our country. There are, for instance, in the cathedral city of St. Joseph, Mo., eight parishes. The five English speaking congregations are pretty well defined territorially, and the two Polish churches are also set off be-

40 Cfr. can. 2324 and can. 827 f.
41 S. C. C., March 10, 1770 (Richter, Trid., p. 229, n. 51).
42 Cfr. "Ne temere," Procem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tween North and South, but the German parish lies between two English speaking parishes without any boundaries.[43] A decision of the S. C. Concilii, Feb. 1, 1908, allows the pastor of the German speaking parish to assist validly at all marriages, not only in his own church or rectory, but also in any place within the entire district over which he has jurisdiction together with the other two pastors. If there were no boundary at all, the pastor of the German church might validly assist at any marriage in any of the eight churches or rectories. The consequence is that the pastors of the English speaking congregations, or of parishes with set boundaries, are worse off than this quasi-pastor of a foreign tongue.[44] Remember, we speak only of valid assistance; for it is within the power of the Ordinary to punish any pastor who would attempt to assist at marriages promiscuously without regard to the rights of other pastors.

What has been said so far may be applied to assistance in a private house, should sickness (not involving danger of death) render this advisable. For as long as the pastor keeps within the boundaries of his district, or (if his parish has no definite limits, as in the case of the German priest mentioned above) within the boundaries assigned by other parishes, he observes the law, and assistance is not limited to the church or rectory.

In another case a monastery of exempt regulars had charge of a church which is not a parish church, but situated within another parish. The question arose: May the parish priest assist validly in that church? Yes, said the S. Congregation.[45] Of course this also applies to Ordinaries.

43 Except, as far as we know, towards the east (Wyatt Park).

44 Cfr. Woywod, Marriage Laws, p. 14.

45 S. C. Sacr., March 10, 1910, ad VIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Canon 464, § 2, permits the Ordinary to exempt from the pastor's care religious houses and pious institutions. Who is to assist at marriages celebrated in such places? The authentic answer[46] given is that the chaplains of these places may validly assist at the marriages of such parties as are committed to their care, but only in the place where these chaplains exercise their jurisdiction and provided they possess full parochial charge. This is supposed to be the case when exemption has been granted by the bishop.

Another case has been decided concerning a few families who live in one parish, but for some reason or other belong to another. May the pastor of the latter parish assist at the marriage of such parties if it takes place in the former? Yes, says a decision, provided that at least one of the contracting parties belongs to him.[47] There is no stretching allowed. The persons and families concerned must be subjects of the pastor, and we believe the Ordinary alone can decide whether a family or person may belong to another than the locally defined parish.

Military chaplains usually receive special instructions. If not, the pastor within whose district the barracks or camp lies, is per se competent for valid assistance at the marriages of soldiers. In the field, the military chaplain would be competent.[48]

3) The last condition may be called ethical because it requires an assistance that is a human act, performed

46 S. C. C., Feb. 1, 1908, ad X; cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 228, n. 47.

47 S. C. C., Feb. 1, 1908, ad IX, quoted by Card. Gasparri. But the interpretation — which looks rather extensive — needed the addition: "facto verbo cum SSmo." Cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 228, n. 44.

48 S. C. C., May 29, 1683; Sept. 19, 1733 (Richter, l. c., p. 234, n. 60 f.); S. C. C., Feb. 1, 1908, ad VII. Of course, all depends upon the instructions the army bishop has received.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

with freedom and deliberation. Such an act excludes all manner of physical compulsion. Hence if the pastor would be perforce compelled to assist at a marriage, say, by the police or by armed men surrounding his rectory, the marriage would be invalid. Again if serious threats of any kind would impede his freedom of action, the marriage would be invalid by reason of grave fear. Placed in such a position, an authorized witness may hardly be said to ask for and receive the consent. Note well the wording of the Latin text. Compulsion and fear must influence the act of demanding and receiving the consent, so that there is a causal connection between both. As long as this compulsion or fear lasts, the marriage would be invalid.[49] The terms "requirere" and "excipere" suppose a personal act on the part of the pastor; we might style it coöperation, in order to distinguish it from purely passive assistance, about which see can. 1102. Hence surprise marriages are almost entirely excluded. Thus a marriage whilst the pastor hears confession is hardly possible any more; it happened once at Naples, in 1724, but was declared invalid.[50] On the other hand the Code omits the words of the "Ne temere" decree: "invitati ac rogati," i. e., invited and asked by the parties. Suppose a pastor is asked to a house in his parish for some reason and there requested to witness a marriage. If he demanded and received the consent of the parties without being compelled to do so by physical coercion or by grave fear, the marriage would be valid. Purely human respect is not tantamount to grave fear. Of course, the priest is supposed to know what is going on. If a formula in a foreign language of which he has not the faintest knowl-

49 Such cases may be read in Richter, Trid., p. 234, n. 63; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 23. In Italy confessions are often heard publicly on benches or chairs in the church.

50 Richter, Trid., p. 235 f., n. 66.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

edge were given him to read off, this act could not be properly called human and would therefore be insufficient for valid assistance.[51] The rite is described in can. 1100 ff.

The second section (§ 2) of canon 1095 permits delegation or permission, and may just as well be explained in connection with canon 1096.

REQUISITES OF DELEGATION

CAN. 1096

§ 1. Licentia assistendi matrimonio concessa ad normam can. 1095, § 2, dari expresse debet sacerdoti determinato ad matrimonium determinatum, exclusis quibuslibet delegationibus generalibus, nisi agatur de vicariis cooperatoribus pro paroecia cui addicti sunt; secus irrita est.

§ 2. Parochus vel loci Ordinarius licentiam ne concedat, nisi expletis omnibus quae ius constituit pro libertate status comprobanda.

Permission to assist at marriage, given under can. 1095, must be granted to a specified priest for a specified marriage. General delegations are excluded, except in case of assistant coadjutors for the parish to which they are appointed; in all other cases general delegation is invalid.

The pastor or Ordinary of the diocese shall not grant such a permission unless he has complied with the regulations of the law for establishing the free status of the nupturients.

Here we have the modus of delegation, after can. 1095

51 If the priest would merely feign or affect ignorance, the marriage would be valid; cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 235, n. 63.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

has stated the fact. Section 2 sets up a necessary condition.

1) Can. 1095, § 2, provides that a pastor or Ordinary who himself can validly assist at a marriage, may give permission to another priest to assist, if the marriage is to be celebrated within the boundaries of the parish or diocese, respectively. Hence it is required that the delegans is himself entitled to assist. "Nemo dat, quod non habet." But if a pastor or Ordinary is endowed with the qualities described in can. 1095, § 1, he may apply the two Regulae Iuris in 6° which say that one may do through another what one has a right to do himself, and what is done by that other is as valid as if done by the delegans himself.[52]

2) The modus facti or manner of delegation is set forth in can. 1096, § 1. Of delegation in general enough has been said in Vol. II. Here we may note:

a) The delegation must be made to a priest, and hence, as formerly,[53] the priestly character is absolutely required.

b) Presumed delegation is not admissible. This is the meaning of the word expresse in the text. Therefore even if probable conjectures, or former grants given without the least opposition, furnished a presumption, it could not supply express delegation, nor would it suffice for valid assistance. The fact, also, that the priest must be specified excludes presumption.

52 Reg. Iuris 68, 72 in 6°. Formerly even a censured pastor could give permission to another priest. Sanchez, l. c., III, disp. 20, n. 7; disp. 21, n. 1 f.; Ojetti, In Ius Pianum, etc. Now, can. 2095, § 2, is too definite to admit such a delegation.

53 Trid., sess. 24, c. 1, de ref. mat.: "Vel alio sacerdote de ipsius parochi seu Ordinarii licentia," although the pastor himself did not need to be a priest. If we call that permission delegation, this is done for the sake of convenience, because it is at least similar to delegation. Wernz, l. c. IV, Vol. 1, p. 268.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) The delegated priest must be specified, or, as the Latin has it, determinatus. This is done by giving the name in full, and if there should be two priests of the same name, by adding his residence, office, or occupation. Since this permission need not be given in writing, a priest, if present, may receive the delegation there and then.

Subdelegation is not excluded, but must take place in the same specific manner. To insure the validity of delegation in cases where it is uncertain whether the priest who is asked by the pastor to assist at a marriage will be free on the appointed day or may have to request another priest to attend to the matter, it will be advisable always to add "or any priest whom you may send." [54]

d) Not only the priest, but also the marriage must be specified. The wording of our canon is more precise than that of the "Ne temere." It means that delegation must be given for each single marriage, and not for a number of cases in globo. For instance, a pastor would not be allowed to grant permission to an Italian priest to assist at all Italian marriages in his parish. On the other hand, he may give permission, e. g., for "the five marriages which occur during that week and the banns of which have been published," because in that case the marriages are sufficiently specified. The contracting parties cannot be permitted to choose or call any one they please without the pastor's consent.

e) The Code excludes all general delegation. It was formerly customary in some large cities for pastors to give permission to one another to assist at any marriage that would come up. Such a general delegation, notwithstanding the answer given by the S. Congregation,[55] July 27, 1908, is no longer to be considered valid.

[54] Woywod, l. c., p. 23.

[55] S. C. C., July 27, 1908, ad IV.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

f) An exception is made in favor of assistant priests, as defined in can. 476, i. e., coadiutores or cooperatores. These, says the Code, may receive general delegation from the pastor. In illustration we may quote an authentic interpretation.[56] It happens, says the questioner, that assistants of pastors are appointed by the bishop without special faculties for assisting at marriages, and it has become customary that these assistants, without asking the pastor's permission, assist at marriages, because the pastor made no opposition, and they also registered the marriages under their own name; nay in larger parishes these assistant priests nearly always assist. What is to be said concerning this custom? The answer was that the marriages were valid, or rather that there was no reason for scruples, but that the prescribed rules should be observed and that the regulations laid down by a provincial council could be enforced against the pastors. Our Code makes reference to this decision.[57] In this country assistants, whose status is according to can. 476, may validly assist at marriages with the general or tacit delegation of the pastor. But this delegation is not given if the pastor expressly reserves assistance at marriages to himself.

It goes without saying that delegation entitles the assistant (or delegate) to assist at marriages only in the district subject to the delegans. The Ordinary, bishop or vicar-general may delegate a priest to assist at marriages in any parish of the diocese.

As to the qualities of the delegate our Code only says that he must be a specified priest, without mentioning the requirements or conditions laid down in the "Ne temere"

56 S. C. Sacr., March 13, 1910.

57 It is quoted in Card. Gasparri's edition; but must certainly be restricted to assistants as described in the text.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(art. VI). It seems certain, however, that a censured priest could not validly be delegated, because an excommunicated priest is not allowed to perform any ecclesiastical act,[58] whilst one who is suspended from office loses the right of exercising the functions attached to that office, and in fact all rights connected therewith.[59] Besides it would doubtless be a serious neglect of ecclesiastical discipline, amounting to contempt of weighty penalties, were one to give permission to a censured priest to assist at a marriage.

§ 2 repeats the necessity of ascertaining the free status of the contracting parties before granting permission to another priest to assist at their marriage. Hence the pastor or Ordinary himself, and not the delegated priest, must examine the parties, attend to the publication of the banns, and, in case of doubt, conduct the necessary investigation, as explained under can. 1031. This paragraph does not affect valid assistance.

REQUISITES OF LICIT ASSISTANCE

CAN. 1097

§ 1. Parochus autem vel loci Ordinarius matrimonio licite assistunt:

1.° Constito sibi legitime de libero statu contrahentium ad normam iuris;

2.° Constito insuper de domicilio vel quasi-domicilio vel menstrua commoratione aut, si de vago agatur, actuali commoratione alterutrius contrahentis in loco matrimonii;

3.° Habita, si conditiones deficiant de quibus n. 2, licentia parochi vel Ordinarii domicilii vel quasi-domicilii aut menstruae commorationis alterutrius contra-

58 Can. 2263.

59 Cfr. can. 2281, 2284.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

hentis, nisi vel de vagis actu itinerantibus res sit, qui nullibi commorationis sedem habent, vel gravis necessitas intercedat quae a licentia petenda excuset.

§ 2. In quolibet casu pro regula habeatur ut matrimonium coram sponsae parocho celebretur, nisi iusta causa excuset; matrimonia autem catholicorum mixti ritus, nisi aliud particulari iure cautum sit, in ritu viri et coram eiusdem parocho sunt celebranda.

§ 3. Parochus qui sine licentia iure requisita matrimonio assistit, emolumenta stolae non facit sua, eaque proprio contrahentium parocho remittat.

§ 1. The pastor or the Ordinary of the diocese assist at a marriage licitly:

1) After having ascertained the free status of the contracting parties, as the Code prescribes (especially in can. 1029–1031), and after the publications of the banns have been made or dispensed from.

2) After having ascertained the fact of domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly stay of at least one of the parties in the place where the marriage is to take place, or of actual stay in the case of vagi.

Note the four different kinds of local conditions which affect, not the validity, but the licitness of assistance.

The first is domicile, that is to say, residence in a place combined with the intention of remaining there forever, if nothing calls one away, or actual residence for ten consecutive years.

Quasi-domicile is residence in a place with the intention of staying there the greater part of a year. This intention, as we said under can. 92, may be present on the first day on which one takes up his residence in a parish.[60] A man who was hired for one year, or an official who has taken up residence at the capital for the term of his office, would certainly have a quasi-domicile. The same is true of people who have a summer and a winter residence. The monthly stay, although apparently new in this connection, is not entirely recent, so far as presumption is concerned. For Benedict XIV stated [61] that a sojourn of one month in a place permits the presumption (praesumptio iuris) that the party will stay there for the greater part of the year. Here we have the genesis of the monthly stay, which at first was merely an indication of intention, which, being internal and secret, can not easily be proved.[62] From that, in order to do away with scruples, the legislator prudently proceeded to the mere fact of a month's stay, declaring it sufficient for licit assistance.

60 S. O., June 7, 1867 (Coll. P. F., n. 1305).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A month must be taken as thirty consecutive days,[63] (though the calendar month of February would be sufficient). These thirty days must be morally uninterrupted according to common parlance. Of course one or two days' absence, even if repeated once or twice, would not, properly speaking, interrupt that term.[64] Neither is any inquiry into the intention to be made.

The last kind of local residence is actual stay in the case of vagi. A vagus is one who has left his or her domicile or quasi-domicile and stays in no one place for thirty days. Sometimes people move into a parish a day or two before marriage and want to get married before moving further. The evening of their arrival they go to the pastor and ask to be married the next morning. Setting aside for the moment the legal requirements, we must say that the pastor may assist at their marriage.

61 "Paucis abhinc," March 19, 1758; S. O., l. c.

62 S. O., l. c.; Nov. 9, 1898 (Coll., n. 2025).

63 Can. 32.

64 Vermeersch, l. c., p. 32, n. 58; Wouters, l. c., p. 52.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But here there again arises the question of diocesan domicile. Those who have a domicile or stay for a month in a diocese cannot be called vagi.[65] Who may assist licitly at their marriage? The answer is: the pastor. He must inquire about them, and if he finds that they have moved about the diocese to which he belongs for at least a month, he may marry them by reason of a monthly stay in the diocese. If he finds that they have roamed about in various dioceses, he may assist by reason of their being vagi. However, a restriction must be made. If we say, "the pastor may assist," we suppose that the Ordinary has given him permission to do so. The reason is that, as diocesan domicile cannot be contracted in a parish,[66] the proper superior of one who has only a diocesan domicile is the Ordinary, and not the pastor.[67]

Concerning minors, i. e., such as are under twenty-one years of age, they may follow the domicile[68] or monthly stay of their parents or guardians, and besides, are entitled, in case of marriage, to be treated like those who are of age, because the legislator makes no distinction.

Finally, we would draw attention to the text: alterutrius contrahentis. If the bride has spent a month at a place, she may get married there, although the groom has a domicile in a different parish. The same holds good concerning vagi. Thus if a rover has gotten a bride in one place and wishes to move with her to another, the pastor or Ordinary of the latter place, as explained above, is allowed to assist at the marriage, even though the groom returns with his wife to the latter's domicile the day after.

65 S. C. Sacr., March 13, 1910, ad V (A. Ap. S., II, 197).

66 Can. 92, § 3.

67 Gennari, Breve Commento della Nuova Legge sugli Sponsali e sul Matrimonio, ed. 4, 33; Wouters, l. c., p. 51.

68 Can. 93, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3) If the conditions set down under the preceding number (2) are not verified, the pastor or Ordinary, in order to assist lawfully at a marriage, must have the permission of the pastor or Ordinary of the place where one of the contracting parties has a domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly stay, except in the case of vagi, who are actually on the road and have no residence or stay anywhere, or unless a weighty reason excuses from demanding such permission.

James and Gemma wish to get married in the cathedral parish of St. Joseph, Mo., where neither of them has a domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly habitation, their domicile being at Maryville, Mo., in the same diocese. What is to be done? The pastor of the cathedral parish must ask permission of the pastor at Maryville. But the bishop of the diocese, if he wishes to assist at the marriage in the cathedral parish, need not ask permission from the Maryville pastor, because James and Gemma are supposed to have lived in his diocese at least one month. But if both parties belonged to the Kansas City diocese, and wished to have their marriage performed by the bishop of St. Joseph, the latter would have to ask permission either from the pastor of the bride in the Kansas City diocese or from the bishop of Kansas City.

No preference is given to domicile over quasi-domicile, or to the latter over a monthly sojourn. Hence, if the bride lived only one month in a parish, the pastor thereof could give the permission, although the bridegroom might have a domicile in a parish whose pastor is to be asked for permission.[69]

This license is not required if there is a serious reason excusing the pastor from asking it. The text says gravis

[69] S. C. Sacr., March 13, 1910 ad V; S. C. C., March 28, 1908 ad V.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

necessitas, and therefore it must not be easily presumed, because it is a violation of a strictly parochial right.[70] A grave reason would be the probable fear of a civil marriage, or the refusal of the parties' own pastor to marry them — perhaps on account of some differences of opinion, or of travelling expenses, or the accidental presence of parents or friends.[71]

§ 2. Every marriage should be performed before the pastor of the bride, unless there are just reasons for breaking the rule. If the parties belong to different rites, their marriage must be celebrated in the rite and before the pastor of the bridegroom, unless particular laws dictate otherwise.

The custom favoring the pastor of the bride is an old one, but good or plausible reasons justify a departure from it. Thus, for instance, military chaplains are preferred.[72] Other reasons for deviating from it are sudden departure, elopement, objections raised by parents, etc. As to the different rites, the Code here follows the rule laid down in can. 98, and gives preference to the rite of the bridegroom, adding, however, that particular laws may dictate otherwise. Thus Benedict XIV had ruled for the Greeks of Southern Italy and Sicily that if the marriage was to take place between a Latin man and a Greek woman, the pastor of the former should assist, but if the man belonged to the Greek rite, he might choose either, Latin or Greek.[73] The bishops of the Ruthenian and Latin rites of Lemberg made an agreement (Dec. 23, 1853) to the effect that marriages should always be 70 Gennari, l. c., p. 27, and Vermeersch, l. c., p. 33, admit presumed reasons.

71 Wernz, l. IV, Vol. I, p. 294, prudently observes that the pastor who assisted for reasons should keep some documents at hand which would prove the existence of these reasons.

72 Ib., p. 295.

73 "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § VIII, n. XI f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

celebrated before the pastor of the bride, unless both parties demanded the contrary.[74] These regulations have not lost their force, but persons who come to the United States should not be troubled on account of them. As to the Ruthenian Rite in our country, the following regulations have been made by the Apostolic See: the Latin rite must be followed if the marriage is contracted between a Latin man and a Ruthenian woman; if the bride is of the Latin and the groom of the Ruthenian rite, the parties may choose the pastor of either rite.[75]

§ 3. Pastors who assist at marriages without the permission required by law, are not allowed to keep the stole fees, but must hand them to the parties' own pastor. This ruling follows, at least partly, from can. 463, § 3. The present canon restricts the obligation of refunding to cases of illicit assistance. Hence if the conditions prescribed in this canon have been complied with, the stole fee may be kept by the assisting pastor. This rule also obtains in cases of necessity, where no permission was required. The Ordinary is also bound by the law.

A strict parochial right can be claimed by the pastor of the bride only, and therefore, if the pastor of the bridegroom should assist against the former's will, the latter (the bride's pastor) may see the bishop or vicar-general about it. But restitution cannot be claimed in justice, wherefore the Code says that the stole fee must be refunded to the parties' own pastor, not to the bride's pastor.

Lastly the question may be asked: What about a pastor whose congregation is scattered over more than one parish — e. g., an Italian pastor whose people are dis-

74 S. C. P. F., Oct. 6, 1863 (Coll., n. 1243).

75 Lit. Apost., June 14, 1908 (Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. XXXVII, p. 512).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tributed throughout a city where there are other parishes territorially divided? This case, so far as we are aware, has not been authentically decided. But it stands to reason that if an Italian should marry a girl of an English speaking parish, the pastor of the latter would be entitled to assist, unless the groom refused to go to him. Besides, we believe that if the bride would join the Italian congregation a month before the marriage, the pastor of the English parish would forfeit every right to assistance.[76] At any rate the Code permits the pastor of the bridegroom to judge of the sufficiency of the reasons.

TWO SPECIAL CASES

CAN. 1098

Si haberi vel adiri nequeat sine gravi incommodo parochus vel Ordinarius vel sacerdos delegatus qui matrimonio assistant ad normam can. 1095, 1096:

1.° In mortis periculo validum et licitum est matrimonium contractum coram solis testibus; et etiam extra mortis periculum, dummodo prudenter praevideatur eam rerum conditionem esse per mensem duraturam;

2.° In utroque casu, si praesto sit alius sacerdos qui adesse possit, vocari et, una cum testibus, matrimonio assistere debet, salva coniugii validitate coram solis testibus.

If the pastor, or the Ordinary, or a priest delegated [76] A decree of S. C. P. F., April 26, 1897, rules that anyone who is sufficiently versed in the English language may freely choose an English speaking congregation. Conversely it may justly be maintained that a party sufficiently conversant with Italian — because he or she had been in Italy for a number of years — may join an Italian congregation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by either, as prescribed by can. 1095 and 1096, cannot be had without great inconvenience, then:

1) In danger of death marriage may be validly and licitly contracted in the presence of two witnesses; the same holds good also where there is no danger of death, provided it may prudently be foreseen that this condition of things will last for a month.

2) In both cases, however, if a priest is available, he must be called and assist at the marriage together with the two witnesses; but the marriage is valid if contracted in the presence of the witnesses alone.

The wording of our canon betrays a modification or mitigation of the "Ne temere" (VII and VIII).

1. The danger of death need not be imminent,[77] but it must be probable or likely. Neither, of course, is it necessary that both parties be in danger.

2. The second case touches peculiar conditions. It may happen in our country that a pastor visits his mission only once a month or even less often. Note the wording of the text, which says nothing of a region or district.[78] Therefore it must now be held that provincial or regionary reasons have nothing to do with the case, but merely personal reasons, which indirectly may be due to local conditions, are here considered. But the condition must last one month (thirty days) or rather it must be foreseen that it may last that long.

3. That assistance without the pastor or the Ordinary or a delegate of either be allowable and the marriage be valid, the impossibility of having such an authorized witness must be verified. The text says: (a) if they cannot be had or reached (haberi aut adiri). The first term, to have, means that the pastor cannot come, or is 77 The "Ne temere" had that apposition.

78 "Ne temere" reads: in aliqua regione.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not available because of sickness, or absence, or for some other reason. To reach or to approach signifies that the parties themselves have made an effort to get the pastor by calling him by ordinary means of communication, i. e., letter or messenger. The telegraph and the telephone are not regarded as ordinary means, and justly so, for a country telephone line is often not only unsafe, but liable to abuse on account of the publicity involved. Moreover, conditions may be unsafe for travellers, as in times of war, flood or quarantine. (b) The text furthermore says: without great inconvenience, which is a rather elastic term. An inconvenience would be great if the expenses were above the means of the parties concerned, or if one party would have to leave the other alone sick. Now-a-days automobiles are a great help to swift and agreeable travelling. The parties themselves must conscientiously judge as to the character of an existing inconvenience. (c) The text also says that in case of sickness or other impossibility a priest should be called who can be present. This priest may be any priest, even one under censure, or of some other diocese, because "qui adesse possit" must, we believe, be taken in the sense of physical, not moral, possibility. But the priest must be at hand (si praesto sit); the parties need not search for him. The assistance of a priest at the marriage is very convenient, because he may dispense from the impediment of clandestinity and others (can. 1043) if there is danger of death. This is the meaning of an answer given by the S. Congregation [79] to the following query: "In several districts the pastors are not allowed to assist before the civil marriage is contracted; and yet this cannot be done in every instance, although for the spiritual welfare of the parties it would be expedient to have them married.

[79] S. C. Sacr., Jan. 31, 1916 (A. Ap. S., VIII, p. 36 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

What should the Ordinaries do? Resp. Recourse must in each case be had to the S. Congregation, except when there is danger of death, in which case any priest may dispense." (d) Lastly, calling a priest does not affect the validity of the marriage, which therefore may be contracted validly in the presence of only two witnesses. We hardly believe that the second case is of frequent occurrence now-a-days, except in missionary countries.

EXTENT OF THE LAW WITH REGARD TO THE FORM

CAN. 1099

§ 1. Ad statutam superius formam servandam tenentur:

1.° Omnes in catholica Ecclesia baptizati et ad eam ex haeresi aut schismate conversi, licet sive hi sive illi ab eadem postea defecerint, quoties inter se matrimonium ineunt;

2.° Iidem, de quibus supra, si cum acatholicis sive baptizatis sive non baptizatis etiam post obtentam dispensationem ab impedimento mixtae religionis vel disparitatis cultus matrimonium contrahant;

3.° Orientales, si cum latinis contrahant hac forma adstrictis.

§ 2. Firmo autem praescripto § 1, n. 1, acatholici sive baptizati sive non baptizati, si inter se contrahant, nullibi tenentur ad catholicam matrimonii formam servandam; item ab acatholicis nati, etsi in Ecclesia catholica baptizati, qui ab infantili aetate in haeresi vel schismate aut infidelitate vel sine ulla religione adoleverunt, quoties cum parte acatholica contraxerint.

§ 1. The following are bound to observe the form prescribed above:

1.° All persons baptized in the Catholic Church, as well as those converted from heresy or schism, even though they (whether Catholics or converts) have afterwards fallen away, as often as they contract marriage among themselves;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Catholics as well as converts (n. 1) who marry non-Catholics, either baptized or non-baptized, even after having obtained a dispensation from the impediment of mixed religion or disparity of cult;

3.° Orientals who marry persons of the Latin Rite who are bound by that form.

This first section of can. 1099 positively and exhaustively enumerates all those classes of persons who are obliged to observe the form laid down in can. 1094.

1.° The first class is that of Catholics marrying among themselves. It is important to define more closely the terms used in the text.

(a) "Omnes in catholica Ecclesia baptizati," all persons baptized in the Catholic Church. Baptized in the Catholic Church is a phrase not so easily interpreted as would appear at first sight.[80] No doubt those are "baptized in the Catholic Church" who, by their own free will, or the will of their parents or tutors, have become incorporated in the Church through Baptism. This intention is even more evident if the minister employed the Catholic rite. Neither may there be doubt as to Catholic Baptism conferred in case of necessity, if the parents are known to be Catholics; or, where one is not a Catholic, the party that exercises the decisive influence in the matter of education is a Catholic.[81] But what if the child

80 The Am. Eccl. Rev., 1914, Vol. LI, p. 359, contains a case in point, but I cannot agree with the author's contention that only a child baptized by an official of the Catholic Church may be looked upon as "baptized in the Church"; the rights of parents are curtailed by this interpretation.

81 S. O., Aug. 1, 1883, ad 5 (Coll. P. F., n. 1605); Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. I, p. 305.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was baptized in a foundling asylum or hospital, the character of which is not exactly Catholic; or if the Baptism was conferred in a Catholic asylum by a non-Catholic physician or nurse, who did not know the religion of the parents? For instance, if a Jewish physician or nurse had baptized a child, could that child be called "baptized in the Catholic Church"? To the general intention "to do what the Church does,"[82] another would have to be added, viz., that of making the subject to be baptized a member of the religious body known publicly as the Catholic Church. In other words, the Jewish physician or nurse would have to have the intention of incorporating the child into the Catholic Church. Such an intention cannot be presumed, but must be proved. It may be proved by the baptismal record, which should therefore contain, in such cases, a clause indicating the minister and his intention. If it be objected that there is only one Baptism and one Church, and therefore Baptism inevitably makes the baptized person a Catholic, we reply: All that is true, dogmatically speaking, and it is also true that by Baptism one is subjected to the whole law of Christ and no longer free to reject the precepts of the Church.[83] However, the supreme legislator of the Church has the power to exempt certain individuals, or any class of individuals, from the observance of ecclesiastical laws which would otherwise be binding on them. Thus practice and theory have introduced a mitigation concerning non-Catholics, as shall be seen under § 2. The legislator, therefore, by emphasizing the term Catholic Baptism, doubtless wished to distinguish it from 82 The "intentio faciendi id quod facit ecclesia" is indeed always required, but to interpret it as the intention of the true Church cannot be required of non-Catholics, nor may it simply be attributed, as interpretive intention, to the child.

83 Trid., sess. 7, can. 7 f., de baptismo.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other baptisms, otherwise he would have simply said: Omnes baptizati, all baptized persons, as in can. 1015 and 1016. But no private interpreter has the right to read the words "in the Catholic Church" into a canon which does not expressly contain it.

(b) "Ad eam ex haeresi aut schismate conversi," those converted to it [the Catholic Church] from heresy or schism. Whilst the former class may be styled original Catholics, this second class is that of converts. Conversion is a change from heretical or schismatical belief to the Catholic faith, in the sense of the text. Whether it is brought about by the converts themselves, or by extraneous agencies, is immaterial here. Thus parents may determine the religion of their children as long as these have not attained to the use of reason, and even if they have reached the age of reason, the parents may bring them up as Catholics. Even grandparents may offer their grandchildren for Catholic Baptism, provided they guarantee their Catholic training.[84] However, if children, when they commence to realize the difference between religions, object to embracing the Catholic religion, which the parents would impose on them, there is no conversion to the Catholic faith.[85] Conversion, therefore, either from heresy or schism, must have taken place knowingly or unknowingly, through the medium of parents or tutors, some time before the marriage.

(c) "Licet sive hi sive illi ab eadem postea defecerint," although either these [converts] or those [original Catholics] may afterwards have fallen away. Broadly speaking, apostasy from the Catholic faith does not change, with regard to our canon, the fact of being a Catholic. An apostate is considered a Catholic before the ecclesias-

84 Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," Feb. 28, 1747, § 17.

85 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. I, p. 306.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tical law. We may quote here an answer given by the S. Congregation, to the effect that it does not matter whether one fell away in childhood, or youth, or later, provided he was baptized a Catholic.[86] Therefore deficere, to fall away, may be a voluntary or an involuntary act, brought about through the agency of others, just as in the case of conversion. The consequences will be seen in n. 2 and § 2.

(d) This law is binding on such as contract marriage among themselves. Therefore if James, a baptized Catholic but fallen away before marriage, wishes to marry Gemma, a Catholic convert, who renounced her religion when she became engaged to him, he has to do it before a Catholic priest and two witnesses, otherwise they are not married according to Catholic law. If it is asked, before what pastor they must marry, the answer is, any pastor may assist validly, and in our case, also licitly, within the limits of his parish.

2.° This paragraph concerns mixed marriages. It provides that original Catholics as well as converts are bound by the law if they marry non-Catholics, no matter whether the latter be baptized or not. A dispensation from the prohibitive impediment of mixed religion or from the nullifying impediment of disparity of cult does not neutralize this formal requirement. This last clause was not superfluous because confusion had arisen between the two impediments of clandestinity and mixed religion, so that some were led to assume that dispensation from the latter would also include dispensation from the observance of the required form. Surprise may be caused by the omission of the clause appended to IX, § 2 of the "Ne temere," which reads: "Unless the Holy See should have decreed otherwise for some particular place or province." This refers to the constitution of Pius X, "Provida," of Jan. 18, 1906, given for the German Empire, and only to that, every other decree, even the Declaratio Benedictina for the Netherlands (Nov. 4, 1741) being declared null and void.[87] Now the "Provida" is also abolished, because the exempting clause is omitted and no reference made to any particular legislation. Therefore also the extension to the Kingdom of Hungary made by the Roman Pontiff, Feb. 23, 1909, is no longer in force. There is no longer any favored country concerning this point of matrimonial law.

[86] S. C. C., Feb. 1, 1908: "defecerunt, etiam in juvenili vel infantili aetate."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Orientals, i. e., such persons as belong to the united, not to the schismatic, Church of the Oriental rite (Greek, Syriac, Armenian; Coptic), are not bound to the new form if they contract marriage among themselves, because the Code does not legislate for them.[88] But if an Oriental wishes to contract marriage with a person of the Latin rite, he must conform to the law of the Latin Church and get married before a priest and two witnesses.[89] If an Oriental Catholic should wish to marry a non-Catholic, say an Anglican, he would not be obliged to observe the form. But if the Anglican party had been baptized in the Catholic faith, or converted to it and remained in it after childhood, the Catholic form of marriage would be required.

§ 2. Saving the rule in n. 1, § 1 of this canon, non-Catholics, whether baptized or not, who marry among themselves are nowhere bound to observe the Catholic form of marriage. Neither are those born of non-Catholic parents and baptized in the Catholic Church, but who have grown up from childhood in heresy or schism or

87 S. C. C., Feb. 1, 1908, ad IV.
88 Can. 1; S. C. C., Feb. 1, 1908, ad I.
89 S. C. C., March 28, 1908, ad II.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

infidelity, or without any religion at all, if they marry a non-Catholic party.

The two clauses of this section refer to two classes of contracting parties, the one constituting purely non-Catholics, the other supposing that one of the parties once belonged to the Catholic Church by baptism in the same.

The first category is that of purely non-Catholics, i. e., such as are neither original Catholics nor converts to the Catholic faith. If they were such, or if one of the parties was such, they would fall under § 1, n. 1, and would be bound to observe the form prescribed. But purely non-Catholics, whether baptized or not, if they marry among themselves, are not bound by the Catholic form.[90] This is new legislation, as far as its general extent is concerned.[91]

The second clause affects persons born of non-Catholic parents and baptized in the Catholic Church. "Ab acatholicis nati," born of non-Catholics, obviously means that neither the father nor the mother belonged to the Catholic Church. In the case of an illegitimate child it suffices that the mother was not a Catholic, because the father is supposed to be unknown. This may be safely extended to a child born after his father's death.[92] The text supposes that this child was baptized in the Catholic Church, and therefore would fall under the ruling of § 1, n. 1. But there is also a second supposition, viz., that the child grew up to the seventh year in heresy or schism or infidelity or without any religion at all. The seventh year certainly is a line of demarcation and may be taken as a safe limit, even though signs of malice or indicating the 90 Nov. 4, 1741.

91 The Declaratio Benedictina and that of the S. C. C., of Nov. 4, 1741, were only made for the Netherlands.

92 Can. 90.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

use of reason may have been manifested. But after the seventh year the use of reason is presumed, and therefore the child is no longer in infantili aetate, unless it can be proved that it was destitute of reason after the seventh year.[93] A third supposition is that it grew up either in heresy, or schism (Russian, Greek, Jansenist), or infidelity, or without any religion.[94] This, of course, supposes a heretical, schismatic or irreligious education. If a child has been educated in the Catholic faith before the seventh year was completed, it can not be said to have grown up in a sectarian or irreligious atmosphere, and must therefore be considered a Catholic. The last condition is that a person baptized a Catholic,— but now practically speaking a heretic or schismatic or unbeliever, if he marries a non-Catholic, is not bound by the Catholic form.*

In conclusion we draw attention to the individual character[95] of the marriage contract which has been a rich source of canonical speculation. For it is the common teaching of canonists that, if one of the parties was exempt from the law of "Tametsi" (concerning the Catholic form), the other party also was free in virtue of the individual character of marriage, or rather by reason of a communication of the exemption. This principle is in itself perfectly correct and must be upheld in every bilateral contract. But the supreme legislator is empowered to declare in every single case whether or not such a communication takes place, and in the case of the impediment of clandestinity he has now spoken for the whole world, as Pius X had done in the "Ne temere," in which he exempted the German empire from its observance. The redeeming word has been uttered: in the case of the law

93 Can. 89, § 3.

94 S. O., April 6, 1859 (Coll. P. F., n. 1174).

* See Appendix II to this volume.

95 See Archiv für K.-R., 1900, Vol. LXXX, p. 469 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

obliging the observance of the Catholic form, mixed marriages are to be contracted like Catholic marriages as far as the mere form is concerned. Therefore, even if the non-Catholic party is not obliged to observe this form, he or she can no longer communicate his or her exemption to the Catholic party.

MARRIAGE RITES

CAN. 1100

Extra casum necessitatis in matrimonii celebratione serventur ritus in libris ritualibus ab Ecclesia probatis praescripti aut laudabilibus consuetudinibus recepti.

Outside the case of necessity, the rites prescribed in the liturgical books approved by the Church or received by praiseworthy custom are to be observed.

Wiclif and Huss depreciated the sacred rites of the Church in the administration of the Sacraments and the solemnization of marriage. Therefore those suspected of sharing their errors were asked whether they believed that a Christian contemning those rites was guilty of a grievous sin.[96] This interrogation proves that the Church insists upon the ceremonies with which she has surrounded the celebration of marriage, and that, except in cases of necessity, their omission is a grievous transgression. The rites to be observed are those contained in the Roman Ritual, which should be followed everywhere, unless praiseworthy customs have introduced a somewhat different one. In South Shantung Chinese bridal couples are excused from joining hands because this custom is repulsive to them.[97] The natives of Pondi-

96 Martin V, "Inter cunctas," Feb. 22, 1418, art. 19 (Denzinger, n. 563).

97 S. O., July 30, 1890 (Coll. P. F., n. 1736).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

chery use, instead of a wedding ring, an emblem called taly, which custom is admitted by Rome.[98] Note that the text says praiseworthy customs, which means that such customs must be reasonable and free from superstition.[99]

THE CATHOLIC MARRIAGE RITE

CAN. 1101

§ 1. Parochus curet ut sponsi benedictionem sollemnem accipiant, quae dari eis potest etiam postquam diu vixerint in matrimonio, sed solum in Missa, servata speciali rubrica et excepto tempore feriato.

§ 2. Sollemnem benedictionem ille tantum sacerdos per se ipse vel per alium dare potest, qui valide et licite matrimonio potest assistere.

§ 1. The pastor should take care that the spouses receive the solemn nuptial blessing, which may be imparted even after they have lived in the matrimonial state for a long time, but only at Mass, according to the special rubrics provided for the purpose, and on days not forbidden.

§ 2. The solemn blessing may be imparted only by the priest or his delegate who is validly and licitly authorized to assist at the marriage.

How seriously the law concerning the nuptial blessing is to be taken may be seen from an instruction of the Holy Office,[1] which says that absolution may be denied to those who refuse to receive that blessing. Surely a great neglect, the same instruction says, is that which spurns the special graces and the spiritual aid attached to 98 S. O., Feb. 3, 1892 (ib., n. 1782); but the priest must substitute: "tesseram hanc nuptialem."

99 S. O., ib.

1 S. O., July 6, 1817 (Coll. P. F., n. 725).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

these sacred rites. Hence also the grave obligation of the pastor to instruct the people to that effect.

This blessing may also be imparted to a couple that never received it, no matter how long the parties have lived in the married state. But in such a case the one who blesses such a validly married couple must tell them that this blessing has nothing to do with the validity of their marriage and must not require a renewal of the marital consent. Hence the question: Wilt thou take, etc., and the "Ego coniungo vos, etc., must be omitted.[2] During the forbidden seasons of Advent and Lent this blessing must not be bestowed on a couple already married.

As to § 2 the law establishes nothing new, but draws the consequence from the regulations made concerning valid and licit assistance, and extends it to the blessing to be imparted to a couple already married.

It may not be superfluous to state the liturgical rules for the celebration of marriage.

1. The Ritual or Private Blessing.[3] The priest asks the consent of both parties: N. wilt thou take N. here present, etc., to which both answer: I will. Then the priest says: Ego coniungo vos, etc., after which follows the blessing of the ring. The bridegroom puts the ring on the finger of the left hand of the bride. Then the priest blesses the couple: Confirma hoc, etc. This is all that belongs to the Ritual Blessing. This would be the form for Catholic marriages during the forbidden seasons or outside the nuptial mass. However, since, according to can. 1108, the bishop may permit the solemn blessing even during the "holy" seasons, we will now see what this is.

2 S. O., Jan. 15, 1784; S. C. P. F., 21, 1841 (Coll. cit., nn. 566, 932).

3 Cfr. Rituale Rom., tit. VII, c. 2 (Ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 214 f.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. The Solemn Blessing[4] comprises (a) the Ritual Blessing just described, to be imparted by the priest vested for holy Mass, except the Maniple, which he assumes after the blessing. (b) The Nuptial Mass,[5] either that Pro Sponso et Sponsa, or a Mass of the day. The Missa Pro Sponso et Sponsa is a Votive Mass and must therefore be said without the Gloria and Credo and with Benedicamus at the end. This must also be observed when the Mass is solemnly sung, and no contrary custom may be tolerated.[6] The second or third oration must be added according to the rubrics for the respective day. This Mass also contains two prayers for the spouses, one after the Pater Noster ("Propitiare"), the other before the "Placeat," both to be said by the priest facing the couple. This Mass may be said on all days not prohibited by the rubrics. The rubrics forbid this Votive Mass on the following days: all Sundays and holydays of obligation, all holydays of the first and second class within the octaves of Epiphany, Easter, Pentecost, and Corpus Christi, all privileged vigils and ferial days, excluding feasts of the 1st and 2nd class.[7]

On these forbidden days the Mass of the day (de festo vel die occurrente) must be said. However, the orations taken from the formulary of the Mass Pro Sponso et Sponsa must be inserted after the oratio diei and other orations, if such are prescribed in the Ordo, but before the imperata. On holydays like Epiphany, Trinity Sunday, Corpus Christi, or others which exclude any other orations, the Oratio Pro Sponso et Sponsa is to be added

4 Cfr. Wapelhorst, Compendium S. Liturgiae, 1915, p. 485 f.

5 S. Rit. C., March 3, 1818 (Coll. P. F., n. 728).

6 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1839 (ib., n. 890).

7 S. Rit. C., June 14, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 332). Vigils are the days preceding Epiphany, Pentecost, Christmas; the privileged ferial days are Ash Wednesday and Holy Week.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sub unica conclusione.[8] If the bishop, according to can. 1108, permits solemn celebration during the forbidden time, even on Christmas or Easter, the same orations, sub unica conclusione, must be added to the oration or orations of the day. And whenever the orations Pro Sponso et Sponsa are said, the special orations after the "Pater Noster" and before the "Placeat" must also be recited.

We add from a decision of the Holy Office[9] the following points: When several couples are to be blessed, which is permitted, the officiating priest must ask the consent of each couple separately and say over each separately the words: "Ego vos coniungo." He may bless all the rings simultaneously and also recite the prayers in the plural form. He is not obliged to apply the Mass for the parties unless he has received a stipend.[10] In "black" Masses no nuptial blessing is to be given. The same priest who has given the blessing must sprinkle the parties kneeling at the altar, but the pastor may receive the marriage consent according to the Ritual, and another priest may, with the pastor's or the Ordinary's permission, impart the nuptial blessing, i. e., say the nuptial Mass.

CEREMONY FOR MIXED MARRIAGES

CAN. 1102

§ 1. In matrimoniis inter partem catholicam et partem acatholicam interrogationes de consensu fieri debent secundum praescriptum can. 1095, § 1, n. 3.

§ 2. Sed omnes sacri ritus prohibentur; quod si ex hac prohibitione graviora mala praevideantur, Ordina-

8 Ibid.

9 Sept. 1, 1841 (Coll. P. F., n. 938).

10 Of course he may receive only one stipend, but stole fees from each couple.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rius potest aliquam ex consuetis ecclesiasticis caeremoniis, exclusa semper Missae celebratione, permittere.

In marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics, the consent must be asked as prescribed under can. 1095, § 1, n. 3. All sacred rites are prohibited. If, however, greater evils should be foreseen from this prohibition, the Ordinary may permit one or the other of the usual ecclesiastical ceremonies, always exclusive of the nuptial Mass.

The first clause admits the so-called passive assistance, sometimes also styled "bare, simple, and material assistance."[11] Strictly speaking, this does not even include the words: "Ego vos coniungo," etc.[12] However, since the Code requires that the consent be asked and received, it stands to reason that the term passive assistance must here be taken with a grain of salt. The question addressed to both parties separately: "Wilt thou, etc.?" cannot be omitted. After both have given their consent, they join hands and recite severally the formula, "I, N. N., etc." Thereupon the priest may say: "By the authority committed to me, I pronounce you united in the bonds of matrimony." Then the bridegroom puts the ring on the finger of the left hand of the bride, saying: "With this ring I thee wed, and plight unto thee my troth."[13] A brief sermon or exhortation before and after the ceremony is permitted if the bishop or custom allows it.[14] Of course, the priest may not wear surplice and stole, but only the black cassock.[15]

The second clause admits the Ritual Blessing in cases

11 S. C. P. F., Sept. 6, 1785 (Coll., n. 579).

12 S. O., Aug. 1, 1821 (Coll. cit., n. 762).

13 See Excerpta ex Rituali Romano, ed. 14, p. 243.

14 S. O., July 16, 1885 (Coll. cit., n. 1638).

15 Ibid. A surplice is permitted if the parties demand some ornamental dress; S. O., Dec. 9, 1874 (Coll. cit., n. 1427).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

where the Ordinary thinks it necessary in order to avoid greater evils, as the Instruction of the Secretary of State, Nov. 15, 1858, says. These greater evils are described in a letter of the Holy Office, Nov. 26, 1862, as follows:

(1.) If the refusal of said assistance would give rise to complaints and animosity on the part of non-Catholics against the faithful and the laws of the Church;

(2.) If the contracting parties would otherwise go to a non-Catholic minister or church, either before or after the marriage;

(3.) If there were reason to fear that the promises made at mixed marriages would remain unfulfilled.[16]

This enumeration must not be looked upon as exhaustive, but peculiar circumstances should be taken into consideration by the Ordinary, who is the judge as to the existence of probable evils. Only one rule is added in the last-named instruction, viz.: that Ordinaries should not give the permission at random and indiscriminately, nor proclaim it as a rule, but make prudent and cautious use of their power.

The nuptial Mass is always excluded, even in cases where the Blessing of the Ritual is permitted. From this rule the Roman Court has never departed. When asked[17] whether a private Mass could be said after the marriage in the presence of the bridal couple and their suite, even though the spouses would not occupy prominent seats thereat, the Holy Office answered negatively, if any suspicion could arise that the Mass would be regarded as part of the marriage ceremnoy. Of course, if the couple wishes to assist privately at a Mass said after the marriage, no one can hinder them.[18]

16 Coll. P. F., n. 1169; S. O., Jan. 3, 1871 (Coll., n. 1632).

17 S. O., Jan. 17, 1872.

18 The priest may even receive a stipend from the couple for that mass, but it would be imprudent to announce the fact.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RECORDING MARRIAGES

CAN. 1103

§ 1. Celebrato matrimonio, parochus vel qui eius vices gerit, quamprimum describat in libro matrimoniorum nomina coniugum ac testium, locum et diem celebrati matrimonii atque alia secundum modum in libris ritualibus et a proprio Ordinario praescriptum; idque licet alius sacerdos vel a se vel ab Ordinario delegatus matrimonio adstiterit.

§ 2. Praeterea, ad normam can. 470, § 2, parochus in libro quoque baptizatorum adnotet coniugem tali die in sua paroecia matrimonium contraxisse. Quod si coniux alibi baptizatus fuerit, matrimonii parochus notitiam initi contractus ad parochum baptismi sive per se sive per Curiam episcopalem transmittat, ut matrimonium in baptizatorum librum referatur.

§ 3. Quoties matrimonium ad normam can. 1098 contrahitur, sacerdos, si eidem adstiterit, secus testes tenentur in solidum cum contrahentibus curare ut initum coniugium in praescriptis libris quamprimum adnotetur.

1. As soon as possible after the marriage ceremony the pastor, or whoever takes his place, shall enter in the marriage register the names of the parties and witnesses, the place and date of the marriage, as well as other data prescribed by the rituals or diocesan statutes; and this he must do even though another priest delegated by himself or the Ordinary assisted at the marriage.

The person who is obliged to record marriages is the pastor, because rights and duties are correlative; since the pastor is entitled to assist at, he is also obliged to record, marriages.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the pastor has a substitute, either temporary or permanent (assistant), the latter is likewise obliged to see to it that marriages are properly recorded. If the substitute has assisted at a marriage and records the same himself, he has to sign his own name.

If a priest was delegated either by the pastor or by the Ordinary, or subdelegated, if we may say so, by the assistant, it is not the delegate who must record the marriage, but the pastor or his substitute. However, the priest who has actually assisted must be named in the record. It may be added that the pastor is to be held responsible for the proper recording of marriages, though in single instances he may leave this duty to an assistant. The time within which the marriage must be recorded is quamprimum,[19] as soon as possible after the ceremony has taken place, in order to avoid the evil consequences of forgetfulness. We do not wish to set a definite time limit, as much depends upon habit and a "good memory," but the obligation is called a serious one (gravis) by Cardinal Gennari.[20]

The matter to be recorded is: the names of the couple and of the witnesses, the place and date of the marriage, mention of the dispensation if one was used, and the fact of delegation if the assisting priest was delegated by another.

It may be added that the Code mentions a liber matrimoniorum, thereby discouraging the custom of employing loose leaves. The form to be used in recording marriages is given in the Rituale Romanum.[21]

2. As noted in can. 470, § 2, the pastor shall enter every marriage contracted in his parish also in the baptismal

19 The "Ne temere," IX, § 1, had statim, immediately, which commentators interpreted as one day, or at most three days.

20 Breve Commento, ed. 6, p. 43.

21 Tit. X, c. 5 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 330 f.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

record. If the parties, or one of them, were baptized elsewhere, the pastor in whose parish the wedding was celebrated shall either himself or through the episcopal chancery inform the pastor of the parish where the party or parties were baptized of the fact of the marriage, that the latter may register it in his baptismal record. "Red tape," some will say; but this contempt is not shared by a defensor vinculi or any one who has ever had to do with a matrimonial court. Rome will hardly recede from this prescription, though petitions asking for a modification are not wanting.[22] The Congregation that refused such petitions insisted that the record to be sent to the pastor of the parish of baptism should comprise the names of the contracting parties, the full [23] names of their parents, the age of bride and groom, the place and date of the marriage, and the full names of the witnesses, to be followed by the signature of the pastor and the parochial seal.[24] This document, thus signed and sealed by the pastor, may be sent to the episcopal chancery of the diocese in which the marriage took place. If it is sent thither, the pastor is free from further obligation or responsibility. The decree just mentioned enjoins Ordinaries to see to it that these regulations are conscientiously carried out, even if they should be compelled to make use of canonical penalties.

3. Whenever a marriage is contracted according to can. 1098, the priest who was present, or, if no priest was present, the lay witnesses, are bound conjointly with the contracting parties to take care that the marriage be recorded as soon as possible in the parish register.

22 S. C. Sacr., March 13, 1910, ad IX.

23 "Full" means the baptismal or first name, v. g., John, and the family name, v. g., Murphy; agnomen properly signifies the surname or an adopted name.

24 S. C. Sacr., March 6, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 102 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The canon quoted (1098) speaks of the extraordinary case where there is danger of death and the pastor cannot perform the marriage. If a priest was present, he is bound equally with the contracting parties to see to it that the marriage is recorded. If no priest was present, the obligation is shared equally by the lay witnesses and the contracting parties; that is to say, if the parties themselves have the marriage recorded, the witnesses are free; but until the record is actually made, none of them is exempt from the obligation.

The notice should be sent to the pastor who was entitled to assist at the marriage, but it may also be sent to the diocesan chancellor, who shall forward it to the pastor.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER VII

MARRIAGE OF CONSCIENCE

CAN. 1104

Nonnisi ex gravissima et urgentissima causa et ab ipso loci Ordinario, excluso Vicario Generali sine speciali mandato, permitti potest ut matrimonium conscientiae ineatur, idest matrimonium celebretur omissis denuntiationibus et secreto, ad normam canonum qui sequuntur.

CAN. 1105

Permissio celebrationis matrimonii conscientiae secumfert promissionem et gravem obligationem secreti servandi ex parte sacerdotis assistentis, testium, Ordinarii eiusque successorum, et etiam alterius coniugis, altero non consentiente divulgationi.

CAN. 1106

Huius promissionis obligatio ex parte Ordinarii non extenditur ad casum quo vel aliquod scandalum aut gravis erga matrimonii sanctitatem iniuria ex secreti observantia immineat, vel parentes non curent filios ex tali matrimonio susceptos baptizari aut eos baptizandos curent falsis expressis nominibus, quin interim Ordinario intra triginta dies notitiam prolis susceptae et baptizatae cum sincera indicatione parentum praebeant, vel christianam liberorum educationem negligant.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1107

Matrimonium conscientiae non est adnotandum in consueto matrimoniorum ac baptizatorum libro, sed in peculiari libro servando in secreto Curiae archivo de quo in can. 379.

It is evident from these canons that a "marriage of conscience" is not the same as a clandestine marriage, although it may be called, as the Summa Godfredi says,[1] a sort of clandestine contract because it is contracted without any solemnities. In France, clandestine marriages were those which, though according to the Tridentine form, were contracted without the consent of the parents. To these refers the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Satis vobis," Nov. 17, 1741, which is the chief source of our Code in this matter.

A "marriage of conscience" is one contracted without the publication of the banns and in secret, but not without the formalities prescribed by the Church. The following canons plainly show that a priest and witnesses are supposed to be present. The Code says that no one but the Ordinary of the diocese, or his vicar-general if he has received a special commission ad hoc from the bishop, may permit such a marriage, for most weighty and urgent réasons only. Such reasons may be the following: if two live together unsuspectedly as married though they were never married;[2] if the civil law imposes conditions injurious to the freedom of marriage, if the civil power interferes with the liberty, e. g., of soldiers, or if disgrace and discord would be likely to follow from iniquitous laws impeding marriage.[3] There may be, as Benedict

1 Cf. Esmein, l. c., p. 182.

2 "Satis vobis," § 6: "in figura matrimonii degentes," really, in concubinage.

3 Instructio S. C. P. F., 1758 (Coll., n. 571). This was the case in Curaçao, where the Dutch Governor imposed a penalty of 50

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

XIV says, other reasons, but whatever they are, they must be very grave and serious in order to outweigh the great evils resulting from secret marriages. These evils are: easy divorce, danger of concubinage and polygamy, spiritual and temporal ruin of the offspring.[4]

Can. 1105 describes the pledge of secrecy thus: the permission for such a marriage implies a promise and the strict obligation of secrecy on the part of the assisting priest, of the witnesses, of the Ordinary and his successors, as well as on the part of the one contracting party, as long as the other will not consent to the divulgation of the marriage. It would be safest to put all these parties, with the exception of the Ordinary, under oath. As to the contracting parties themselves, it is evident that both must consent, because marriage is a bilateral contract.

Can. 1106 relieves the Ordinary of the obligation of secrecy in two cases: if secrecy would cause scandal or grave injury to the sanctity of marriage, or if the spiritual ruin of the children were threatened. The first condition would be present if the community had become aware of the fact that no public marriage had taken place between the parties. The sanctity of marriage would be imperilled if infidelity to the marriage vows or divorce would ensue. The children's welfare would suffer if the parents would not have them baptized, or if they had them baptized under fictitious names, because in the latter case the children's legitimacy and their right to inherit the property of their parents would be jeopardized. Therefore the parents are obliged, and should promise in writing, to send to the Ordinary, within thirty days, notice florins for marrying before a pastor. Cfr. Leo XIII, "Il divisamento," Feb. 8, 1893.

4 "Satis vobis," § 2 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the birth of a child and of its baptism. The parents may use fictitious names, says Benedict XIV, if only the Ordinary is informed that the child is verily theirs, that it is legitimate, and has been baptized.[5] Finally the Ordinary is not obliged to secrecy if the parents neglect the Christian education of their children.

Can. 1107 enjoins distinct and secret recording. A marriage of conscience should never be entered in the regular marriage records nor should note be made thereof in the common baptismal record, but in a special book which must be kept in the secret archives of the diocesan court, mentioned in can. 379. It should be a sealed book, to be opened only when another such marriage is to be recorded.[6] This suffices to show the seriousness with which the legislator wishes to see matters of this kind treated. For the rest, where civil marriage is prescribed, "marriages of conscience" will be rare.

[5] "Satis vobis," § 11. [6] Ibid, § 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VIII

TIME AND PLACE OF MARRIAGE CEREMONIES

CAN. 1108

THE TIME

§ 1. Matrimonium quolibet anni tempore contrahi potest.

§ 2. Sollemnis tantum nuptiarum benedictio vetatur a prima dominica Adventus usque ad diem Nativitatis Domini inclusive, et a feria IV Cinerum usque ad dominicam Paschatis inclusive.

§ 3. Ordinarii tamen locorum possunt, salvis legibus liturgicis, etiam praedictis temporibus eam permittere ex iusta causa, monitis sponsis ut a nimia pompa abstineant.

1. Marriages may be contracted at any time of the year. This, says Clement III, was the custom of the Roman Church. However, taking marriage as a solemn nuptial contract, says the same Pontiff, it is customary that from Septuagesima Sunday to the Octave of Pentecost such a solemnity be not performed.[1] Add to this period the time of Advent, and the former forbidden times are described. But, as the same Pope says, the mere matrimonial contract (consensu interveniente legitime de praesenti) may be entered into at any time.

2. Section two says that the solemn nuptial blessing

1 C. 4, X, II, 9, de feriis; cfr. Bern. Pap., l. c., p. 303; Tancred, l. c., p. 69.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

may not be imparted from the first Sunday of Advent to Christmas, inclusive, and from Ash Wednesday to Easter Sunday, inclusive.[2]

3. However, the bishops may, for good reasons, permit solemn weddings even during the forbidden seasons, provided the liturgical rules be observed and the parties admonished to refrain from too great pomp. Whether the reasons are sufficient the bishop must judge.[3] A sufficient reason would be if the pastor visits a mission only at rare intervals or the couple lives at a great distance from church;[4] also the sudden departure of a soldier for the barracks or battlefield. The Code is very moderate and benign in this matter, which is evident also from the fact that forbidden times no longer figure among the prohibitive impediments. But if the Church is condescending, she expects the faithful to make proper use of her kindness, and hence the parties should be admonished to refrain from too much pomp, which would not be in keeping with the spirit of the season. Thus noisy banquets, balls or dances would hardly be permissible. Formerly the traductio sponsae pomposa, the solemn induction of the bride into the home of the bridegroom, was also forbidden;[5] but now-a-days such a pompous ceremony with pipers and singers and a choir of boys and girls is no longer customary, except in Slavic countries.

2 Formerly from the first Sunday of Advent to Epiphany (Jan. 6), and from Ash Wednesday to Low Sunday; cfr. Trid., sess. 24, c. 10, de ref. mat.

3 S. C. P. F., June 31, 1796 (Coll., n. 631).

4 Ibid.

5 Cfr. cc. 2, 3, 5, C. 33, q. 4; the consummation of marriage was also forbidden; cfr. Tancred, p. 69.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE PLACE

CAN. 1109

§ 1. Matrimonium inter Catholicos celebretur in ecclesia paroeciali; in alia autem ecclesia vel oratorio sive publico sive semi-publico, nonnisi de licentia Ordinarii loci vel parochi celebrari poterit.

§ 2. Matrimonium in aedibus privatis celebrari Ordinarii locorum in extraordinario tantum aliquo casu et accedente semper iusta ac rationabili causa permittere possunt; sed in ecclesiis vel oratoriis sive Seminarii sive religiosarum, Ordinarii id ne permittant, nisi urgente necessitate, ac opportunis adhibitis cautelis.

§ 3. Matrimonia vero inter partem catholicam et partem acatholicam extra ecclesiam celebrentur; quod si Ordinarius prudenter iudicet id servari non posse quin graviora oriantur mala, prudenti eius arbitrio committitur hac super re dispensare, firmo tamen praescripto can. 1102, § 2.

1. All marriages between Catholics should be celebrated in the parish church. If another church or oratory, either public or semi-public, is preferred, the permission of the Ordinary or pastor should be obtained. Although the bishops might insert the first clause of this text in their diocesan or provincial statutes, it would be wiser to follow the example of the second Provincial Council of St. Louis (1868), which enjoins pastors to exhort the faithful to get married in church.[6] For the common law grants the faithful the right of petitioning the pastor to marry outside the parish church. Therefore the whole canon would have to be inserted in the statutes. But the celebration of marriage outside the parish church is permitted only in churches and public or semi-public oratories situated within the limits of the parish in which the pastor can licitly and validly assist. Of course, unless the pastor would be subject to the rector of the church or oratory who would possess full parochial power, the marriage would have to be performed by the competent pastor or his delegate. Note that either the Ordinary or the pastor may grant permission.

[6] Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. I, p. 276, n. 183, is very rigorous on this point, but probably he would now modify his view; Coll. Lac., III, 319, n. 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. § 2 limits the power of granting permission to the Ordinary of the diocese, if in some extraordinary case there be a just and plausible reason for allowing a marriage to be celebrated in a private house. Such a reason would be illness or any "praiseworthy reason," for instance, if a benefactor of the diocese or parish has a private chapel in his home, the bishop or his vicar-general, but not the pastor, may grant permission. In such cases the nuptial Mass may be said in a private chapel according to the rubrics.[7]

In churches or oratories of seminaries or of women religious the Ordinary should not grant permission for marriages to be celebrated, except in cases of urgent necessity, and then only with proper precautions. What these precautions are may be surmised. The religious should not be disturbed in their discipline, and the seminarians should suffer no disturbance, and hence neither religious women nor seminarians should be allowed indiscriminately to witness the marriage ceremony.

3. Marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics are to be performed outside the church. However, should the Ordinary in his discretion be convinced that evil might follow from the observance of this law, he may dispense

7 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1872 (Decreta Auth., n. 3265): where there is no chapel, an altar should be erected if Mass is to be said.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google from it, provided can. 1102, § 2, be strictly observed.

"Extra ecclesiam," outside the church, means outside the body of the Church, but does not exclude the sacristy, in which, therefore, a mixed marriage may be celebrated.[8] As a general rule such marriages are performed in the rectory, and this custom is not only safe but very proper. For the rest we refer to can. 1102, which describes the "greater evils."

The reasons why the Church treats mixed marriages so severely are stated in an Instruction of the Secretariate of State, 1858, which says that Catholics should never forget that the Church abhors such marriages and never ceases to deter the faithful from them because they are injurious to the salvation of the contracting parties themselves as well as of their offspring.

8 S. O., Jan. 17, 1877, quoted by De Smet (l. c., p. 346). This decision, besides the sacristy, also admits a chapel in the church, without the candles lighted or any special adornments.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IX

THE EFFECTS OF MARRIAGE

CAN. 1110

Ex valido matrimonio enascitur inter coniuges vinculum natura sua perpetuum et exclusivum; matrimonium praeterea christianum coniugibus non ponentibus obicem gratiam confert.

Valid marriage unites the contracting parties by a bond which is of its very nature perpetual and exclusive; Christian matrimony moreover imparts sacramental grace to husband and wife if they place no obstacle in its way.

After what has been said under can. 1002, no further explanation is needed. The marital contract, or matrimonium in fieri, is the consent duly given according to the form prescribed by the Church. This contract produces certain natural effects, viz.: indissolubility and unity. These two innate qualities, if we may so call them, are attached to every valid marriage, not only to a union between Christians,[1] though they receive additional dignity and firmness from the fact that Christian matrimony has been raised to the dignity of a sacrament. Therefore also Christian marriage has a special grace attached to it, which attends every Christian marriage, provided the contracting parties are in the state of sanctifying grace. If they are not in the state of grace at the moment they give the marital consent, the sacra-

1 Leo XIII, "Arcanum," Feb. 10, 1880

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

mental grace is conferred as soon as the obstacle is removed, because the bond is lasting (vinculum perdurans). It is, therefore, advisable and greatly to be recommended that the parties make a good confession before marriage, although there is neither a divine nor an ecclesiastical law that enforces this pious practice.[2]

MUTUAL RIGHTS AND DUTIES

CAN. 1111

Utrique coniugi ab ipso matrimonio initio aequum ius et officium est quod attinet ad actus proprios coniugalis vitae.

Husband and wife, from the moment when the marriage is contracted, have equal rights and duties concerning the acts pertaining to the conjugal life.

This follows from the primary end or purpose of marriage, which is the propagation of the human race and the education of offspring. To this end, as stated under can. 1013, the two other purposes of matrimony, mutual aid and the allaying of concupiscence, are subordinate.

This primary end, however, cannot be obtained without conjugal intercourse (debitum coniugale). Hence to the right of demanding that debitum there must necessarily correspond the obligation of rendering it. And since marriage is a bilateral contract, right and obligation are equal in both parties.[3] It may, of course, happen that one party is deprived of the right of demanding the debitum; in that case the other is not obliged to render it. Two cases are mentioned which may suspend or take away the right of demanding the debitum: vow and adultery.

2 Cfr. De Smet, l. c., pp. 137 f.
3 Cfr. I Cor. 7, 3; c. 24, C. 217, q. 2; c. 3, 4, C. 32, q. 2 (these texts rather savor of rigorism).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The vow here understood is one which would render the marriage illicit. Hence two vows only of those mentioned in can. 1058 refer to the debitum, viz.: the vow of virginity and that of perfect chastity.[4] Concerning the vow of virginity it must be said that the party obliged by it is not allowed to demand the debitum, but is bound to render it, unless he or she has lost that right. But after the consummation of the marriage by the conjugal act, the object of this vow is completely gone, and therefore the party formerly bound by the vow may after consummation also demand the debitum.

As to the vow of perfect chastity, the party bound by it is not allowed to demand the debitum, but is obliged to render it as long as the other party has not forfeited that right. Therefore this vow, unless dispensed from, lasts throughout marriage, but the right to the copula is not radically taken away by it, nor on the other hand is the right of the party not bound by the vow affected, so that the party bound by the vow may licitly render the debitum.

It may happen that one wishes to make a vow of chastity after marriage has been contracted and consummated,—perhaps for a number of years. Such a vow may only be made in two cases: (a) if the other party consents or (b) has forever lost the right of demanding the debitum. Concerning (a) note that no vow made by fraud, compulsion or threat, or in a state of melancholic depression, can take away the right to conjugal intercourse.[5] Mutual consent alone can render such a vow lawful and valid. (b) The right of demanding the debi-

4 The vow of celibacy does not pertain to the subject, because, after one is married, it practically ceases and has no influence on the conjugal rights.

5 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, 8, 17, X, III, 32.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tum is forfeited by adultery,[6] as commonly understood, not by "spiritual adultery," such as heresy or apostasy, which have been stretched by some authors [7] as incurring this penalty. Note that adultery, whether incestuous or simple, entails the loss of the marital right only after judicial sentence of separation has been rendered.[8] This is very reasonable, because otherwise one party might suffer from hallucinations on the part of the other. As the ecclesiastical judge renders the sentence, so he is also entitled to restore the right to the debitum. From the vow of perfect and perpetual chastity, however, the Apostolic See alone can dispense.[9] If the vow was public, the S. C. of the Sacraments is the competent authority; if it was secret, the S. Poenitentiaria. Since the faculties granted by the latter to our bishops are not abolished, they may be made use of until further decisions.[10] The vow of virginity is not reserved.

If any doubt exists concerning the validity of a marriage, the party who is certain of the existence of an invalidating impediment is not allowed to ask the debitum, but must render it to the party who is not aware of the obstacle. If, however, the doubt has little probability and rather amounts to a scruple, the first-mentioned party may not only render, but also demand, the debitum.[11]

A juridical question may arise from the texts of the Decretals [12] which command a party to render the debitum to the other party when afflicted by leprosy or some 6 All the texts of the Decree and Decretals (c. 9, X, IV, 1) refer to the fornicationis causa.

7 Cfr. De Smet, l. c., p. 166, note 5.

8 C. 2, X, II, 16; what we state above is based upon a careful collation of all the texts.

9 Can. 1309.

10 S. C. Conc., April 25, 1918.

11 Cfr. c. 2, X, IV, 21; c. 44, X, V, 39.

12 Cfr. cc. 1, 2, X, IV, 8, quoted by Card. Gasparri.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other serious or contagious disease. Is this law binding on the party not afflicted with such disease? The Decretals would seem to imply that it is, but modern theologians and canonists [13] take the negative view. It must be added, however, that, though this latter opinion may safely be followed in the court of conscience, the strict right cannot be denied, and the texts quoted prove how rigorously mutual right and duty must be taken. But the case of actual drunkenness must be excepted, because such a state is neither, properly speaking, human, nor fit for a human act like the debitum, and, besides, may prove injurious to offspring.

With regard to the mode of performing the debitum we only add that it must correspond with the primary end of marriage. Husband and wife are, per se, allowed the copula only for the purpose of bringing forth children. Yet this purpose need not be exclusively and positively held in view. It is sufficient that it be not positively excluded. Hence married persons need not trouble themselves with scruples as to the right intention, as long as they do not employ unlawful means to prevent conception and perform the marital act in accordance with the laws of nature. The conjugal relation finally requires that the spouses live together in a common home, unless there are reasons excusing them from this obligation; [14] on which see chapter X.

13 De Smet, l. c., p. 171.

14 Cfr. c. 8, X, II, 13; c. 9, X, IV, 1; cc. 1, 2, X, IV, 8 — from which we must conclude that a long and unjustified absence of one party from home is a violation of the rights of the other.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RIGHTS OF THE WIFE

CAN. 1112

Nisi iure speciali aliud cautum sit, uxor, circa canonicos effectus, particeps efficitur status mariti.

Unless otherwise provided by special laws, the wife partakes of the state of her husband as far as canonical effects are concerned.

Since the wife becomes not the slave or handmaid of her husband, but his consort, companion, and helpmate, it is but natural that she should share his canonical status. This is practically expressed by the domicile, which she has in common with her husband, as long as no separation has taken place.[15] Besides, she may follow the rite or liturgical worship of her husband [16] and choose her burial place; if she does not select a special place (vault, family-grave), she is to be buried in the cemetery of her husband; in case she has had several husbands, the last one's burial place is also hers.[17] Concerning titles of rank, nobility or honor, the Church leaves it to civil law to determine the wife's status, though she rather favors equality.[18] Of special regulations of the Church as to different rights we know nothing.

But the Church does maintain the perfectly natural theory that the wife is subject to her husband [19] in lawful matters, and even grants him the power of paternal correction, to be exercised, however, with moderation, which excludes violence.[20] The old English law permitted a husband to scourge or whip his errant wife.[21] The hus-

15 Can. 93; c. 3, C. 13, q. 2; c. 4, C. 34, q. 1 et 2.

16 Can. 98, § 4.

17 C. 3, § 1, 6°, III, 12.

18 C. 12, C. 32, q. 2; c. 1, X, IV, 1.

19 I Cor. 11, 3; Eph. 5, 22; Col. 3, 18; c. 12–16, C. 33, q. 5.

20 Cc. 6, 10, C. 33, q. 2 (which permits a fast to be dictated).

21 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., I, 444.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

band may also nullify private vows of his wife which interfere with his own lawful rights, as St. Augustine says.[22] Of course this must be understood of private vows which are not reserved, as vows of abstinence, pilgrimages or devotions which would interfere with household or marital duties.[23]

The husband has the duty of providing his wife with the necessaries of life, which the civil law further details.[24] From this it may be seen how the Church stands with regard to the "emancipation" of women.

DUTIES OF PARENTS TOWARDS THEIR CHILDREN

CAN. 1113

Parentes gravissima obligatione tenentur prolis educationem tum religiosam et moralem, tum physicam et civilem pro viribus curandi, et etiam temporali eorum bono providendi.

Parents are under the gravest kind of obligation to provide to the best of their ability for the religious and moral as well as the physical and civil education of their children, and for their temporal well-being.

This law, natural as it is, is based upon the fact that not only the procreation, but also the education of children belongs to the primary end of marriage. That the religious part is named first should not cause surprise in a Code of ecclesiastical laws. First comes Baptism and then instruction in Christian doctrine. The moral education must tend towards the formation of a firm and upright character by word and example. The physical education begins in the mother's womb and must be con-

22 C. 16, C. 33, q. 5.
23 Gratian, ad c. 20, C. 33, q. 5.
24 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., I, 442.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tinued throughout the stages of childhood and youth.[25] The civil training consists in teaching the children civic and social virtues, especially obedience to authority, justice, honesty, and patriotism.[26] Political knowledge may be reserved for later years and should be directed chiefly to teaching youth to abhor crookedness and graft, which corrode our body politic. We need not here recall the serious instruction of the Holy Office of Nov. 24, 1875, to the bishops of United States in the matter of public schools, of which the title on schools will offer a better opportunity to speak.

LEGITIMACY OF CHILDREN

CAN. 1114

Legitimi sunt filii concepti aut nati ex matrimonio valido vel putativo, nisi parentibus ob solemnem professionem religiosam vel susceptum ordinem sacrum prohibitus tempore conceptionis fuerit usus matrimonii antea contracti.

CAN. 1115

§ 1. Pater is est quem iustae nuptiae demonstrant, nisi evidentibus argumentis contrarium probetur.

§ 2. Legitimi praesumuntur filii qui nati sunt saltem post sex menses a die celebrati matrimonii, vel intra decem menses a die dissolutae vitae coniugalis.

The four canons 1114–1117 are intimately connected, the first two describing the signs of legitimacy by wedlock

25 Sound and moderate physical culture and a little more Spartan-like education would inure our children to hardships and toil, and the cultivation of the social life in the farming districts might prevent the flight to the cities.

26 Cfr. Leo XIII, "Arcanum," 1880; "Humanum genus," 1884; "Sapientiae christianae"; "Rerum novarum," 1891; "Graves de communi, 1901.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and marriage, the other two concerning legitimation. Taking marriage as the lawful basis and principle, can. 1114 states that "those children are legitimate who are conceived or born in valid or putative wedlock." This law favors the offspring, for it supposes that a child may be conceived out of lawful wedlock, and yet be legitimate if his parents were married at the time of his birth. But legitimacy always requires a marriage, whether certainly or putatively valid. A marriage is certainly valid if contracted without an invalidating impediment and according to the form prescribed by the Church. A putatively valid marriage is one contracted with due observance of the prescribed form, but with an invalidating impediment, the existence of which is unknown to one of the parties. This case, of course, occurred more frequently, the more impediments were set up in course of time. Hence it was found necessary, since the time of Magister Rolandus,[27] to regard the offspring of such invalid marriages as legitimate. But good faith is strictly required,[28] and is assumed until sentence against the validity is given by competent authority. Hence children born out of such wedlock would be held legitimate even if the ecclesiastical court would afterwards annul the marriage.[29]

This holds true concerning any ecclesiastical impediment except clandestinity.[30] But there are two further exceptions made in our canon: (a) if one with solemn religious vows, before taking those vows,[31] contracts a valid marriage and proceeds to consummate the same, the 27 Summa Magistri Rolandi, ed. Thaner, p. 231 f.

28 Ignorantia affectata would not be an excuse; c. 10, X, IV, 17.

29 Cc. 2, 8, X, IV, 17.

30 C. 3, X, IV, 3; c. 14, X, IV, 17.

31 For, if he would have taken solemn vows before marriage, he could not validly have contracted marriage.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fruit of such consummation being a child, this child would be illegitimate.[32] (b) If one in higher orders who had been married and with the consent of his wife (now by apostolic dispensation) received holy orders would consummate the marriage thus contracted, the offspring would be illegitimate.[33] These two exceptions presuppose an illegitimate use of a validly contracted marriage. A fortiori the same effect would be produced in case a religious with solemn vows or a cleric in higher orders had offspring with a concubine.

A distinction must therefore be made between different classes of illegitimate children.

1) Natural are those who are born of parents between whom either at the time of the conception or birth of the child a valid marriage could exist;

2) Spurious are those born of parents between whom at no time a valid marriage could exist. These latter are:

a) Adulterous, if born of parents one of whom was at the time lawfully wedded to another;

b) Sacrilegious, if born of parents who are bound by solemn religious vows or in sacred orders;

c) Incestuous, if born of an incestuous relation between persons legally related either by consanguinity or affinity in the collateral line.

d) Nefarious, if born of parents related in the direct line, e. g., of a father and his daughter.

Prohibitive impediments can never render a child illegitimate.[34]

After laying down this general rule, the legislator explains how the fact of legitimacy can be proved or at least naturally presumed.

32 Cfr. c. 15, X, I, 17.

33 Cfr. cc. 1, 2, 14, X, I, 17.

34 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, p. 586, n. 680. Simple religious vows (except those of the Jesuits) and those mentioned in can. 1058 do not affect the legitimacy of children.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1115 states in the first section: He whom marriage points out as such must be considered the father, unless the contrary is evident. This is nothing else but a praesumptio iuris. The law naturally supposes that children are the fruit of legal unions, not of adultery or fornication; and since the mother can be proved by the birth, whereas the father's coöperation is hidden in obscurity, the law must suppose the child to be a lawful issue. Such the Roman law,[35] from which our text is taken, justly supposed. As long, therefore, as the contrary is not evidently proved, a child belongs to the father whose consort has brought him forth. The proof always lies with him who denies or doubts his legitimacy. If the validity of a marriage is clearly established by the ecclesiastical record, every child born of that marriage is presumed to be legitimate, unless there is strict proof to the contrary. There are only two ways to prove the contrary: absence of the spouses from each other and impotency. A third is hardly imaginable.[36] The absence must be proved by trustworthy witnesses under oath; impotency is a subject of medical examination.

§ 2 adds that "children born at least six months after the date of a marriage, or within ten months after the rupture of conjugal intercourse, are presumed to be legitimate." Here again the Roman[37] law has been adopted, with some modification as to the number of months. For the Roman law assumed seven months, on the authority of Hippocrates, who maintained that after that time a complete birth was possible. Note the term presumed; strict evidence would upset this presumption.

A dissolutio vitae coniugalis, or rupture of conjugal

35 Cfr. l. 5, Dig. II, 4, ll. 12, 19, 23, Dig. I, 5.

36 S. C. C., Aug. 9, 1884 (A. S. S., Vol. XVII, 378 ff.); not even a baptismal record was accepted as proof against the child's legitimacy.

37 L. 12, Dig. I, 5; l. 29, pr. Dig. 28, 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

life, may be brought about by a complete separation sanctioned by the ecclesiastical judge or by a declaration of nullity.[38] We may add that the question of legitimacy belongs to the ecclesiastical judge, whose sentence should be respected by the civil court.[39]

LEGITIMATION OF CHILDREN

CAN. 1116

Per subsequens parentum matrimonium sive verum sive putativum, sive noviter contractum sive convalidatum, etiam non consummatum, legitima efficitur proles, dummodo parentes habiles exstiterint ad matrimonium inter se contrahendum tempore conceptionis, vel praegnationis, vel nativitatis.

CAN. 1117

Filii legitimati per subsequens matrimonium, ad effectus canonicos quod attinet, in omnibus aequiparantur legitimis, nisi aliud expresse cautum fuerit.

Offspring is legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents, be that marriage contracted validly or putatively, either by a new contract or by revalidation, though not consummated, provided the parents were capable of contracting marriage between themselves either at the time of conception, or of pregnancy, or of birth.

The underlying idea of legitimation, which the Roman law [40] granted as a sort of adoption, and in virtue of the parental power, is here transparent and, we may say, "canonized." The English law is not so lenient, because it considers all children born before matrimony as bas-

[38] C. 2, X, IV, 17.
[39] C. 12, X, IV, 17; Trid., sess. 24, c. 12, de ref. mat.
[40] Cfr. § 13, Inst. I, 10; ll. 6, 10, Cod. V, 27.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tards. But even English law does not bastardize a child if it be born (though not begotten) in lawful wedlock, provided the parties married within a few months thereafter.[41] Our Missouri law says: "If a man, having by a woman a child or children, shall afterwards intermarry with her, and shall recognize such child or children to be his, they shall thereby be legitimate."[42] What our text (can. 1116) provides is as follows:

1. A subsequent marriage, i. e., contracted after the birth of the offspring, has the power to render legitimate what would otherwise be considered illegitimate. Marriage has that power, although only by virtue of positive legislation.[43] Consequently ecclesiastical law requires the consent neither of the parents nor of the child. Nor does it, like our Missouri law, demand a formal act of recognition.

2. A marriage may be either valid on both sides, or putative because of an impediment on one side, unknown to the other.[44] Besides, a marriage may be newly contracted or revalidated by the renewal of consent. Now such a marriage need not follow immediately the birth of the offspring. If a woman would marry a man other than the one of whom she had conceived a child, and after her husband's death would marry the father of her child, the latter would be legitimate by virtue of the second marriage.[45] If a woman had a child from a man before marriage, and then married that man, but never consummated the marriage, the child would be legitimate.

3. One condition must, however, be added, viz., that the parents were capable of contracting a marriage at any

41 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., I, 454.
42 Revised Statutes of Missouri, 1899, sect. 2917.
43 C. 6, X, IV, 17; Bened. XIV, "Redditae Nobis," Sept. 17, 1746, § 39.
44 Reiffenstuel, IV, 17, n. 35 f.
45 Ibid., n. 40.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the three stages mentioned: conception, pregnancy, birth. Therefore, if an impediment existed at the time a child was begotten, but was removed by dispensation before he was born, the child is legitimate.

4. The question arises whether natural and spurious children are legitimated by a subsequent marriage of the parents. Observe, first, that the offspring must belong to that couple and not to a different man or woman. To speak concretely: if Gemma had a child from James and would marry John, this marriage would not legitimate the child begotten from James, unless, of course, Gemma would after the marriage with John marry James. The question proper is about spurious children of all kinds, whether they may be legitimated by subsequent marriage, and more especially concerning an adulterine child. This case is mentioned in the Decretals [46] and elaborately expounded by Benedict XIV in his letter to the archbishop of San Domingo.[47] Gemma was lawfully married to James, but had intercourse with John during her marriage, the fruit of which intercourse was Emma. Would Emma be legitimated by a subsequent marriage of Gemma and John? Answer: If James dies before Emma is born and Gemma marries John sometime after Emma's birth, Emma is legitimated by that marriage, because at the moment of her birth both Gemma and John were capable of contracting marriage. Therefore, though conceived in adultery, Emma was born in lawful wedlock and hence cannot be called an adulterine offspring.[48] It is supposed, of course, that no impediment of crime in-

46 C. 6, X, IV, 17.

47 "Redditae Nobis," Dec. 5, 1744; § 2 ff. is a fine specimen of canonical ésprit and lore.

48 C. 6, X, IV, 17, is not contradictory, for it mentions proles susceptа, which in canonical language means birth or baptism, as Reiffenstuel (IV, 17, n. 40) justly remarks. Therefore we are unable to grasp the argument of Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, p. 595, n. 686.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

terfered. The answer applies to all ecclesiastical impediments. If the impediment was removed at the moment of birth, the child is legitimate. This seems to us the logical explanation of our canon, and it is borne out by the letter of Benedict XIV referred to.

Can. 1117 mentions the canonical effects of legitimation. Legitimated children partake of all the effects granted by Canon Law, unless the latter makes special exceptions. These canonical effects concern especially the capacity of being ordained without a dispensation and obtaining ecclesiastical benefices and appointments, also certain prelatures of inferior rank. The cardinalate [49] and the episcopacy [50] are excepted.

An additional remark: The Code does not mention another mode of legitimation, which was formerly in vogue and is always referred to by canonists, viz., by papal rescript. The Pope can legitimate not only natural, but also spurious children, and the extent of a papal rescript on this subject has to be interpreted according to the general rules. Although the Code is silent about this mode of legitimation, there is no doubt that the Pope may issue such a rescript as far as canonical effects [51] are concerned. Besides, can. 1043 f. permit a legitimation in certain cases, which may be applied by the Ordinary or the pastor or any priest. Otherwise the faculty is given by the S. C. Sac. pro foro externo.

49 Sixtus V, "Ad Romanum," Oct. 21, 1588, § 3; can. 232, § 2, n. 1.

50 Can. 331, § 1, n. 1.

51 C. 13, X, IV, 17, which, however, refers to the Papal States, and must therefore be interpreted accordingly.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER X

SEPARATION OF MARRIED COUPLES

ART. I

DISSOLUTION OF THE MATRIMONIAL BOND

CAN. 1118

RATIFIED AND CONSUMMATED MARRIAGES INDISSOLUBLE

Matrimonium validum ratum et consummatum nulla humana potestate nullaque causa, praeterquam morte, dissolvi potest.

A valid Christian marriage, which has been consummated, can not be dissolved by any human authority or for any reason except by death.

To what has been said under can. 1013 there is little to be added. The indissolubility of a consummated Christian marriage (ratum et consummatum) was defended since at least the tenth century. Before that time we find some canons of particular synods, like those of Vermery (1752) and Compiègne (1757) which might be interpreted in the sense of a mitigated divorce.[1] The Penitential Books do not distinguish clearly between simultaneous and successive polygamy.[2] It is probable that the bishops could not strictly enforce the Christian ideal of marriage among semi-barbarous tribes. The case

1 Verm. Syn., cc. 5, 9; Comp., cc. 6, 9, 16.

2 Wasserschleben, Die Bussord., pp. 148, 197.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proposed by St. Boniface and solved by Gregory II, in 726, looks like an accommodation to the circumstances of a newly converted country and is perhaps the first example of a solution of an unconsummated marriage by papal intervention.[3] A somewhat wavering attitude in matters of indissolubility is still noticeable at the time of Alexander III (1159–1181), who mentions diverse customs. However, it is evident that, though "some Roman Pontiffs appeared to think differently," their decisions never partook of the nature of an infallible decree or a dogmatic definition.[4]

After the twelfth century, however, the dissentient voices are hushed, and the indissolubility of a valid Christian marriage which had been perfected in its typical significance by the conjugal act, was strenuously defended.[5] Besides the cases brought before the Roman Pontiffs by Lothair (855–869), Philip I (1060–1108), Philip Augustus (1180–1223), Charles V (1364–1380) by the King of Aragon under Clement IV, by Henry VIII of England, and finally the famous case of Napoleon I under Pius VII, should convince any unbiased student of the firmness of the Apostolic See in this important matter.

The canon says: by no human power may such a marriage be dissolved. This comprises the Apostolic See also, as the Pope is the supreme lawgiver in matters purely ecclesiastical. But the canon is intended as a silent rebuke and reminder to the civil power, which has nearly everywhere made laws favoring divorce.

3 C. 18, C. 32, q. 7; Zehetbauer, Das K.-R. bei Bonifatius, 1910, p. 128.

4 Summa Magistri Rolandi, ed. Thaner, pp. 14, 187, 200; c. 3, X, IV, 4; Summa Bernard. Pap., ed. Laspeyres, p. 298; Wernz, l. c., IV, p. 525 (1 ed.).

5 Bened. XII, ann. 1341, prop. 102 Armen. damn.; Trid., sess. 24, can. 7, de sacr. mat.; Leo XIII, "Arcanum," Feb. 10, 1880.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1119

MATRIMONIUM RATUM

Matrimonium non consummatum inter baptizatos vel inter partem baptizatam et partem non baptizatam, dissolvitur tum ipso iure per sollemnem professionem religiosam, tum per dispensationem a Sede Apostolica ex iusta causa concessam, utraque parte rogante vel alterutra, etsi altera sit invita.

An unconsummated marriage between two baptized persons, or between a baptized and a non-baptized person, is dissolved by solemn religious profession and by a dispensation granted by the Apostolic See for a just cause, if requested by both parties, or by only one, even though against the will of the other.

The historical development concerning religious profession and papal dispensation was uneven, the former being acknowledged earlier than the latter. The school of Paris opposed the school of Bologna with regard to the firmness of the matrimonial tie.[6] The latter maintained that a ratified but unconsummated marriage was destitute of the sacramental character and therefore liable to dissolution. The school of Paris ascribed the sacramental character and indissolubility to the matrimonium ratum tantum. Alexander III, as Magister Rolandus, adhered to the Bologna theory, but as Roman Pontiff paved the way for a golden mean by upholding the sacramental and truly contractual character of a ratified marriage, and at the same time maintaining the possibility of a dissolution of such a marriage by reason of a vow, affinity succeeding marriage, or complete mental 6 Cfr. Esmein, l. c., p. 95 ff.; Freisen, l. c., p. 190 ff.; De Smet, p. 227 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

estrangement.[7] The religious vow was formally acknowledged by the former Master in the well-known Decretal "Ex publico" (c. 7, X, III, 32) and was, though perhaps reluctantly, sanctioned by Innocent XII, A. D. 1210.[8]

Not quite so rapid was the acknowledgment of the papal power of dispensing from a ratified marriage. For before the beginning of the fifteenth century there are no papal documents to be found which refer to a dispensation in the case of a merely ratified marriage. Yet it may safely be maintained that some canonists (though not the theologians), recognized papal authority in casu.[9] This was done at the reunion councils of Lyons (II) and Florence, and in a decree of the Tridentine Council.[10] The Greeks were more inclined to admit divorce because of fornication, and prompt to accuse the Latin Church of excessive rigor. After the Council of Trent papal dispensations from such marriages are not rare, as the decisions of the S. C. Concilii sufficiently prove.

The Code says: (1) that a marriage which is only ratified, but not consummated, may be dissolved. Hence the fact of non-consummation must be proved, which requires a special procedure.[11] Note that consummation here means the conjugal act in the married state; a fornicarious intercourse before marriage is not styled consummation, but the copula must be repeated after marriage.

(2) The marriage may be contracted either between two baptized persons or between one baptized and the other not baptized. There is no further species mentioned, as for instance, a legitimate marriage, i.e., one contracted lawfully between two non-baptized persons.

7 Compil. I, cc. 4, 5, X, IV, 4; c. X, III, 32; c. 2, X, IV, 13.

8 C. 14, X, III, 32; Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, p. 605 f.; n. 696.

9 De Smet, l. c., p. 229.

10 Sess. 24, can. 7, de sac. mat.

11 Cfr. can. 1960–1992; Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 619.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Is the following case included? James and Gemma married lawfully whilst both were not yet baptized, and consummated their marriage. Later, Gemma was baptized (in the Catholic Church), and the marriage between her and James was not consummated after her Baptism. We are aware of the controversy which exists among authors on this point. The wording of our text excludes neither opinion. Some say that the marriage in question was consummated, and consummation affects the whole marriage, as long as the bond lasts, because consummation, whether before or after Baptism, signifies the union between Christ and his Church through the Incarnation, and a union thus perfected is not weaker than a ratified marriage between baptized persons. Besides there are no instances in which the Roman Pontiff dispensed from a consummated marriage of infidels who were afterwards converted.[12] Thus the champions of the negative opinion. The defenders of the affirmative view employ exactly the opposite arguments. They say that a ratified marriage between Christians constitutes a stronger tie (fortius vinculum) than a consummated marriage between infidels. But when they are asked to produce documents proving that the popes exercised their power in such cases, they stretch the words of papal decisions. We rather incline to deny the power of dissolving in such cases. What, we may ask, is wanting to such a marriage? Baptism alone is wanting in the order of ratification. After Baptism you may as well call it ratum et consummatum, since the lawful consummation cannot be undone by Baptism. Yet we must confess that the text of can. 1119 seems to favor the contrary opinion, because the wording "non consummatum inter baptizatos" seems to lay stress on consummation after Baptism, and in that case even a marriage consummated before Baptism could be dissolved, not only by the Pauline privilege, as was heretofore generally assumed, but also by religious profession and papal dispensation.

12 Cfr. Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 21, 4 f.; Feije, De Impedimentis et Dispensat. Mat., 1885, ed. 3, p. 502, n. 602; Wernz, IV, Vol. II, p. 628; De Smet, l. c., p. 229. But the faculty granted by Pius VII, Feb. 22, 1801 (Collectanea S. Sedis, Paris, 1880, n. 962, p. 433) would insinuate the fact of dispensation: "copula carnalis praecesserat, sed nunquam subsecuta erat."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(3) Solemn religious profession, then, by law dissolves a marriage as described. The profession required is solemn perpetual profession acknowledged as such by the Church. It is pronounced only in religious orders. No other kind of vow or profession has the effect here in question.[13] Hence the simple vows taken in the Society of Jesus have not the power of dissolving marriage.[14]

Of course, it is understood that the solemn profession is valid and not dispensed from. As a consequence, the moment one party pronounces the formula of profession, which is accepted by the lawful superior, the other party is free and may remarry. This rule works, we may say, automatically, so that no ecclesiastical court need intervene. This is meant by the phrase ipso iure. All that is needed is that the party remaining in the world be apprized of the fact of the solemn religious profession of the other.[15]

But there is another meaning attached to the expression "ipso iure." It refers to the general or common ecclesiastical law which introduced this mode of dissolution in favor of religious profession. As the solemnity of the vows, so also this impediment set up by positive law

13 S. C. super Statu Regul., Jan. 25, 1861.

14 Wernz, IV, Vol. II, p. 627, n. 698.

15 If a party not sufficiently informed of the other party's solemn profession would contract marriage with a third after this profession, the marriage would be valid, but illicit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

exists by ecclesiastical institution. It would be useless to search the Bible for a text to support the divine law which some [16] have assumed. The fact that before Alexander III no pontiff gave an authentic decision in this matter should suffice to prove that the law is of ecclesiastical institution.

(4) The second mode of dissolving a non-consummated marriage between baptized persons, or a mixed marriage, is by papal dispensation. This power, vicarious and instrumental as it is called, cannot be validly and licitly exercised without a just reason. Therefore the Pope is bound by iustae causae, otherwise the dispensation is invalid. The reason is that the indissolubility of marriage is founded on natural and divine law, to which the Pope himself is subject,[17] and therefore he may use his power only as a steward of God, or as an instrument in the hands of God.

The following reasons are iustae causae of more or less frequent occurrence:

(a) Proof that one party did not have the intention of binding himself or herself forever to the other; or that deception and fraud were practiced; or that fear and violence were used in order to force the reluctant party.

These reasons may be said to be derived from lack of freedom and perfect consent, though there is no agreement as to terminology.[18]

(b) Impotency of either party is frequently alleged in cases brought before the Roman tribunals; whence may follow aversion for the state of virginity, to which one party might be forced by the impotency of the other.[19]

16 Wernz, l. c., p. 624, has given much attention to the refutation of the divine right theory.

17 Sanchez, l. c., l. II, disp. 15, n. 6; cf. n. 1, where he justly observes: "in hac quaestione satis confuse loquuntur doctores."

18 Richter, Trid., p. 283, n. 141, n. 143; A. Ap. S., V, 553 ff.

19 Richter, ib., nn. 139, 147, 150;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) A desire to save the good name and reputation of the other party, or to avoid family troubles and feudal quarrels, or to keep up one's social status or rank.[20]

These are the reasons most frequently advanced in petitions for dispensation "super matrimonio rato non consummato." The fact of non-consummation must be proved, otherwise all procedure is useless. Of this we shall hear more under Procedure in Matrimonial Cases (infra).

(5) A petition for dissolution may be submitted by both parties or by one party only, the other refusing to acquiesce. In the latter case the proof of non-consummation will be more difficult, especially if the other party is contumacious.

This may suffice for the present canon. We will only add that whether the term "dispensation" is to be taken in the strict or in a wider sense, is immaterial to the canonist, though we may interpret it as a declaration to the effect that in any particular case the marriage may be dissolved, and is dissolved, for a just reason by the authority set up by God.[21]

THE PAULINE PRIVILEGE

After declaring the absolute indissolubility of a Christian marriage validly contracted and consummated, and pointing out two ways of dissolving a merely ratified marriage, the Code proceeds to lay down rules concerning what is called the privilegium fidei. This is also styled the Pauline privilege because it is contained in 1 Cor. VII, 12–15, and is therefore said to have been to this may be added contagious disease; cfr. Sanchez, l. c., II, disp. 16, n. 5 f.

20 Richter, ib., n. 145; but in one case of mere disparity of condition and nobility the S. C. would not dispense. Jan. 23, 1734 (Richter, l. c., n. 142).

21 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, p. 618.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

promulgated by the Apostle of the Gentiles, although in fact it was granted by the Lord Himself in favor of faith.[22] It would seem to follow that this privilege, though promulgated by private authority, (" for the rest I speak, not the Lord ") is based upon divine law.

Traces of the use of the Pauline privilege are very rare in ancient times. Certain apparent allusions to it in the writings of Tertullian [23] and St. Augustine are doubtful. The latter [24] speaks of forsaking an infidel wife, but is silent about the solution of the marriage tie. Gratian [25] refers to the matter in a rather confused way. The subject is treated more plainly by Bernardus Papiensis [26] and especially by Tancred,[27] who distinguishes three reasons for which contumely against the Creator would dissolve a marriage: — cohabitation with contempt of the Creator, danger of being drawn into infidelity, and danger of mortal sin. The Decretals of Gregory IX mention the case in title 19, but in a cursory way, without emphasis. A wider range was given to the Pauline Privilege after the discovery of the New World. Paul III, with his constitution " Altitudo," June 1, 1537, opened a new series of papal documents.[28] Since his day innumerable decisions have been given by the Holy Office and instructions issued by the S. C. de Propaganda Fide. These decisions and instructions shall be our main guide.

22 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VI, 4, 3; S. C. P. F., March 5, 1816 (Coll., n. 704).

23 Ad uxorem, c. 2.

24 C. 4, C. 28, q. 1.

25 C. 28.

26 Summa de Mat., ed. Laspeyres, p. 291.

27 Summa de Spons. et Mat., ed. Wunderlich, p. 44.

28 Cfr. can. 1125, and appendix to the Codex Iuris Canonici, where the text of all three is inserted.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

NATURE OF THE PAULINE PRIVILEGE

CAN. 1120

§ 1. Legitimum inter non baptizatos matrimonium, licet consummatum, solvitur in favorem fidei ex privilegio Paulino.

§ 2. Hoc privilegium non obtinet in matrimonio inter partem baptizatam et partem non baptizatam inito cum dispensatione ab impedimento disparitatis cultus.

A legitimate marriage between non-baptized persons, even though consummated, is dissolved in favor of the faith by the Pauline Privilege.

The Pauline privilege is expressed in 1 Cor. VII, 12–15: "If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she consent to dwell with him, let him not put her away. And if any woman hath a husband that believeth not, and he consent to dwell with her, let her not put away her husband. . . . But if the unbeliever depart, let him depart. For a brother or sister is not under servitude in such cases. But God hath called us in peace."

Note the expressions: "consent to dwell with," "depart," and "unbeliever," around which the privilege clusters. The favor of faith is insinuated by the words: "not under servitude" and "peace."

(1) The faith in favor of which this privilege is asserted, is that of St. Paul and his brothers and sisters, therefore, the Christian faith. It is evident that the legislator means, first and above all, the Catholic faith (cfr. can. 1123). In matter of fact all the decisions [29] of the Roman congregations were prompted by Catholic mis-

29 At least the many which we perused never mention a heretical baptism. The reason is evident: non-Catholics do not appeal to the Pope.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sionaries and prelates, and given for converts who had embraced the Catholic faith.

(2) The marriage must have been contracted between non-baptized persons, or, in the words of the Apostle, between unbelievers. This is an important point, for if there is a doubt whether one of the parties was baptized, the privilege cannot be applied to him or her. Here is a case in point. Methodist preachers had been working in Oceania and baptized some of the inhabitants. The baptisms were of doubtful validity. When one of the women thus doubtfully baptized wished to embrace the Catholic faith, her husband refused to dwell with her. The question arose: May he be considered an unbeliever and the Pauline Privilege applied to her? The answer was no.[30] She could not simply be called an unbeliever. If both parties were unbelievers, the canonist would not trouble himself about them. Therefore, one must be converted, or rather baptized validly, because by baptism one enters the ranks of believers. A catechumen, i.e., one who is taking instructions in the faith, is not yet entitled to that privilege, as has been decided [31] and is re-affirmed in the next canon.

(3) St. Paul uses the phrases: "to consent to dwell together," and, negatively, "to depart." If departure takes place, it is an evident sign that the unbeliever is unwilling to dwell under one roof with the believer. It may happen that the infidel party would consent to cohabit with 30 S. O., Dec. 18, 1872 (Coll. P. F., n. 1392, Vol. II, p. 59): "Utrum pars conversa propter gravissimum dubium de baptismo in haeresi recepto aequiparari possit parti ab infidelitati conversae, et propter Paulinum privilegium ad alias nuptias transire. S. C. Respondit: Negative. . . . Utrum baptismus dubius censendus sit validus in ordine ad matrimonium etiam in eo sensu, quod invalidum sit matrimonium inter haereticum dubie baptizatum, et infidelem propter impedimentum disparitatis cultus. S. C. respondit: Affirmative."

31 S. C. P. F., Jan. 16, 1803 (Coll., n. 665).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the faithful spouse, but the latter would be subject to unpleasant and even sinful temptations from the part of the unbeliever. Cohabitare sine contumelia Creatoris means to live together without injury to faith and morals, or without offense to the Creator. No matter whether the unbeliever departs physically or morally from his converted partner, the privilege may be applied to the latter.

The unbeliever departs physically, (a) if he unjustly leaves his faithful consort who has given him no cause for departure; (b) if he contracts a marriage with another; (c) if he is detained by another consort (a secundo marito) or by a creditor for unpaid debts; (d) if he departs out of hatred for the faith of his consort.[32]

Moral departure might be brought about by the following reasons: (a) refusal of the unbeliever to live with the believing party without blaspheming the name of Christ,[33] or in other words only under the condition that the unbeliever could freely blaspheme the Christian name; (b) refusal to relinquish concubinage, which is an offense to God;[34] (c) refusal to permit the Catholic education of the offspring;[35] (d) attempts to seduce the Catholic party to idolatry;[36] (e) temptation on the part of the husband (not father- or mother-in-law) to grievous sins against conjugal chastity;[37] (f) continual dissensions and quarrels, for which the faithful party has given no cause, or for which he or she has made satisfaction and amendment; but this state must be serious and endanger salvation.[38]

32 S. O., July 4, 1855; June 12, 850; Aug. 5, 1759; P. F., Jan. 30, 1807 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1114, 1044, 421, 690).

33 S. O., July 4, 1855 (Coll. cit., n. 1114).

34 Ibid.

35 S. O., Dec. 14, 1848; July 11, 1866 (Coll. cit., nn. 1036, 1295).

36 S. O., Aug. 5, 1759 (Coll., n. 421).

37 P. F., March 5, 1816 (Coll. cit., n. 704).

38 S. O., Aug. 5, 1759; April 26, 1899 (Coll. cit., nn. 421, 2044).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Crimes committed by the faithful party before Baptism do not deprive him of the Pauline privilege; neither does he forfeit that right by crimes committed after Baptism, if they are not suspected by, or known to, the infidel party, because "when there is doubt, the verdict must be in favor of the faith." [39]

This, then, is the extent and nature of the Pauline privilege, granted in favor of the faith, which can be made use of only if the unbeliever does not wish to dwell with the faithful party, or at least not without offense to the Creator.

But, says § 2, this privilege cannot be applied to a marriage between a baptized and an unbaptized person contracted with a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship.[40] Hence if James was a Catholic and contracted marriage with Gemma, who was not baptized, having obtained a dispensation from the impediment of disparitas cultus, Gemma could not claim the Pauline privilege even though James should return to unbelief and she were willing to become a Catholic. Neither is the matrimonial tie solved when both consorts receive or intend to receive Baptism.[41] These are only preliminary requisites for dissolving a marriage contracted by both parties in unbelief; their marriage is not yet dissolved. The privilege requires some sort of legal verification to the effect that the required conditions are actually present. This process is called interpellation.

39 S. O., April 19, 1899 (Coll., n. 2043).

40 S. O., March 5, 1852; July 4, 1855; Dec. 9, 1874 (Coll., nn. 1070, 1114, 1427, ad 18).

41 S. O., July 11, 1866 (Coll., n. 1295).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHARACTER AND NECESSITY OF INTERPELLATION

CAN. 1121

§ 1. Antequam coniux conversus et baptizatus novum matrimonium valide contrahat, debet, salvo praescripto can. 1125, partem non baptizatam interpellare:

1.° An velit et ipsa converti ac baptismum suscipere;

2.° An saltem velit secum cohabitare pacifice sine contumelia Creatoris.

§ 2. Hae interpellationes fieri semper debent, nisi Sedes Apostolica aliud declaraverit.

§ 1. Before the converted and baptized party may proceed to a new marriage, he must, with due regard to the conditions mentioned in can. 1125, inquire of the unbaptized party:

1.° Whether she, too, will be converted and receive Baptism;

2.° Whether she would at least consent to peaceful cohabitation without offense to the Creator.

§ 2. These interpellations must always be made unless the Apostolic See has declared otherwise.

From § 1 it is evident that this interpellation must be made after Baptism. This injunction has been insisted upon time and again,[42] and must be considered the rule. However, in extraordinary cases, the Holy Office has granted faculties to make the interpellation during the time of the catechumenate. In these extraordinary cases the whereabouts of the infidel party were entirely unknown or he or she was so far away that interpellation would have been uncertain and difficult.[43]

Note that faculties are required, and compare what is said under can. 1125.

42 S. O., April, 1859 (Coll., n. 1175).

43 S. O., June 3, 1874 (Coll., n. 1415).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The interpellation must be twofold: (a) whether the infidel party would be willing to be converted and receive Baptism; (b) whether peaceful cohabitation would be consented to without offense to God. What the latter phrase means has been explained above.

This double question must be put even if evidence is at hand to show that the infidel party has no intention to be converted.[44] Neither is the double inquiry to be omitted in case a divorce has taken place and another marriage contracted according to civil law.[45]

The necessity of the twofold interpellation, as stated in § 2, has been emphatically inculcated by Benedict XIV [46] and by the Holy Office. It obliges both parties, husband as well as wife, with equal force.

It may have caused some surprise that the text says "declaraverit," where we should have expected "dispensaverit." But there is a solid reason for the term chosen. For the necessity is by divine precept, or "according to Apostolic sanction." The interpellation, therefore, is not to be looked upon as a mere formality or judiciary form. Benedict XIV's emphatic statement to this effect was adopted by the Holy Office,[47] which has declared that the opinion that the interpellation may be omitted whenever it cannot be made or would prove useless, cannot be called safe in practice, and insists upon instructing neophytes as to their obligation on this head.[48] Here, then, is the secret of the declaraverit: since the interpellation is part and parcel of the divine law, and the Holy See does not claim the power of dispensing from that law, the Code

44 P. F., March 5, 1816; Jan. 17, 1836 (Coll., nn. 704, 845).

45 S. O., June 18, 1884; July 17, 1850 (Coll., nn. 1620, 1045).

46 "Apostolici ministerii," Sept. 16, 1747.

47 S. O., June 12, 1850; July 4, 1855; Sept. 16, 1824 (Coll., nn. 1044, 1113, 784).

48 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VI, 4; XIII, 21; S. O., June 20, 1858 (Coll., n. 1162).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

has logically adopted the term declare, not dispense. With this explanation in view, if we have used or shall use the term dispense, let it be understood as the Apostolic See wishes it to be understood.

CAN. 1122

MODE OF INTERPELLATION

§ 1. Interpellationes fiant regulariter, forma saltem summaria et extraiudiciali, de auctoritate Ordinarii coniugis conversi, a quo Ordinario concedendae sunt quoque coniugi infideli, si quidem eas petierit, induciae ad deliberandum, eo tamen monito, fore ut, induciis inutiliter praeterlapsis, responsio praesumatur negativa.

§ 2. Interpellationes etiam privatim factae ab ipsa parte conversa, valent, imo sunt etiam licitae, si forma superius praescripta servari nequeat; hoc tamen in casu de ipsis, pro foro externo, constare debet duobus saltem testibus vel alio legitimo probationis modo.

§ 1. The interpellations should, as a rule, be made at least in summary and extrajudicial form with the authority of the Ordinary of the converted party. The same Ordinary may grant to the unbelieving party, who asks for it, time to deliberate,— a respite,— under the explicit condition, however, that failure to reply within the term conceded will be regarded as a negative answer.

§ 2. Private interpellations made by the converted party are valid, and also lawful, if the form prescribed above cannot be followed; but in that case evidence that the interpellation has been made must be given by at least two witnesses or in some other legal form.

§ 1 explains the canonical mode of interpellation. We say canonical, not judicial, because the text admits of a summary and extrajudicial form of interpellation. But canonical procedure is not prescribed in all its rigor. Hence the regular form and order observed in canonical trials, presided over by a judge, with plaintiff and defendant, sworn witnesses and citations, etc., is not absolutely necessary. But a summary procedure is required and suffices.[49] Hence the episcopal court should at least summon the infidel party to appear or to send an answer, if possible under affidavit. What was formerly[50] prescribed concerning the posting of the summons at the church door may now be supplied by an advertisement in the newspapers, or by a letter sent by the episcopal court. In this letter a certain time must be set for answering the questions, which should be styled peremptory, so that the party may know that delay in answering is tantamount to forfeiture of any further claims. For, as the Regula Juris in 6° says: "Delay, if personal, hurts only the person concerned,"[51] because a personal or regular delay, especially when the debtor is admonished by the creditor to pay within a certain time, is culpable and imputable to the culprit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Private interpellations may validly be made by the parties themselves.[52] In that case two witnesses must either hear the question, or see the instrument (paper) that was sent to the other party, in order to have a proof for the interpellation and to prevent interference from the infidel party in a new marriage or challenge of its validity. An interpellation made by a private party in a case that came before the Propaganda[53] ran like this:

49 S. O., June 11, 1768 (Coll., n. 430).

50 Ibid.

51 Reg. 26: "Mora sua cuilibet nociva est"; cfr. Reiffenstuel, in h. reg.

52 P. F., July 21, 1841 (Coll., n. 929); Gasparri, De Mat., n. 1089.

53 P. F., ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"Will you take me again as your wife?" The answer was: "Go where you please." This was considered a sufficient interpellation. A mere bill of divorce or ejection from the home would be insufficient; even if the divorce papers could be exhibited, the interpellation must still be made, if at all possible.[54] An interpellation once made is sufficient, even in case the faithful party puts off marriage for a considerable time. But if the interpellation was dispensed with, it must be made, or the dispensation be renewed in case marriage is delayed for more than one year.[55] For charity's sake it may be made several times.[56]

EFFECT OF INTERPELLATION

CAN. 1123

Si interpellationes ex declaratione Sedis Apostolicae omissae fuerint, aut si infidelis eisdem negative responderit expresse vel tacite, pars baptizata ius habet novas nuptias cum persona catholica contrahendi, nisi ipsa post baptismum dederit parti non baptizatae iustam discedendi causam.

If the interpellations were omitted by virtue of a declaration of the Apostolic See, or if the infidel party has either explicitly or tacitly given a negative answer to them, the baptized party may contract a new marriage with a Catholic, unless he or she has, after Baptism, given just cause to the infidel party for departing.

54 P. F., March 5, 1816 (Coll., n. 704).
55 P. F., June 26, 1820 (Coll., n. 743).
56 S. O., June 12, 1850 (Coll., n. 1044).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1124

Coniux fidelis, licet post susceptum baptismum denuo matrimonialiter cum parte infideli vixerit, ius tamen novas celebrandi nuptias cum persona catholica non amittit, ideoque potest hoc iure uti, si coniux infidelis, mutata voluntate, postea discedat sine iusta causa, vel iam non cohabitet pacifice sine contumelia Creatoris.

Although the baptized party has renewed marital relations with the infidel party after Baptism, he or she does not thereby lose the right to contract a new marriage with a Catholic, and that right may be used later if the infidel, having changed his mind, withdraws without a just cause, or refuses to cohabit peacefully without blaspheming the Creator.

These two canons manifestly complement each other, for both treat of the effect of the Pauline privilege, viz., a new marriage.

§ 1. The first canon mentions the declaration of the Holy See, in virtue of which the interpellation was omitted.

(1) Interpellation in case of polygamy turns only about one question, viz.: whether the other party will be converted. This is done in order to cut short all superfluous interrogations, especially since there may be a doubt whether the marriage was valid precisely on account of polygamy or polyandry.[57] This may safely be called a general declaration, and therefore requires no special faculty.

(2) There is another twofold class of cases in which dispensation was required:

[57] S. O., March 28, 1860; June 20, 1866; May 19, 1892; Sept. 5, 1855 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1188, 1293 [I, p. 716], 1796, 1117 polyandry).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(a) Ordinary cases,[58] for which habitual faculties of dispensing were granted to the bishops and vicars apostolic. Ordinary cases are those in which it is impossible to find out the whereabouts of the infidel consort, or in which it is ascertained after an extrajudicial and summary investigation that the absent spouse can not be interpellated. Thus it may happen that no messenger can reach the place to which the other party has gone; or that the distance is so great that no message can be sent; or the polygamous party no longer remembers whom he first married; or the infidel party became insane and therefore could not be asked.[59]

(b) Extraordinary cases, "when the infidel party can be reached, but interpellation can not be made without serious damage to the faithful party or danger to Christians."[60] Damage threatened to, or feared by, the neophyte himself was declared insufficient for applying the faculty of dispensation.[61] There must be a real disadvantage, which will weigh all the heavier if it is combined with danger to a community. Note that most of the cases here cited were reported from missionary countries, China, Bengal, etc.

For the practical application of the Ordinary's power, we refer to the concluding paragraph of can. 1127. Here only note that the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "In suprema," Jan. 6, 1754, may not be cited as conferring 58 S. O., Nov. 29, 1882 (Coll., n. 1581): "Ordinarius casus . . . tunc evenit, quando scilicet adhibitis antea omnibus diligentiis etiam per publicas ephemerides, ad reperiendum locum ubi conjux infidelis habitet, iisque in irritum cessis, constet saltem summarie et extrajudicialiter coniugem absentem moneri legitime non posse, aut monitum infra tempus in monitione praefixum, suam voluntatem non significasse. . . ."

59 "Altitudo," of Paul III; "Romani Pontificis," of Pius V; S. O., June 8, 1836; Nov. 22, 1871 (Coll., nn. 848, 1377).

60 S. O., Nov. 29, 1882 (Coll., n. 1581).

61 S. O., Nov. 21, 1883 (Coll., n. 1607); this faculty was given for a certain number of cases.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that faculty, for said constitution was of a strictly local, or personal nature, as it was given to a house of converts at Venice,[62] and is not mentioned in can. 1125.

Can. 1123 admits also an express or a tacit negative answer. Here it must be noted that if the answer to the first question (whether the infidel party consents to be converted) is negative, the second question concerning peaceful cohabitation must be put; and after a negative answer the faithful party is entitled to contract a new marriage. This is the effect of an express or explicit negative answer. A tacit negative answer would be lapse of the term assigned for answering, no matter whether the delay was caused by malicious and intentional neglect or by physical or moral impossibility.[63] After such an answer has been received, the favor must be granted, and the baptized party is free to marry again. However the canon lays down a condition: unless he or she has given to the infidel party just cause for desertion. A just cause would be adultery known to the infidel party, or leading a scandalous life, or serious neglect of the marital duty and education.[64] Therefore concubinage must be given up because incompatible with Christian morals.[65]

Lastly the canon appears to exclude a marriage of the converted party with any one but a Catholic; that is to say, the convert must marry a Catholic. This must be considered as a rule, which, however, admits of exceptions. For there are several cases related in the Collectanea P. F. in which a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship was granted. Thus a woman who had married (?) a second husband, who himself

62 The Coll. P. F. placed it in the Appendix, n. 2252.

63 S. O., June 12, 1850 (Coll., n. 1044); the supposed wife was held captive by another.

64 S. O., April 19, 1899 (Coll., n. 2043); June 20, 1866 (Coll., n. 1293, I. p. 716).

65 S. O., March 28, 1860 (Coll., n. 1188).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

had dismissed his first wife, and borne him children, was granted a dispensation even though the husband refused to be converted.[66] And one instruction of the Holy Office[67] says, in general terms, that if out of a number of concubines who are heretics, one is to be taken as the lawful wife, with renewal of the consent, care should be taken that she become a Catholic, lest a dispensation from mixed religion should be necessary, which for just reasons is granted. Therefore our canon states a rule, but does not exclude exceptions.

Can. 1124 extends the privilege to the case where marital relations have been resumed between an infidel and a baptized party after the latter's Baptism, but the infidel changes his mind and vexes the convert with machinations against the faith, or tries to get him to practice idolatry, or makes attempts against conjugal loyalty, or contracts a new marriage. Here the contumelia Creatoris is verified,[68] and in all such cases the baptized party is entitled to make use of the Pauline privilege, even though there are children born after his or her Baptism. This holds even if the baptized party committed a crime, provided only that this crime is not the cause of the changed attitude of the infidel party.[69]

THREE PAPAL CONSTITUTIONS

CAN. 1125

Ea quae matrimonium respiciunt in constitutionibus Pauli III Altitudo, 1 Iun. 1537; S. Pii V Romani Pontificis, 2 Aug. 1571; Gregorii XIII Populis, 25

66 S. O., Sept. 12, 1855 (Coll., n. 1118).

67 March 28, 1860.

68 S. O., Aug. 5, 1759; July 4, 1855; July 11, 1866; S. C. P. F., March 5, 1816 (Coll., nn. 421, 1114, 1295, 704).

69 S. O., April 19, 1899 (Coll., n. 2043).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ian. 1585, quaeque pro peculiaribus locis scripta sunt, ad alias quoque regiones in eisdem adiunctis extenduntur.

In whatever concerns marriage, the constitutions of Paul III, "Altitudo," of June 1, 1537, of St. Pius V, "Romani Pontificis," of Aug. 2, 1570, of Gregory XIII, "Populis," of Jan. 25, 1585, though given for particular places, are [hereby] extended to all countries situated in the same circumstances.

This canon must be looked upon as a declaration, and therefore as inducing general or common law.[70] The constitution of Paul III was given for the West Indies and South America. The part that concerns us reads: As to marriages, we enact that those who had several wives before their conversion, but do not remember which they married first, may after their conversion choose the one whom they love best and contract marriage with her by expressing the usual consent; but those who remember whom they married first, must retain this one and dismiss the others. We furthermore permit them to marry validly persons related to them in the third degree of consanguinity or affinity. St. Pius V's Constitution, also directed to the Indies, considers the case of polygamy. One husband had many wives and dismissed several. After Baptism he was allowed to keep the one who was baptized together with him, whether she was his legitimate wife or not. To do away with all scruples on the part of bishops and missionaries, the Pope allowed these Indians to keep the woman who had received baptism as the lawful wife. That this favor was granted for the Indians only, and could not be extended to other regions without intervention by the 70 The constitutions themselves are reprinted in the appendix to the Code.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Apostolic See, was duly recognized by the Archbishop of Quebec, who implored Gregory XVI to grant such an extension.[71] It was granted. The decision has a peculiar interest. It refers directly to the constitution of Pius V, whereas the Holy Office distinguished two different cases, regardless of whether the first marriage was valid or not. If the first marriage contracted with wife No. 1 was valid, the husband has to retain her if she was also converted or consented to live with him without blasphemy of the Creator. But if the first marriage was invalid, and the subsequent valid,[72] the convert was allowed to choose from among his several so-called wives the one who was ready to be baptized or any other who was not formerly his wife, provided she was ready to be baptized and the consent was renewed. The decision added: If, in case of the first marriage being valid, the husband would not take the one he married first, but the second or third, because the first wife remained an infidel, he must renew the consent, and the Ordinary must apply the faculty of dispensing from an interpellation of the first wife if such interpellation could not be made or would prove useless.[73] This sounds like a modification or interpretation of an otherwise far-going Constitution. In matter of fact the Constitution of Gregory XIII was restricted to missionary countries (Angola, Ethiopia, Brazil, and India) and to Ordinaries and missionaries, especially of the Society of Jesus, who could dispense converts married before Baptism, enabling them to contract a Catholic marriage, though the pagan consort was still alive, without as much as asking the latter's consent or expecting an answer. But the Pontiff added that

71 S. O., June 8, 1836 (Coll., n. 848).

72 Ibid.: "ut dubitari possit matrimonia huiusmodi ad instar belluarum censenda esse."

73 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, c. 21.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

evidence must be furnished, at least by summary and extra-judicial investigation, that the wife could not lawfully be interpellated or that, if interpellated, she could not answer within the time prescribed in the interpellation. Marriages thus contracted by converts were declared to be valid even if it should become known afterwards that the former consorts had been prevented from giving an answer and had been converted to the true faith at the time the second marriage was contracted. Here interpellation of some sort is required. What then are the distinctive characteristics of these three constitutions? Put in order they are:

Paul III	Pius V	Gregory XIII
Supposes polygamy.— First wife to be retained if remembered; otherwise the husband may choose the one whom he prefers, whether baptized or not.— New consent required.— No interpellation.	Supposes polygamy.— Man may retain any one of the women he has married, if she embraces the faith.— No consent prescribed.— No interpellation necessary.	Does not mention polygamy, but captivity of the infidel party. — Baptized party may marry any husband who is a believer, even though of another rite.— Summary interpellation.

From this juxtaposition it will easily be perceived that the most favorable interpretation is that of St. Pius. But at the same time it is the least canonical, stretching the privilege to its very limit, because it pays regard neither to the former marriage nor to interpellation. Paul III's constitution attempts to preserve a semblance of legitimate marriage, since it requires that the first wife must be retained, if remembered, and the consent renewed. A purer notion of the Pauline privilege is manifested by the constitution of Gregory XIII.

A difficulty remains as to the consent and the necessity of interpellation by divine right. As to the consent necessary for every marriage, clearly no pope could have the intention to dispense therefrom. Hence if a marriage contracted in infidelity was valid or legitimate, no new consent is required if the husband after Baptism retains his legitimate wife, i.e., the one, as Paul III supposes, whom he married first. If, however, the marriage contracted in infidelity was invalid, either for lack of consent or on account of a condition which invalidated the substance of marriage, or by reason of an existing impediment of natural or divine law,[74] the husband after his conversion was allowed to marry another woman, who, according to St. Pius's constitution, must be a Catholic; and this marriage must be contracted by renewed consent and with due regard to the prescribed form.[75]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

What about the necessity of interpellation, which Paul III and Pius V seem to disregard entirely? There can no longer be any doubt that their constitutions amount to a declaration,[76] and are not a relaxation, of the law. By a declaration the Pope merely explains the divine law which prescribes interpellation, declaring that in particular circumstances, for which the declaration is given, the law ceases to bind [77] in its whole latitude, as far as interpellation is concerned.

The new Code, in general terms, extends these constitutions to all countries where the same, not merely similar, circumstances prevail. Such is the case in pagan countries chiefly. Note that these circumstances must effect the countries, not merely persons, as the three constitutions were issued for particular countries, not cases. We 74 Divine or natural law prohibits polygamy, wherefore Pius V may be said to suppose these polygamous marriages to be invalid.

75 Feije, l. c., n. 486, p. 358.

76 Pius V says: "declaramus"; Paul III: "decernimus."

77 Feije, l. c., n. 494, p. 373, adding however: "Quoad necessitatem retinendi primam uxorem volentem saltem pacifice cohabitare." This addition does not save the Constitution of Pius V.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

scarcely believe that the U. S., or even our Indian Reservations, could claim to be included in this category.

FORMER MARRIAGE DISSOLVED

CAN. 1126

Vinculum prioris coniugii, in infidelitate contracti, tunc tantum solvitur, cum pars fidelis reapse novas nuptias valide iniverit.

The bond of a first marriage, contracted in infidelity, is dissolved only when the baptized party contracts a new marriage validly. The dissolution of the former bond takes place at the moment when the baptized party gives his or her consent to a new marriage. From that moment the infidel party is free.

This doctrine may be called certain, as there is no reason to doubt that the infidel party may validly contract a new marriage, although Benedict XIV entertained a doubt on this head.[78] It is a principle of common law, as the H. O. plainly states, that if the wife is freed from the conjugal tie, the husband also is freed, for the bond is mutual, and therefore the freedom of the one entails freedom for the other.[79] And this freedom certainly involves the liberty of contracting a new marriage. Or is perhaps the favor of faith to be understood as involving a necessary disadvantage to the unbeliever? This assumption would only cause hatred against religion. But if the baptized party does not contract a new marriage, the unbeliever is not free, but bound to celibacy according to ecclesiastical law. The following case is to the point.

78 Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," Feb. 28, 1747, § 58; but it appears as certain in S. O., Aug. 5, 1759; July 11, 1866 (Coll., nn. 421, 1295).

79 S. O., Sept. 16, 1824 (Coll., n. 784, I, p. 453).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A Chinaman who sold his wife and married another, wished to embrace the faith. Interpellation showed that the first wife was ready to become a Catholic, but could not because detained by the man who purchased her. The decision of the Holy Office was that the Chinaman could not be baptized unless he dismissed his second wife, and the first wife was told to abstain from carnal intercourse with her second husband as a condition of Baptism.[80]

Note the word "tantum" in the text: it excludes entry into the religious state and the reception of holy orders, because the baptized person taking such a step would not be free from the marriage bond, and therefore neither would the infidel party, who consequently could not marry validly if his consort became a religious or received higher orders. Both these steps, moreover, would require an apostolic dispensation. The party who entered religion by profession, or received orders, would not be obliged to resume his relations with the other party after religious profession or ordination. On the other hand, if the infidel party became converted and baptized before the other made religious profession or received orders, it appears but just and reasonable to maintain that the party first converted should return to the other.[81] Whether the Pauline privilege may be applied in case one party joins a non-Catholic sect, is a canonically useless question, because the Holy See would hardly be consulted in such a case.[82]

80 S. O., Jan. 29, 1805 (Coll., n. 680).

81 Feije, l. c., n. 500, p. 378 f.

82 Feije, l. c., n. 502, p. 381.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PRESUMPTION IN DOUBTFUL CASES

CAN. 1127

In re dubia privilegium fidei gaudet favore iuris.

In doubtful cases the law favors the privilege of faith, i.e., the liberty of the convert to remarry. Such cases have been solved by the H. O. In one case there was a doubt as to the validity of former marriages, and the husband was allowed to choose any of the women he had married, or another, provided she embraced the faith.[83] In another case, from Sioux Falls, S. D., Indians claimed they had married several women to test their character but with no intention of contracting a real marriage. The decision was that if their statement were found true, the marriages were to be held invalid; if doubtful, and the women were not baptized, they were free to marry whom they pleased.[84] In another case it was decided that crimes committed before or after Baptism were not a sufficient reason for the departure of the infidel party.[85]

A peculiarly delicate case was this: The husband became converted and continued cohabitation, but on account of continual quarrels finally left his wife, asserting that he had never intended to take her for his wife. The latter after her conversion would not return to him. May the husband marry another? If persuasion is useless, and he has given no cause for the woman's departure or made satisfaction afterwards, and if he is in danger of eternal damnation, then, after formal interpellation, he may marry another.[86] That this is the limit

83 S. O., Dec. 9, 1874 ad 13 (Coll., n. 1427).

84 S. O., May 19, 1892 (Coll., n. 1796).

85 S. O., April 19, 1899 (Coll., n. 2043).

86 S. O., April 26, 1899 (Coll., n. 2044): "et ad mentem.— Mens est ut in dubio iudicium sit in favorem fidei."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the privilege of faith is evident from the many clauses added in the rescript.

The question may be asked: What about the faculties of our bishops who enjoyed the right of dispensing with gentiles (see Form I, art. II)? The answer, we believe, should be as follows:

1. This faculty in the proper sense of the word is no longer given, since the Holy See claims no dispensation, but merely a declaration.

2. This declaration may be given only by the Holy See itself (Holy Office), but by no inferior authority.

3. In ordinary cases, which do not fall under the three constitutions, bishops must proceed according to the Code. Therefore:

(a) The marriage must have been contracted by both parties whilst they were certainly unbaptized; a dubious Baptism would not permit the application of the privilege;

(b) After Baptism, and not before, either a summary canonical interpellation authorized by the Ordinary, or a private interpellation duly proved, must be made to the infidel party concerning the two questions;

(c) In the case of polygamists one question: "whether the unbeliever will be converted," is sufficient;

(d) After a negative answer, or undue delay in answering, the baptized party may contract a new marriage, in virtue of which the former marriage is dissolved and the infidel party becomes free. No other intervention on the part of the Ordinary is needed.

4. The extraordinary case mentioned above (under can. 1124, § 1, n. 2, b) falls under the favor of law and may therefore be solved by the Ordinary.

5. Concerning the cases mentioned in the three constitutions, the Ordinaries are judges whether their coun-

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

try is situated in the same circumstances as those for which said constitutions were given. But they are not allowed simply to make use of that privileged declaration if the circumstances concern particular parties only; for such an extension a new papal declaration would be needed.

Here we close the consideration of the Pauline Privilege. Its importance seemed to call for a somewhat extensive treatment. For the rest, we have followed a safe guide, and abstained as much as possible from the use of secondary sources.

ART. II

SEPARATION AS TO BED, BOARD, AND DWELLING-PLACE

CAN. 1128

Coniuges servare debent vitae coniugalis communionem, nisi iusta causa eos excuset.

Married people are bound to live together unless they have a just cause for separation.

This follows mainly from the secondary purpose of marriage, i.e., mutual help, which requires a common dwelling-place. However, there may be weighty reasons that excuse from conjugal cohabitation. The Council of Florence (1439–1442) maintained the indissolubility of marriage against the Greeks, but admitted separation for reason of adultery.[87] The Council of Trent declared that such a separation was permissible either forever or for a certain time.[88] But the reason must be one which an ecclesiastical judge will acknowledge as canonical and which would justify him in pronouncing sentence of sep-

87 Decretum pro Armenis, Denzinger, l. c., n. 597.

88 Sess. 24, can. 8, de sacr. mat.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

aration. This also obtains when a baptized person has contracted marriage with an unbeliever, with a dispensation from disparity of worship, and the latter proves to be an adulterer.[89]

Separation must be duly distinguished from divorce in the proper sense. The latter generally implies dissolution of the matrimonial bond. Such a dissolution is possible only, as the preceding canons have enacted, in cases of marriage contracted between baptized persons and not yet consummated, if either solemn religious profession is made, or a papal dispensation obtained. A legitimate marriage which has been duly consummated can be dissolved by the application of the Pauline privilege. Separation leaves the marriage bond intact.

ADULTERY A CAUSE OF SEPARATION

CAN. 1129

§ 1. Propter coniugis adulterium, alter coniux, manente vinculo, ius habet solvendi, etiam in perpetuum, vitae communionem, nisi in crimen consenserit, aut eidem causam dederit, vel illud expresse aut tacite condonaverit, vel ipse quoque idem crimen commiserit.

§ 2. Tacita condonatio habetur, si coniux innocens, postquam de crimine adulterii certior factus est, cum altero coniuge sponte, maritali affectu, conversatus fuerit; praesumitur vero, nisi sex intra menses coniugem adulterum expulerit vel dereliquerit, aut legitimam accusationem fecerit.

§ 1. If one of the spouses commits adultery, the other has cause for separation, either forever or for a time, and may therefore leave hearth and home. However, separation is not permitted if the second party has consented to the crime, or been responsible for it, or has either expressly or tacitly condoned it, or committed the same crime.

[89] S. O., July 4, 1855 (Coll., n. 1114).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(1) Adultery, to be a cause of separation, must be certain and consummated by carnal intercourse.[90] A mere suspicion would not be sufficient,[91] but a strong presumption would. Such a presumption would be if the wife were found or seen with another man in a very compromising position.[92] But some sort of proof is required. Here it may be remarked that jealousy is a fertile motive of suspicion, which should not be accepted by an ecclesiastical judge. Fornication committed before marriage is not adultery.[93]

(2) But although one party may have committed adultery (which would of itself be a sufficient and canonical reason for dismissal) yet if any one of the four conditions mentioned in can. 1129, § 1, is present, the right of dismissal ceases. These conditions are:

(a) If the so-called innocent party has consented to the other's adultery. This would be the case if the husband would deliver his wife to a friend or relative for the purpose,[94] or if he would, as it were, sell her for money. But we believe that even in that case a formal or express consent is required, because no one may be supposed to deprive himself of the exclusive right conferred by marriage.

(b) If one party has given cause to the other for committing adultery. This happens if the husband does 90 Some, v. g. Feije (l. c., n. 579, p. 464) require "formal" adultery, but we fail to see the necessity of adding that adjective, since a validly married person cannot commit simple fornication.

91 c. 2, C. 32, q. 1; c. 23, C. 32, q. 5, etc., all require proof.

92 C. 12, X, II, 23: solus cum sola, nudus cum nuda.

93 C. 25, X, II, 24.

94 C. 6, X, IV, 13.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google not support his wife decently, so that she is compelled to seek a livelihood by improper means;[95] or if he deserts her,[96] or if the wife would have frequent lapsus carnis with others, although perhaps not amounting to real adultery;[97] or if she would unreasonably refuse her husband the debitum.

(c) If the so-called innocent party would also commit adultery, and would not purge himself or herself of that imputation;[98] because "equal crimes are wiped out by mutual compensation."[99]

(d) If no express or tacit condonation or pardon has followed. The latter case is explained in § 2 of our canon which says: Adultery is condoned tacitly, if the innocent party has freely had marital relations with the adulterous party after knowing of the adultery; condonation is presumed if the innocent party does not expel or leave the guilty party or bring the case into court within six months.

Concerning reconciliation or condonation two rules may be regarded as certain: 1. The husband is not obliged to be reconciled to his adulterous wife, and, 2. He may, if he wishes, receive her back into his confidence.[1] The same rules apply to the wife, although the text[2] and the authors mention her case only for reasons which are more or less physiological. But the fact that marriage rights are mutual and equal must not suffer obscuration. Besides, a strict obligation on the part of the husband to dismiss his adulterous consort cannot be solidly proved.[3] Therefore our Code admits reconciliation. This must be effected by some visible or external sign,

95 C. 5, X, IV, 19.

96 C. 4, X, IV, 19; such were excommunicated; cfr. C. 32, q. 7, passim.

97 C. 19, X, III, 32.

98 C. 1, C. 32, q. 6.

99 C. 7, X, V, 16: "cum paria crimina mutua compensatione deleantur."

1 Sanchez, l. c., l. X, disp. 13, n. 1 ff.

2 C. 3, X, V, 16.

3 Sanchez, l. c., nn. 6 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as the Code expresses it, by marital conversation or relation. Such would be asking the debitum conjugale, or other familiarities usual between married people. But these signs must be spontaneous, not prompted by compulsion or fear (sponte, says the text), and hence merely to render the debitum would not be a sure sign. Furthermore it is required that the fact of adultery was really and undoubtedly known (adulterii certior factus), because condonation is impossible as long as the injury is unknown. Hence even if marital intercourse had occurred during the time of uncertainty, this act would not preclude the use of the right of the innocent party to leave the faithless one, after certain knowledge has been obtained.[4]

The second clause of § 2, can. 1129, mentions presumption. The law presumes condonation of adultery if after six months the innocent party has not made use of his or her right under the law. The Roman law provided peremptory prescription five years after the date of knowledge, so that after this period an accusation against the adulterous party was no longer admitted.[5] The ecclesiastical law draws no limit, and therefore accusations may be brought at any time, if no condonation has taken place. The Roman law also admitted a period of sixty days, within which the father and the husband could accuse the adulteress, and four months more were granted to outsiders to bring forward the accusation. In practice six months were permitted also to the husband for accusation.[6] This custom is adopted by the Code. After the lapse of that term the lawgiver presumes condonation if the unfaithful party was not expelled or deserted.

4 Ibid., disp. 14.

5 L. 5, Cod. IX, 9, ad legem juliam de adult. et stupro.

6 L. 4, dig. 48, 5, ad legem juliam de adult. corrig.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This is, however, merely a presumption, which does not take away the right if evident and conclusive reasons are advanced for not having made use of it. However, it may be safely stated that an accusation brought later than six months post factum would require strict proof that no marital conversation or relation had taken place between husband and wife during the intervening period. The law presumes condonation in order to maintain peace in the family.

TAKING BACK THE GUILTY PARTNER

CAN. 1130

Coniux innocens, sive iudicis sententia sive propria auctoritate legitime discesserit, nulla unquam obligatione tenetur coniugem adulterum rursus admittendi ad vitae consortium; potest autem eundem admittere aut revocare, nisi ex ipsius consensu ille statum matrimonio contrarium susceperit.

The innocent spouse, if he or she has separated from the other legitimately, either by a judicial sentence or by private authority, is under no obligation to readmit the guilty partner to married life; they may, however, admit or recall each other, unless, with the consent of the innocent spouse, the guilty one has embraced a state incompatible with matrimony.

What we have said above is here corroborated, and therefore the controversy mentioned by Sanchez,[7] as to the obligation of dismissing the adulterous party, is now out of date. Note that the innocent spouse may depart of his or her own accord, without appealing to court. This should not, however, be done unless the fact of adultery [8] is proved, otherwise restitution may be claimed.

7 L. c., l. X, disp. 13, n. 4.

8 Although sodomy and bestiality

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The second clause states that reconciliation or resumption of married life, though permissible in itself, becomes impossible if the guilty spouse, with the consent of the innocent one, has embraced a state of life incompatible with Matrimony. Such a change is brought about by entering the religious state or receiving sacred orders. Since no one can be validly admitted to religion who is bound by the matrimonial tie,[9] the circumstance of adultery must be expressed in the petition to be sent to the Holy See. Furthermore, an Apostolic dispensation is required for holy orders to be received by a married man.[10] If a dispensation is granted and religion is entered or sacred orders are received, the guiltless party has no longer any claim on the party who embraces the religious state or was ordained subdeacon.[11] A fortiori, the adulterous party has no right to choose another state of life without the free consent of the innocent party.[12] The term religious state implies not only solemn but also simple (either temporary or perpetual) vows. But it may be well to repeat that entering a religious order with solemn profession does not dissolve the bond of a consummated marriage, and that, therefore, the party remaining in the world cannot validly contract another marriage. All these consequences the disloyal spouse must attribute to his own infidelity, because one who is himself unfaithful has no right to expect loyalty from others.[13] differ specifically from adultery, yet both would be sufficient reasons for asserting the right in casu, cfr. Sanchez, l. c., l. X, disp. 4, n. 13 f.

9 Can. 542.

10 Can. 132, § 3.

11 Cfr. cc. 15, 19, X, III, 32; c. 4, X, IV, 19.

12 Sanchez, l. c., l. X, disp. 10, n. 12 f.

13 Reg. Iuris 75 in 60: "Frustra sibi fidem quis postulat ab eo servari, qui fidem a se praestitam servare recusat."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

OTHER CAUSES FOR SEPARATION

CAN. 1131

§ 1. Si alter coniux sectae acatholicae nomen dederit; si prolem acatholice educaverit; si vitam criminosam et ignominiosam ducat; si grave seu animae seu corporis periculum alteri facessat; si saevitiis vitam communem nimis difficilem reddat, haec aliaque id genus, sunt pro altero coniuge totidem legitimae causae discedendi, auctoritate Ordinarii loci, et etiam propria auctoritate, si de eis certo constet, et periculum sit in mora.

§ 2. In omnibus his casibus, causa separationis cessante, vitae consuetudo restauranda est; sed si separatio ab Ordinario pronuntiata fuerit ad certum incertumve tempus, coniux innocens ad id non obligatur, nisi ex decreto Ordinarii vel exacto tempore.

The Code now proceeds to enumerate other causes for separation besides adultery. Such causes are, for example, if the other party joins a non-Catholic sect; or gives his children an education which is not Catholic; or leads a scandalous and disgraceful life; or gravely endangers the spiritual or bodily welfare of the other; or renders the marital union intolerable by acts of cruelty. These and similar reasons give the other spouse the right to withdraw by appealing to the Ordinary of the diocese, or even without legal process, if they are proved with certainty and delay would be dangerous.

It is a commonplace of ecclesiastical writers to compare infidelity, idolatry, heresy to fornication or spiritual adultery and on this ground to admit separation.[14] This is the first cause mentioned in the text. The second is [14] Cfr. c. 5, C. 28, q. 1; c. 7, C. 32, q. 7; c. 1, C. 33, q. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

educating one's children in a non-Catholic denomination. to which category belong also the "Old Catholics." A third cause is leading a criminal or shameful life (robbery, bawdry,[15] drunkenness). A fourth cause is spiritual or bodily danger. There would be spiritual danger if the Catholic party were prevented from exercising his or her religion, or persistent onanism. Bodily danger accrues from contagious diseases of an incurable and hereditary nature.[16] By cruelty is here understood not only quarrelsome and angry wrangling, but actual maltreatment (wife-beating).[17]

Whenever such a cause is proved by facts and witnesses, the innocent party may freely depart, or invoke the episcopal court. However, says § 2, when the reasons that prompted the separation cease, the marital relation must be restored. Only after the ecclesiastical court has rendered a decision in favor of a separation, either for a limited term or indefinitely, is the innocent spouse free from the duty of cohabitation.[18] If the Ordinary should command resumption of cohabitation, or if the decree of separation was given for a limited period only, married life must be resumed. It is, therefore, always safer to invoke the ecclesiastical court in such cases.[19] A civil court may indeed give sentence of temporary divorce or separation, but this has merely the effect of private separation, unless the episcopal court accepts the evidence and verdict of the civil court and makes them its own.

15 C. 4, C. 28, q. 1.

16 The S. C. Conc., March 11; Sept. 19; Dec. 16, 1786 (Richter, Trid., p. 290, n. 158) reluctantly granted separation on account of the "Celtic disease."

17 Verbal injuries are insufficient; S. C. C., June 13, 1789.

18 Cfr. c. 1, C. 33, q. 2; c. 6, X, IV, 19.

19 This is especially the case if one party has taken an oath not to accuse the other of adultery; c. 25, X, II, 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EDUCATION OF CHILDREN

CAN. 1132

Instituta separatione, filii educandi sunt penes coniugem innocentem, et si alter coniugum sit acatholicus, penes coniugem catholicum, nisi in utroque casu Ordinarius pro ipsorum filiorum bono, salva semper eorumdem catholica educatione, aliud decreverit.

After the separation, the children must be educated by the innocent spouse. If one of the parties is a non-Catholic, the education of the children belongs to the Catholic party, unless in either case the Ordinary decides otherwise for the good of the children and their Catholic education is duly provided for. Hence children of a mixed marriage may be entrusted to the non-Catholic parent, if, for instance, there is a mother-in-law, or aunt, or other relative who sees to their Catholic education. The underlying reason for this law is that the Catholic Church considers herself the guardian of the faith.[20] Difficulties may occur under this canon, especially in countries which have laws determining the children's religion. The rule should be to safeguard the Catholic education of the children in the best and least offensive way.

20 C. 2, X, III, 33.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER XI

REVALIDATION OF MARRIAGE

A marriage, sooner or later, may be discovered to be suffering from an impediment which rendered it invalid at the time it was contracted. Marriage being a bilateral contract between two capable persons, it is evident that, if the consent was defective or the parties were prevented by an impediment, there was no marriage in any given case. This discovery may cause perplexity to the pastor or confessor and prove a source of public scandal if the existence of the impediment becomes known. What is to be done in such a case? If nothing else is required but a renewal of consent, the matter is comparatively easy. But it may happen that an impediment must be removed before the consent can be renewed. The worst trouble is encountered where the renewal of consent offers difficulties which would render revalidation impossible or jeopardize the existing union and the legitimacy of the offspring. If a marriage has been contracted invalidly but with due observance of the prescribed forms, it may be revalidated by the contracting parties renewing their consent. If one party refuses, nothing remains but to heal the marriage "in the root." The former procedure is called simply revalidation, the latter, sanatio in radice.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ART. I

SIMPLE REVALIDATION

The Code in the first two canons of this article describes the act of revalidation and in the following determines the different impediments in relation to the consent; in can. 1136 it considers the defect of the original consent, and, finally, in can. 1137, deals with the lack of form.

NATURE OF REVALIDATION

CAN. 1133

§ 1. Ad convalidandum matrimonium irritum ob impedimentum dirimens, requiritur ut cesset vel dispensetur impedimentum et consensum renovet saltem pars impedimenti conscia.

§ 2. Haec renovatio iure ecclesiastico requiritur ad validitatem, etiamsi initio utraque pars consensum praestiterit nec postea revocaverit.

To revalidate a marriage which is invalid because of a diriment impediment, it is required that the impediment cease or be dispensed from, and that the consent be renewed at least by the party who is aware of the impediment.

This renewal of consent is required by ecclesiastical law for validity, even if both parties gave their consent in the beginning and never withdrew it.

RENEWAL OF THE CONSENT

CAN. 1134

Renovatio consensus debet esse novus voluntatis actus in matrimonium quod constet ab initio nullum fuisse.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The renewal of the consent must be a new act of the will ratifying a marriage which is known to have been null from the beginning.

Two conditions are here set forth for the revalidation of an invalidly contracted marriage: removal of the impediment and renewal of the consent.

(1) The impediment is understood to be an invalidating one, because a merely prohibitive impediment does not render a marriage null. Now such an impediment may cease either by itself or by a dispensation. Thus the impediment of immature age ceases after the legal age has been attained, and the impediment of disparitas cultus, after one has received Baptism.

An impediment may also be dispensed from. Note, however, that some impediments admit of no dispensation (e.g., a previous marriage bond, impotence, consanguinity of the first degree in linea recta), whilst from others the Church never dispenses, e. g., the impediment of the priesthood. If an impediment cannot or may not be dispensed from, no revalidation is possible, and the parties must separate, unless, for very special reasons, a friendly cohabitation be permitted. If the impediment may be dispensed from, as in the case especially of minor impediments, revalidation may take place, provided that

(2) The consent be renewed. Concerning this procedure our Code, following the now prevalent opinion of the School, declares

(a) That the renewal of the consent, generally speaking, is required only from the party who is aware of the existing impediment. For instance, James was sponsor at the baptism of Gemma, who is now his bride. James knows of the impediment, Gemma does not. Therefore according to our canon James must renew the consent, supposing he really and truly gave it when he married

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Gemma. This seems very plain. Yet it must be added that not a few authors[1] required the renewal of the consent by both parties. Their argument was based on the theory that "a bilateral contract cannot limp." They supposed that the marital consent given at the so-called marriage was null and could therefore not continue. This argument, though by no means destitute of weight, must now be discarded as contrary to the text of the law. The marital consent once given, and certainly enduring in the party ignorant of the impediment, is supposed to exert its original efficacy and only needs, as it were, to be repeated.

(b) But the renewal is strictly required to validate the marriage. Hence ecclesiastical law has always insisted upon the renewal if no sanatio was applied. Note the term "iure ecclesiastico," which is purposely put into the text. For if the renewal were required by natural law, as the authors mentioned above hold, no dispensation from it could be granted, and a sanatio would be almost, if not entirely,[2] impossible. That ecclesiastical law insisted on the necessity of a renewal, is evident from various instructions given by the Roman Court.[3] The intrinsic argument for such necessity lies in the nature of the consent, which is the instrument of marital union, and is rendered fully efficacious only after the impediment has been removed. The Church, therefore, has a right to insist upon a condition which at the same time gives full assurance of the validity of the marriage to the party that suffered from the impediment.

1 Thus Sanchez, l. VIII, disp. 35; Schmalzgrueber, IV, 16, n. 257; Boekhn, IV, 3, n. 38 f.

2 It may be explained by assuming a declaration that the natural law does not oblige under such circumstances. But it is always dangerous to tamper with the natural law.

3 S. O., Jan. 12, 1769; Dec. 9, 1874 (Coll., n. 472 ad II, 5; n. 1427 ad 18).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) However, says can. 1134, this renewal must be a new act of the will ratifying the marriage that was invalidly contracted. Therefore, James, who contracted an invalid marriage with Gemma, must renew his consent with the express intention of ratifying this marriage with Gemma and no other person. The case becomes more intricate if a man had more than one wife, and the divorce evil, as in Japan,[4] is rampant. If the divorce merely proceeds from an error and not from a positive act of the will or any strict condition, the first marriage contracted in infidelity is valid, and no dispensation for revalidating the second marriage can be granted even after Baptism. It may happen that a wife who is willing to receive Baptism, lives with a husband who claims the right of leaving her in order to contract a new marriage. In such circumstances the wife should not be refused Baptism, but should be told to make every effort to induce her husband to declare that he regards her as his lawful wife. If this is impossible, both are to be left in bona fide. If a baptized wife marries an infidel husband, the marriage is null and void on account of the disparity of cult, even though one or both parties are ignorant of the existence of that impediment. If there is at least the outward semblance of a true marriage, the dispensation from the impediment of disparity of cult should be applied for and the consent renewed, otherwise a sanatio must take place.[5]

Note that the renewal of the consent must be explicit and that an implied consent (viz., one contained in the copula cum affectu maritali) is not sufficient.[6] Hence the renewal must be an act of the will by which the

4 S. O., March 11, 1868 (Coll., n. 1327).

5 S. O., Dec. 9, 1874 (Coll., n. 1427 ad 18).

6 S. O., June 12, 1850 (Coll., n. 1044).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

party says: "I will take thee for my lawful husband (or wife)."[7]

MODE OF RENEWAL AFTER THE IMPEDIMENT IS REMOVED

CAN. 1135

§1. Si impedimentum sit publicum, consensus ab utraque parte renovandus est forma iure praescripta.

§ 2. Si sit occultum et utrique parti notum, satis est ut consensus ab utraque parte renovetur privatim et secreto.

§ 3. Si sit occultum et uni parti ignotum, satis est ut sola pars impedimenti conscia consensum privatim et secreto renovet, dummodo altera in consensu praestito perseveret.

§ 1. If the impediment is public, the consent must be renewed by both parties in the form prescribed by law.

§ 2. If the impediment is occult and known to both parties, it suffices that the consent be renewed by both privately and in secret.

§ 3. If the impediment is occult and known to only one of the parties, it is enough that the party who is aware of the impediment should renew his consent privately and in secret, provided the other party's consent continues.

The first section treats of public impediments. A case solved by the Holy Office may illustrate this law. In Uesküb many Mohammedans had embraced the Catholic faith, but the men conducted themselves outwardly like Muslems, whereas the women were not afraid to profess their faith. Of course the clergy could not assist at the marriages of such persons, and they were consequently invalid for lack of the prescribed form. What was to be done? The Holy Office decided that these occult Christians must be admonished to contract marriage according to the rite of the Church, with the renewal of consent, before the pastor and two witnesses, but without solemnities.[8] It is safe to say that can. 1098 may be applied here if the conditions therein mentioned are verified. A public impediment is especially that of disparity of cult, and it is rectified only by the consent of both parties given in the prescribed form.[9] Cases of consanguinity and affinity require the same procedure, except perhaps if both parties were ignorant of the existing impediment.[10]

[7] How this is to be done see under can. 1135, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 mentions an occult impediment known to both parties, such as would arise from public honesty or crime and also from disparity of worship in countries where unbelievers are in the majority, and scandal must be avoided. In such circumstances a secret and private renewal would suffice.[11]

§ 3 allows the renewal of consent by one party only, if the impediment is occult and unknown to the other. The impediment of crime [12] may enter here, and it may not be amiss to state that the S. C. Poenitentiaria, when granting a dispensation from an occult impediment of a defamatory character (illicit affinity) was wont to add the following clause: "Certiorata alia parte de nullitate prioris consensus, et quatenus haec certioratio absque gravi periculo fieri nequeat, renovato consensu iuxta regulas a probatis

8 S. O., Nov. 15, 1882 (Coll., n. 1579); the decisions of S. C. C. quoted by Card. Gasparri refer to a marriage contracted from fear.

9 Bened. XIV, "Singulari," Feb. 9, 1749, § 1.

10 S. O., March 11, 1868 (Coll., n. 1326): "quoad eos in bona fide soleat." But the times were troubled.

11 S. O., Jan. 12, 1769 (Coll., n. 472, II, 15): "sat erit ut inter solos coniuges privatim habeatur renovatio consensus, patefacta tamen, quoad fieri poterit, etiam parti infideli prioris matrimonii nullitate."

12 Cfr. c. 7, X, IV, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

auctoribus traditas." These rules were taken from the moralists,[18] but they are no longer necessary, for the Code says that private and secret renewal by the party conscious of the impediment is sufficient, provided, of course, the consent of the other continues. This is the logical consequence of the theory now adopted by the Code that the renewal of the consent is required by ecclesiastical law only, and is, practically speaking, a beneficial ruling.

MARRIAGE NULL FOR WANT OF CONSENT

CAN. 1136

§ 1. Matrimonium irritum ob defectum consensus convalidatur, si pars quae non consenserat, iam consentiat, dummodo consensus ab altera parte praestitus perseveret.

§ 2. Si defectus consensus fuerit mere internus, satis est ut pars quae non consenserat, interius consentiat.

§ 3. Si fuerit etiam externus, necesse est consensum etiam exterius manifestare, vel forma iure praescripta, si defectus fuerit publicus, vel alio modo privato et secreto, si fuerit occultus.

A marriage invalid for lack of consent is validated if the party who had not consented, does consent, provided the consent given by the other party continues.

If the want of consent was merely internal, it suffices that the party who did not give his consent give it now interiorly.

If the want of consent was also external, it is necessary that the consent be manifested outwardly; and this outward manifestation must be done in the form prescribed by law if the want of consent was public, whereas a private and secret manifestation suffices if the defect was occult.

18 Cfr. Sabetti, Theol. Moral., ed. 1917, p. 955, n. 929.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

We will quote an instruction of the Holy Office[14] which illustrates these three sections. Protestants (Calvinists) in Transylvania (Hungary) believed in the dissolubility of marriage, and married with that intention. This gave rise to difficulties, which were solved as follows:

(1) If James, a Calvinist, had the intention of marrying Gemma, a Catholic, under the express condition of the dissolubility of marriage, and the want of consent was only interior, or manifested to Gemma alone, he had only to renew the consent in order to revalidate the marriage, because his consent was defective on account of a condition appended interiorly, but affecting the substance of marriage. This is still more the case if fear or intrinsic repugnance would have nullified the internal consent.

(2) But suppose James and Gemma were both Calvinists when they married; that the minister preached the wedding sermon on Math. 19, 9, instructing them that adultery would give them the right to divorce, and that they should have the intention of marrying according to the laws of the country which easily admit divorce; and both parties would marry according to this intention. A marriage contracted with such an explicit condition would be invalid. And here the distinction set forth in § 3 applies: If the defect was externally manifested and made known to others, which certainly would be the case here, with the supposition mentioned, because the congregation gathered at the wedding and the magistrates would know of the condition, then the marriage of James and Gemma would have to be contracted in the form prescribed by the Church (supposing they became converts); if, however, the want of consent was occult, because they married privately without telling anybody of the condition attached, the consent may be renewed privately and in secret. However, in that case it would be necessary to observe the following rule.

14 S. O., April 6, 1843 (Coll., n. 965).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

MARRIAGE NULL FOR WANT OF THE REQUIRED FORM

CAN. 1137

Matrimonium nullum ob defectum formae, ut validum fiat, contrahi denuo debet legitima forma.

A marriage null for want of form, to become valid, must be contracted again according to the prescribed form.

Therefore, if James became a Catholic and Gemma remained a Protestant, the marriage would have to be contracted again before the Catholic pastor and two witnesses.[15]

The same rule holds if two Catholic parties were married without observing the prescribed form. And from this condition a dispensation is granted only for very particular reasons, e.g., if many marriages are to be validated which for reasons of persecution or disturbed conditions,[16] were contracted privately. In this case can. 1098 may also be applied.

15 Letter of Pius VIII, of March 25, 1830; Secret. Status, March 27, 1830 (Coll., n. 811).

16 To the Vicar Apostolic of Oceania, S. O., April 6, 1843 (Coll., n. 965).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ART. II

REVALIDATION IN RADICE

NATURE OF THE SANATIO

CAN. 1138

§ 1. Matrimonii in radice sanatio est eiusdem convalidatio, secumferens, praeter dispensationem vel cessationem impedimenti, dispensationem a lege de renovando consensu, et retrotractionem, per fictionem iuris, circa effectus canonicos, ad praeteritum.

§ 2. Convalidatio fit a momento concessionis gratiae; retrotractio vero intelligitur facta ad matrimonii initium, nisi aliud expresse caveatur.

§ 3. Dispensatio a lege de renovando consensu concedi etiam potest vel una tantum vel utraque parte inscia.

§ 1. The sanatio of a marriage in radice is its revalidation, implying besides a dispensation from, or the cessation of, the impediment, the dispensation from the (ecclesiastical) obligation of renewing the consent, and, by a fiction of law, retroaction as regards the canonical effects.

§ 2. Revalidation takes place at the moment the favor is granted; the retroaction is understood to reach back to the moment of the marriage, unless the contrary be stated.

§ 3. The dispensation from the obligation of renewing the consent may be granted without the knowledge of one or of either party.

A case proposed to the S. C. Poenitentiaria may illustrate the text.[17] James and Gemma married legally in 17 Anal. Eccl., 1900, t. VIII, p. 305 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1867, in the diocese of Paris, but James proved a bad husband, wherefore Gemma, after having obtained a civil divorce, went to Switzerland and before the civil magistrate married John, a nominal Catholic, in 1872. After some years James died and Gemma endeavored to induce John to renew the consent before the Church authorities, but he refused, declaring that the civil marriage was sufficient for him. Nothing was left for the woman to do but to ask for a sanatio in radice. This was granted by the aforesaid tribunal, April 25, 1890, with the significant clause, however, that the offspring born from adultery should not be benefitted by the legitimation. Hence the offspring born to Gemma and John whilst James was still alive, was not declared legitimate. But all children born after James' death, say 1875, to the year 1890, shared in the canonical effects of the sanatio.

Here we have: (a) a removal of the impediment, which is one of the natural law, viz., that of the marriage tie (ligaminis). This ceased by the death of James, in 1875. Thus also may a dispensation remove an impediment which the ecclesiastical law has established, supposing, of course, the Holy See is wont to grant it.

(b) There is also a dispensation from the renewal of the consent, which John flatly refused to give. Here again note the fact that the renewal of the consent is required not by the natural, but by an ecclesiastical law, from which, therefore, the Church, as in matters subject to her dominion, may dispense, provided, of course, as will be seen under can. 1140, that this consent was really a marital consent and that it continues.

(c) Finally there is the retroaction as regards canonical effects. These extend to the moment the marriage was invalidly contracted. But our case is a peculiar one, which is the reason why we chose it. We have not a complete and absolute sanatio, otherwise its effects would reach back to the year 1872, when Gemma married John, whereas the sacred tribunal extended the effects of the sanatio only to the time when James died, or, as we presumed, to the year 1875. If there had been only an ecclesiastical impediment between James and Gemma, and no second marriage, the effects of the sanatio would have reached back to 1868. The effects of revalidation then are: dispensation from an impediment of ecclesiastical law, validity of the marriage, and legitimation of the offspring.[18]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 determines the moment from which the marriage is revalidated. It is the moment when the favor has been granted — a die datae, and not the date of the execution of the rescript. For a genuine sanatio does not require a renewal of the consent, but depends entirely upon the free will of the grantor. But note that the grantor does not say — as some have foolishly understood — that the marriage is valid from the moment it was contracted. To impute such an impossible and ridiculous assertion or supposition to the Roman Congregation and tribunals is more than common sense can tolerate. Therefore the validity of the marriage once invalidly contracted, begins the moment — ex nunc — the Cardinal Prefect puts his signature to the decree of revalidation. Entirely different from this genuine assertion is the other that the law feigns or assumes by a fictio iuris the validity of the marriage from the time it was first, though invalidly, contracted. For this fiction, as in civil law, almost exclusively concerns the legal effects of the legitimation of offspring. Concerning these the sanatio works ex tunc, i.e., from the 18 Cfr. can. 1116 f. But cardinals and bishops would be excepted from the effects on account of the "convalidatum" in can. 1116, which is the general term also for sanatio in radice.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

moment of the first celebration. But the Code adds: "Unless otherwise expressly provided." Thus we see in the decision of the S. Poenitentiaria quoted above that the adulterine offspring was expressly excluded.

§ 3 mentions the extent of ignorance, saying that a dispensation from the renewal of the consent may be given if both parties are unconscious of the existence of the impediment, nay of the fact that a sanatio was given. For not only the parties themselves, but Ordinaries and confessors may ask for such a dispensation. Thus many such dispensations were given for France after the revolution, for the diocese of Treves, and for Japan.[19]

WHEN A SANATIO IN RADICE IS POSSIBLE

CAN. 1139

§ 1. Quodlibet matrimonium initum cum utriusque partis consensu naturaliter sufficiente, sed iuridice inefficaci ob dirimens impedimentum iuris ecclesiastici vel ob defectum legitimae formae, potest in radice sanari, dummodo consensus perseveret.

§ 2. Matrimonium vero contractum cum impedimento iuris naturalis vel divini, etiamsi postea impedimentum cessaverit, Ecclesia non sanat in radice, ne a momento quidem cessationis impedimenti.

§ 1. Any marriage contracted in spite of an impediment of ecclesiastical law, or for lack of the legal form, may be revalidated in radice, provided a naturally sufficient, though juridically ineffective consent was given and continues.

Case: Gemma, not baptized but held to be a Catholic

19 Pius VII, Aug. 14, 1801; Feb. 7, 1809; Pius VIII, March 25, 1830; Secret. Status, March 27, 1830; S. O., March 11, 1868 (Coll., nn. 811, 1326).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by all, married James, a Catholic, in the form prescribed by the Church. Afterwards she secretly approaches the priest to whom she reveals her condition (of not being baptized), demands Baptism immediately, which is conferred, and asks that the secret be kept, especially towards her husband.[20] This marriage was revalidated, because

(a) The impediment (disparity of worship) was of ecclesiastical law, purely;

(b) The consent was given as for marriage, which is evident from the fact that the parties were married in church, and it continues, for she asks for Baptism;

(c) The consent was juridically ineffective, because the impediment rendered it impossible for it to produce the marriage union. Of course a merely fornicarious consent could not be looked upon as a marital consent. But that a consent was fornicarious if the semblance of marriage was observed, would require strong proof. It would not be enough that the party would like to get a divorce, or that one of them asked for a decree of separation. But if one of them, or both, would obtain a decree of separation under the plea of nullity, the semblance of a marriage could hardly be upheld.[21]

§ 2. A marriage contracted with an impediment of the natural or divine law, even if the impediment afterwards disappears, the Church does not revalidate in radice, not even from the moment the impediment has ceased.

Card. Gasparri refers to a case solved by the Holy Office.[22] James (a non-Catholic) lived in concubinage for five years, until 1898, when he contracted a civil 20 S. O., Aug. 22, 1906 ad IV (Covington; cfr. Anal. Eccl., t. XV, p. 8 f.).

21 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 566, n. 659.

22 March 8, 1900 (Coll., n. 2078); more general, S. O., March 2, 1904 (Coll., n. 2188).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marriage with his concubine. Two children were born before that date, and one of them died soon after birth, March 29, 1896. James had, in 1896, to undergo an operation, which rendered him completely impotent.[23] Internal marital consent, and, after 1898, also the semblance and species of marriage seemed to exist and continue. The Holy Office decided that no revalidation in radice was possible because the natural impediment of impotence was in the way. To inquire further into the wherefor would conjure up the controversy concerning the necessity of the renewal of consent. But we cannot help observing that the answer of the S. Poenit. of April 25, 1890, alleged above, seems to be contrary to can. 1139, § 2, at least in its general wording: "Ecclesia non sanat." We understood that decision as a partial but true sanatio.[24]

WHEN RENEWAL OF CONSENT IS IMPOSSIBLE

CAN. 1140

§ 1. Si in utraque vel alterutra parte deficiat consensus, matrimonium nequit sanari in radice, sive consensus ab initio defuerit, sive ab initio praestitus, postea fuerit revocatus.

§ 2. Quod si consensus ab initio quidem defuerit, sed postea praestitus fuerit, sanatio concedi potest a momento praestiti consensus.

§ 1. If the consent of one or both parties is wanting, the marriage cannot be revalidated in radice, regardless 23 Both testicles were removed (utroque teste).

24 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 561, n. 657, perceived the difficulty, and tried to solve it by the expedient that the sanatio was impropria et relativa, which is true to some extent, but it was invalid from the moment the impedimentum ligaminis ceased, which is denied by our canon. No wonder the decision of the S. Poenit. is not quoted by Card. Gasparri.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of whether the consent was wanting from the beginning, or was given at the beginning and afterwards withdrawn.

§ 2. If the consent was wanting in the beginning, but given later, the sanatio may be granted from the moment the consent was given.

The Bishop of Covington had asked the Holy Office for an explanation concerning the faculties granted to the bishops of the U. S.: May the faculty of revalidating a marriage in radice be applied if both parties know of the nullity of the marriage, but one of them cannot be induced to renew the consent, and if both parties are unconscious of the nullity of their marriage, provided one of them is afterwards informed of the sanatio and its effect? The answer to the first question was: Negative, unless it is evident that a true consent was given under the species of matrimony and that this consent continues on both sides. The answer to the second question was merely: Negative.[25] From this it appears that a positive remonstrance against the renewal of the consent amounts to an interruption of the same. Note the phrase, species matrimonii, which may be verified, not only when marriage is contracted with due regard to the ecclesiastical form, but also when the conditions of a true marriage are verified; in other words, when the consent given was a truly marital one, and both parties were regarded as husband and wife.[26] It is difficult to understand how James and Gemma may have a true marital consent, though both are aware of the nullity of their marriage. But we suppose they are either unaware of the effect of an invalidating impediment, or are not convinced of the 25 S. O., Aug. 22, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., t. XV, p. 8).

26 S. O., Dec. 9, 1874 ad 18 (Coll., n. 1427); Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 20, 8; Id., Quaestiones Canonicae, Quaestio 174.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reality of that effect, or do not believe in the power of the Church to establish impediments.[27] Faulty education or lack of opportunity for gathering information may also be a cause of ignorance. But be this as it may, a marital consent must be supposed and must precede, otherwise no sanatio is possible, for what does not exist cannot be revived. Wherefore, as § 2 says, revalidation reaches back only to the moment when the marital consent was given.

BY WHOM A SANATIO MAY BE GRANTED

CAN. 1141

Sanatio in radice concedi unice potest ab Apostolica Sede.

A sanatio in radice may be granted only by the Apostolic See. No direct traces of this power are extant before the fourteenth century. Boniface VIII seems to have been the first pope who granted such a dispensation. After the Council of Trent the practice became more frequent, especially in countries (France, Japan, etc.) with turbulent conditions.[28]

Although this power is reserved to the Pope, he may and does communicate it to others. Our Ordinaries have it in virtue of the decree of the S. C. Consistorialis of April 25, 1918, which says that they may revalidate marriages invalidly contracted on account of a minor diriment impediment.[29] A decree of the S. C. Consistorialis, of Aug. 2, 1918, extends this faculty to marriages invalidly contracted ob impedimenta maiora.[30] How long these faculties will be continued (they were granted "praesentis belli causa") is a question which we are unable to answer; but see what is said under can. 1048.

27 Wernz, l. c., Vol. 2, p. 563.
28 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 556 f.
29 A. Ap. S., X, 190 ff.
30 A. Ap. S., X, 363 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER XII

SECOND MARRIAGES

CAN. 1142

Licet casta viduitas honorabilior sit, secundae tamen et ulteriores nuptiae validae et licitae sunt, firmo praescripto can. 1069, § 2.

CAN. 1143

Mulier cui semel benedictio sollemnis data sit, nequit in subsequentibus nuptiis eam iterum accipere.

Although a chaste widowhood is more honorable, second and further marriages are valid and lawful, provided the former marriage has been duly dissolved and the free status proved.

A woman who has once received the solemn nuptial blessing cannot receive it again.

In the first eight or nine centuries second marriages were not favored. The Penitential Books[1] are rather severe in meting out public penances for "bigamy," as second marriage was called. There is a foundation for this idea in Holy Writ,[2] which, while it does not command, strongly counsels the faithful to abstain from a second marriage because of the typical union between the 1 Wasserschleben, l. c., pp. 148, 179, etc.

2 Rom. 7, 3; 1 Cor. 7, 8, 39 f; 1 Tim. 5, 3 ff. The Montanists, Novatians and Waldenses (cfr. Innoc. III, "Eius exemplo," Dec. 18, 1208) made it a command; some early writers, like Irenaeus and Origen, use rather strong language against second marriage.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Word of God and His Church. Therefore, also, a higher degree of perfection was attributed to honorable widowhood. As to widowers, title 21 of book I of the Decretals debars them from the sacred ministry, and the irregularity arising from bigamy is still a law.[3] However, the former penalties have been omitted from the Decretals, which permit second marriages, provided the former marriage tie has been duly dissolved and its dissolution proved.[4] No definite time is prescribed for mourning by ecclesiastical law, as the Roman law[5] enjoined and some modern civil codes[6] still maintain.

Can. 1143, then, rules, in accordance with the Decretals,[7] that the solemn nuptial blessing is not to be imparted to a widow — not a widower — who has received the same in a former marriage. Note that what is here forbidden is only the solemn nuptial blessing, which is given during Mass (whether pro sponso et sponsa or in the Mass of the Day) with the proper orations and special prayers; not the blessing of the Roman Ritual.[8] This solemn blessing may and should be imparted even to a widow, if she has not received it at her first marriage, even though she may be "in a family way."[9] For the purpose of this blessing (a mere sacramental)[10] is to

3 Cfr. can. 984.

4 C. 2, X, IV, 21; how it is proved see under canons 1031 and 1069.

5 Cod. VI, 40; Nov. 22, c. 43 f.

6 The Swiss Code, art. 103, requires 300 days.

7 Cc. 1, 3, X, IV, 21; for the Greeks also Bened. XIV "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742.

8 S. C. P. F., Sept. 21, 1843 (Coll., n. 971); S. O., Aug. 31, 1881 (Coll., n. 1557); S. Rit. C., June 30, 1896 ad VI (Decreta Auth., n. 2923).

9 S. C. P. F., July 21, 1943 ad 3 (Coll., n. 932).

10 We hardly believe the statement to be correct (Leitner, l. c., p. 527, ed. 1) that the couple, if they do not receive the nuptial blessing, are deprived of the graces flowing from the Sacrament. The sacramental grace is attached to the Sacrament, and the latter cannot be separated from the contract. Hence, supposing there is no obex to the Sacrament, the grace is received by valid consent.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

convey, we might say in a tangible way, the necessary graces for the fulfillment of a mother's most important duties. It is for this reason also that the wife is chiefly and peculiarly mentioned in those prayers.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

MATRIMONIAL TRIALS
(Book IV, Title XX, Can. 1960-1992)

CHAPTER I

THE COMPETENT COURT

COMPETENCY OF THE CHURCH

CAN. 1960

Causae matrimoniales inter baptizatos iure proprio et exclusivo ad iudicem ecclesiasticum spectant.

CAN. 1961

Causae de effectibus matrimonii mere civilibus, si principaliter agantur, pertinent ad civilem magistratum ad normam can. 1016; sed si incidenter et accessorie, possunt etiam a iudice ecclesiastico ex propria potestate cognosci ac definiri.

Matrimonial cases between baptized persons belong by proper and exclusive right to the ecclesiastical judge.

Cases which concern merely the civil effects of marriage, if these are the principal cause at issue, belong to the civil court; but if the civil effects are only incidental and accessory, they may be taken cognizance of and settled by the ecclesiastical judge in virtue of his inherent power.

To what has been said under Can. 1016 little remains to be added here. The settling of controversies concerning

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a given subject certainly belongs to him to whom the subject itself belongs. As Christian marriage is a strictly sacred thing, a sacrament, matrimonial trials, because of their intimate connection with the sacramental dignity, must be brought before the ecclesiastical judge. For "whatever in things human is of a sacred character, whatever belongs either of its own nature or by reason of the end to which it is referred, to the salvation of souls or the worship of God, is subject to the power and judgment of the Church."[1] This right belongs properly to the Church because marriage between baptized persons is properly called a sacred thing and the Church does not borrow this authority from the civil power, but derives it from her divine origin and constitution.[2] It is the exclusive right of the Church because what belongs to her by divine institution she cannot let slip from her jurisdiction, nor can she divide her power with another, it being as indivisible as sovereignty. Of course, conflicts may and do arise between the ecclesiastical and the civil power, in as much as the one defends and upholds what the other rejects and invalidates, in as much as the civil power spurns and punishes what the Church blesses and sanctifies, in as much as the State grants civil effects to a union which is declared incapable of obtaining civil and spiritual effects by the Church.[3] Such conflicts arise either from misunderstanding or failure to realize the innate power of the Church. In itself such a contradiction should be impossible, since God is the author of both powers, human and divine.[4] By good will and mutual confidence, and especially by the conclusion of treaties founded on mutual trust and loyalty — not mere "scraps

1 Leo XIII, "Immortale Dei," Nov. 1, 1885 (Wynne, Great Encycl., p. 115).

2 Trid., sess. 24, can. 12, de mat.

3 S. O., July 6, 1817 (Coll., n. 725).

4 Leo XIII, "Immortale Dei," l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of paper"— such conflicts and misgivings can mostly be avoided.

But the question arises: What is the duty of Catholic magistrates and lawyers when they act as judges or attorneys in matrimonial cases which require a bill of divorce? This question was settled by the Holy Office as follows: Considering the serious circumstances of things, times and places (in France), it may be tolerated that civil magistrates and attorneys pronounce sentence or defend in matrimonial cases, provided they openly profess the Catholic doctrine (as proposed above), never pronounce, solicit or provoke a sentence repugnant to divine or ecclesiastical law, and in difficult cases have recourse to their Ordinary or to the Apostolic Penitentiary.[5] As was natural, French interpreters of this decision tried to give it a most lenient construction. Hence the Holy Office was again approached: Does a judge comply with the condition set forth above if he mentally abstracts from the validity of the marriage according to ecclesiastical laws and simply applies the civil law and pronounces a divorce, though he firmly intends to break the union only as far as civil effects and the civil contract are concerned? In other words: Is a judge allowed to make a mental restriction, which inwardly conforms to the doctrine and practice of the Church, but outwardly and in fact contradicts the same? The answer of course was, "No."[6] The same decision says that neither could the mayor, under the same restriction, pronounce a divorce if the marriage was ecclesiastically valid, nor allow the

[5] S. O., June 25, 1885 (Coll., n. 1636).

[6] S. O., May 27, 1886 (Coll., l. c.). Concerning marriages of such as are not under Catholic jurisdiction, the Church abstains from judging them. However we believe a Catholic judge would be allowed to pronounce sentence on such a marriage, because no strictly prohibitive law now exists with regard to them.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

divorced party to remarry civilly. The consequence is — also for Catholic judges and attorneys in the United States and elsewhere — that they are never allowed to pronounce a sentence of divorce upon a validly married Catholic couple as long as the Church has not declared their union invalid. If the ecclesiastical authorities have rendered a verdict of invalidity, the civil judge may pronounce sentence of divorce and a Catholic lawyer may defend the case. The same rule applies to separation, which also, according to Catholic doctrine and as expressly stated in the above mentioned decree of the Holy Office, belongs to the Church. To the latter is furthermore reserved, at least a priori, the legitimacy of offspring.

Can. 1961 determines, first and above all, what the civil magistrate may do. He may decide as to the civil effects of marriage, such as questions concerning property, civil rank and name, inheritance and similar purely worldly affairs.[7] But the text says: si principaliter agantur. This means that the civil effects, for instance, concerning property, must be the main question at issue. If the civil effects are concerned in a suit only incidentally and accessorily, whilst the principal and main quarrel concerns either the validity of the marriage, or separation, or the legitimacy of the children, then the ecclesiastical judge, in his capacity as such, is entitled to decide. For the rule is that the accessory follows the principal.[8] It stands to reason, however, that the ecclesiastical judge should either have his sentence ratified and sanctioned by the civil court, or abstain entirely from passing judgment upon civil matters, for the reason that he cannot compel acknowledgment of his sentence by the civil court.

7 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, 5, X, IV, 17 (hereditary quarrels); cc. 3, 5, 7, X, IV, 20 (dowry).

8 Reg. 42 in 6°: "Accessorium naturam sequi congruit principalis."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE ROMAN COURT

CAN. 1962

Causas matrimoniales ad eos spectantes de quibus in can. 1557, § 1, n. 1, illa Sacra Congregatio vel illud Tribunal aut specialis ea Commissio exclusive cognoscet, cui eas toties quoties Summus Pontifex delegaverit; causas dispensationis super matrimonio rato et non consummato, Sacra Congregatio de disciplina Sacramentorum; causas vero quae referuntur ad privilegium Paulinum, Sacra Congregatio S. Officii.

CAN. 1963

§ 1. Quare nullus iudex inferior potest processum in causis dispensationis super rato instruere, nisi Sedes Apostolica facultatem eidem fecerit.

§ 2. Si tamen iudex competens auctoritate propria iudicium peregerit de matrimonio nullo ex capite impotentiae et ex eo, non impotentiae, sed nondum consummati matrimonii emerserit probatio, omnia acta ad Sacram Congregationem transmittantur, quae iis uti poterit ad sententiam super rato et non consummato ferendam.

Leaving aside the first clause of can. 1962, which decrees that the matrimonial cases of sovereigns and their lawful heirs are reserved to the Holy See,[9] or to the S. Congregation or a special Commission exclusively and purposely assigned by the Pontiff, we note:

1. The competent Roman Court is the S. Congregation of the Sacraments, whenever there is question of dispensing from a ratified but not yet consummated marriage. This court is so exclusively competent that, as can. 1963 rules, no inferior judge, hence no local Ordinary, can institute a canonical trial in such cases unless the Holy See has granted faculties for that purpose. Local Ordinaries may receive this faculty from the Holy See (S. C. Sacr.) either habitually or for single cases. But it is not given by the decree "Proxima sacra," April 25, 1918, nor by that of Aug. 25, 1918. And since the former faculties have ceased, the Ordinaries must be expressly reinvested with this faculty. When they receive the faculty from the Holy See, it may be well to look up can. 199, which says that jurisdictional power granted by the Holy See may be subdelegated, unless it is granted for personal reasons. If personal reasons are excluded, the Ordinary may subdelegate the trial to another ecclesiastic.[10]

[9] S. C. Sacr., March 7, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 147): all dispensations from diriment as well as prohibitive impediments are reserved.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

However, the local Ordinaries may indirectly be concerned and empowered to institute a trial, which may lead to a sentence of a dispensation from a ratified marriage. This happens when a case of impotency, which the Ordinary is entitled to take cognizance of in virtue of his own authority, is brought before him. If the physicians and nurses and other witnesses required in that case are unable to prove the existence of impotency, but merely the fact that the marriage had not been consummated, the minutes must be sent to the S. Congregation, which may make use of the same to pass judgment concerning the matrimonium ratum non consummatum. The S. Congregation may, iure proprio, i. e., without special commission

10 If the Ordinary has no faculties, he may refer the case directly to the S. C. dei Sacramenti, Cancellaria Apostolica, Corso Vittorio Emmanuele, Roma, Italy. If he sends the case to his agent, the letter must be well sealed and not opened by the agent, who has merely to forward it to the Secretary or the Card. Prefect of the S. C. (S. C. Consist., Nov. 25, 1908; A. Ap. S., I, 211).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from the Pope, transmit the case to the S. Romana Rota, which shall investigate the fact of non-consummation.[11] Of course, the S. R. Rota cannot grant a dispensation super matrimonio rato, as this is strictly reserved to the S. Congregation of the Sacraments. When sending in the acta bearing on the factum non-consummationis, the Ordinary should add a petition based on canonical, or at least solid, reasons why the dispensation is asked.[12]

2. The second Congregation mentioned in can. 1962 is the Holy Office. But here only the Pauline Privilege is concerned, whilst disparity of worship and mixed religion[13] are omitted. The reason for this omission is that only the most exclusive matters are referred to in our canon. Besides, as noted under can. 1121, § 2, there is no question of a real dispensation in the matter of the privilege of faith, but only of a declaration, and such no Ordinary is allowed to give. Hence if there is a doubt whether the interpellation must be made, recourse should be had to the Holy Office.

THE DIOCESAN COURT

CAN. 1964

In aliis causis matrimonialibus iudex competens est iudex loci in quo matrimonium celebratum est aut in quo pars conventa vel, si una sit acatholica, pars catholica domicilium vel quasi-domicilium habet.

In other matrimonial cases the competent judge is the judge of the respective place (or diocese) where the marriage was celebrated, or where the defendant has his domicile or quasi-domicile, or, if one of the parties is a 11 S. C. Cons., Jan. 28, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 213).

12 S. O., Aug. 6, 1890, n. 7 (Coll. P. F., n. 1737).

13 Cfr. can. 247, § 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

non-Catholic, where the Catholic party has his or her domicile or quasi-domicile.

The phrase "in other cases" signifies that trials of nullity arising either from one of the twelve diriment impediments or from defective consent or non-observance of the prescribed form, may all be brought before the local ecclesiastical judge, who shall also hear cases concerning the prohibitive impediments, separation, and legitimation of offspring.

By the term judge is understood the Ordinary of the diocese, because he is the iudex ordinarius of the place.[14] Abbates Nullius are not excluded from acting as judges in matrimonial matters.[15] The Vicar-General[16] as well as the Vicar-Capitular or Administrator are also entitled to conduct such a trial. But inferior prelates, no matter how many titles and insignia they may have, do not fall under the category of Ordinaries and therefore have no right to try such cases.

The question, who is the Ordinary, is settled by the Code when it states the two reasons which decide competency. The first is the ratio contractus[17] or the place where the marriage was celebrated, because marriage is a species of contract. This reason may be invoked at any time, for the fact of having contracted marriage in a certain place remains. The second reason is the domicile of the defendant or of the pars conventa, according to the well-known axiom: "Actor sequitur forum rei." Equal to the domicile in our case is the quasi-domicile, and no preference may be claimed. Otherwise the wife gener-

14 Trid., sess. 24, c. 20, de ref.

15 Can. 323, C. 12, X, V, 31, mentions abbots who usurped a power not their own, but they are not abbates nullius. Leitner, l. c., p. 550, is wrong in excluding these abbots from matrimonial trials; cfr. Feije, l. c., n. 586, p. 474.

16 Concerning the marriage of conscience, see can. 1104.

17 C. 20, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ally follows the forum or court of her husband according to our Code.[18] But the Instruction of 1883 makes a two-fold exception, which is admitted, at least impliedly, by the Code.[19] If the husband and wife have been legitimately separated, and the former wishes to petition for annullment of the marriage, he must do so before the Ordinary in whose diocese the wife has her domicile or quasi-domicile, because by a separation she regains or obtains her own domicile. If the wife demands the annullment, she must do so before the Ordinary in whose diocese the husband has his domicile. Hence in case of a separation the old principle holds: Actor sequitur reum.[20] The other exception is desertion. If the husband maliciously deserts his wife, she may institute proceedings before the bishop in whose diocese she has her domicile. But if she deserts her husband, she must follow the court of the husband, or, in other words, apply to the bishop in whose diocese the husband has his domicile or quasi-domicile.[21] Note that the monthly stay is not mentioned here and may therefore not be applied.

As to mixed marriages — and this holds good of disparity of worship as well as of mixed marriages properly so-called — the Code states that the domicile or quasi-domicile of the Catholic party decides who is the competent judge. Therefore the Ordinary in whose diocese the Catholic party has a domicile, is also entitled to judge concerning the free status of a heretical party who has been divorced by a sentence of the civil court. But if the non-Catholic party had been received into the Church, the domicile of the husband would determine the competency of the Ordinary.[22]

18 Cfr. can. 93.

19 Inst. 1883 (Coll. P. F., n. 1587), for the U. S.

20 Cfr. cc. 5, 8, X, II, 2.

21 See Smith, Marriage Process, p. 51.

22 S. O., June 30, 1892 (Coll., n. 1799); June 23, 1903 (Anal. Eccl., t. 11, 381).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

After the canonical or judicial citation has been served on the parties, no change of domicile or quasi-domicile by either of them shall in any way change the competency of the judge so chosen or established.[23] Hence, for instance, though the parties, or one of them, would leave the diocese of St. Joseph after having been duly summoned, and reside in the diocese of Kansas City, the Ordinary of St. Joseph would have to finish the trial in the first instance, until a sentence were pronounced.

WANT OF CONSENT

CAN. 1965

Si matrimonium accusatur ex defectu consensus, curet ante omnia iudex ut monitionibus opportunis partem, cuius consensus deesse affirmatur, ad consensum renovandum inducat; si ex defectu formae substantialis vel ex impedimento dirimenti quod dispensari potest et solet, partes inducere studeat ad consensum in forma legitima renovandum vel ad dispensationem petendam.

The Code now exhorts the judge to endeavor to bring about a peaceful settlement before legal procedure is instituted. First, of course, he should ascertain the cause of the dispute. If the point of dissension is lack of consent, for instance, error, compulsion or fear, or conditional consent, which causes the parties to have the marriage declared invalid, the judge should try to induce the party whose consent is asserted to have been deficient to renew the same. For this purpose he may await a moment when the parties are less excited and more favorably inclined toward each other.[24] Besides, the scandal they give may be held up to them, etc.

23 Instr. of 1883, n. 2.

24 S. O., Dec. 9, 1874 (Coll., n. 1427, ad. 18): opportunitate capta alicuius momenti effusionis benevolentiae.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the reason for having the marriage declared invalid arises from want of the prescribed form or from a diriment impediment from which a dispensation can be and generally is granted, the judge should make every effort to have the parties renew their consent in the form prescribed or ask for the necessary dispensation. Of course, if the form was not observed, the consent was invalid, and must therefore be renewed in the presence of the pastor or Ordinary or a delegated priest and two witnesses. If the marriage was invalid, not by reason of lack of form, but because of a diriment impediment, the parties should be urged to ask for a dispensation. If they are willing to do so, and the Ordinary has the faculty to grant the same, it should be applied there and then. If he has not the faculty, the parties must be told to wait until it is obtained, and in the meanwhile to abstain from conjugal intercourse. This would be the easiest way to settle the case. If only one party knows of the impediment, the chapter on revalidation must be looked up. If they insist upon an ecclesiastical trial, this must be conducted according to the rules that follow.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

CONSTITUTION OF THE TRIBUNAL

THE JUDGE

CAN. 1966

Firmo praescripto can. 1576, § 1, n. 1, unicus est iudex instructor in inquisitione pro dispensatione super matrimonio rato et non consummato.

With the sole exception of the matrimonium ratum et non consummatum, which requires only one judge to conduct the investigation, a collegiate tribunal of three judges must be set up for every matrimonial case or trial, and no privilege or custom may be claimed to offset this law.[1] Henceforth every diocesan court should have a board of three judges for matrimonial trials. They may either be chosen for each case as it comes up for decision, or elected for a certain term or turnus from the synodal judges, i. e., those chosen at the synod.[2] The reason for constituting a collegiate tribunal is evidently to be sought in greater efficiency and impartiality and in the seriousness of the matter.[3] How these judges are to proceed is explained in can. 205–207.[4] We will only mention that they must act as a body and no one is allowed to decide the case without the co-operation of the others.

1 Thus can. 1576, § 1, n. 1, which simply says causae matrimonii, matrimonial cases, not only such as touch the marriage tie — as one might be led to infer from Woywod's translation — but all, even those of simple separation.

2 Can. 1576, § 4.

3 C. 20, X, I, 29.

4 See Vol. II, p. 185 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE DEFENSOR VINCULI

CAN. 1967

Sive agatur de nullitate matrimonii, sive de probandis inconsummatione et causis ad dispensandum super rato, citari debet defensor vinculi matrimonialis, ad normam can. 1586.

Each diocese must have a defensor vinculi, who should be summoned in cases which concern either the nullity of a marriage or the gathering of proofs for non-consummation and dispensation from a marriage ratified but not consummated. This rule had been inculcated by Benedict XIV, who emphatically insisted on such a defender being chosen by the Ordinary of each diocese. His qualities are described in the same Constitution. He must be well versed in the law and of acknowledged probity. The bishop may remove him and appoint another in his place if he is prevented from taking charge of any case.[5] The defensor must make oath into the hands of the bishop to perform his duties faithfully, but this need be done only once, namely, when he enters upon his office.[6]

DUTIES OF THE DEFENSOR VINCULI

CAN. 1968

Defensoris vinculi est:

1.° Examini partium, testium et peritorum adesse; exhibere iudici interrogatoria clausa et obsignata, in actu examinis a iudice aperienda, et partibus aut testibus proponenda; novas interrogationes, ab examine emergentes, iudici suggerere;

5 "Dei miseratione," Nov. 3, 1741, § 6; see can. 1589.

6 Can. 364. The Instruction of 1883, n. 10, requires that the oath be given by touching the book of the Gospels.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Articulos a partibus propositos perpendere, eisque, quatenus opus sit, contradicere; documenta a partibus exhibita recognoscere;

3.° Animadversiones contra matrimonii nullitatem ac probationes pro validitate aut pro consummatione matrimonii scribere et allegare, eaque omnia deducere, quae ad matrimonium tuendum utilia censuerit.

1. It is the duty of the defensor vinculi to be present at the examination of the parties, witnesses, and experts; to present to the judges in a closed and sealed envelope the questions to be opened by them in the act of examination, and to be proposed to the parties and witnesses; and to suggest to the judges new questions which may arise from the cross-examination.

2. He has to weigh the arguments proposed by the parties, and if necessary to contradict them, and to review the papers offered.

3. He is to set down in writing and to point out observations against the nullity of the marriage and in favor of its validity or consummation, and in general to make use of all lawful means which he deems conducive for the defence of the marriage bond.

RIGHTS OF THE DEFENSOR VINCULI

CAN. 1969

Defensori vinculi ius esto:

1.° Semper et quolibet causae momento acta processus, etsi nondum publicati, invisere; novos terminos ad scripta perficienda flagitare, prudenti iudicis arbitrio prorogandos;

2.° De omnibus probationibus vel allegationibus ita certiorem fieri, ut contradicendi facultate uti possit;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Petere ut alii testes inducantur vel iidem iterum examini subiiciantur, processu etiam absoluto vel publicato, novasque animadversiones edere;

4.° Exigere ut alia acta, quae ipse suggesserit, conficiantur, nisi tribunal unanimi suffragio dissentiat.

1. He is entitled to inspect, at any stage of the proceedings, the minutes of the trial, even though they have not yet been published, and to demand prorogation, which is to be granted according to the discretion of the judge, in order to complete his records.

2. He is entitled to be informed of all the proofs and allegations made, in order to be able to contradict them.

3. He may demand that new witnesses be introduced, or that such as have already been on the witness-stand be re-examined, even though the minutes of the trial have been completed and published; and he may also make new observations.

4. Finally he may demand that other acts, suggested by himself, be drawn up, unless the tribunal by a unanimous vote objects to this demand.

It is necessary to add that the defender must be summoned to all judicial proceedings and sessions of the court, otherwise there is danger of the acts being null and void.[7] How carefully everything should be observed that pertains to the office and rights of the defender, is apparent from many cases decided in Rome. In one instance[8] the acts were attacked and had to be revalidated on several points because the defender had not delivered to the judge or notary the points of examination in a closed and sealed envelope, had omitted to summon some witnesses in order to testify to the relationship of the 7 S. C. C., Aug. 22, 1840 (Coll. P. F., n. 911); Instruction of 1883, n. 10.

8 S. C. C., Ventimil., May, 1888 (A. S. S., t. 21, 162 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

septimae manus, and was absent when the witnesses were examined. It is therefore required that the acts should contain all the minutes as described above, duly examined and approved by the defender, that he was never absent from any session, or if he was absent, that he afterwards took cognizance of all the proceedings.[9]

9 Instruction of 1883, n. 11. Instructive for defenders are the cases contained in the Thesaurus S. C. C., also the cases published in the A. S. S. and Analecta Ecclesiastica, as well as the Regulae servandae in judiciis apud S. Rom. Rotae Tribunal in A. Ap. S., II, 783 ff.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

WHO MAY ATTACK MARRIAGES AND ASK FOR A DISPENSATION FROM A RATIFIED MARRIAGE

CAN. 1970

Tribunal collegiale nullam causam matrimonialem cognoscere vel definire potest, nisi regularis accusatio vel iure facta petitio praecesserit.

The board of judges cannot take cognizance of, nor decide, any matrimonial case, unless a regular accusation or a legal petition has preceded.

What a "regular accusation" means is determined in the following canon, which specifies the persons who are capable of "accusing" a marriage. A legal or lawfully drawn up petition would imply persons capable of petitioning.[1] However, since a petition implies the grant of a favor, it is evident that the petitioner should be capable of making and accepting the petition, and that it be addressed to the proper authority. Thus in case of a mixed marriage the Catholic party must make the petition and send it to the bishop or vicar-general or chancellor of the diocese in which the petitioner has his domicile or quasi-domicile.

WHO MAY BE PLAINTIFF

CAN. 1971

§ 1. Habiles ad accusandum sunt:

1.° Coniuges, in omnibus causis separationis et nullitatis, nisi ipsi fuerint impedimenti causa;

1 Instruction of 1883, n. 3. Perhaps the two terms convey one and the same idea: the libellus litis or writ of petition.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

2.° Promotor iustitiae in impedimentis natura sua publicis.

§ 2. Reliqui omnes, etsi consanguinei, non habent ius matrimonia accusandi, sed tantummodo nullitatem matrimonii Ordinario vel promotori iustitiae denuntiandi.

The parties, therefore, should draw up a short and clear statement setting forth the reasons why they wish to have the marriage declared invalid, together with a request that it be declared null and void. They may make this petition orally before the court, whose secretary has to put it down in writing. But the petition may also be filed for separation only, which is a process essentially distinct from that aiming at a declaration of nullity. Canon 1971 establishes who may be plaintiff, i.e., ask for a bill of separation or divorce by having the marriage declared invalid.

1. And first, either one or both of the contracting parties may present the bill to the episcopal court. The parties alone are admitted to attack their marriage on the ground of defective consent, whether this defect be caused by violence and fear, or error, or lack of will, or unfulfilled conditions.[2] If one party alone is conscious of defective consent, that party alone can lawfully present the petition. Concerning impotency, too, the only competent plaintiffs are the parties themselves, because they alone can know the fact and they alone are interested in the matter.[3] The Code, however, does not limit the parties' right to these cases. Hence any impediment which was, without their own fault, placed in the way to their lawful union may be used as a reason for impugning it.

2 Instruction of 1883, n. 36.

3 Ibid., n. 46 (Coll., Vol. II, p. 179).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The text says: "nisi ipsi fuerint impedimenti causa." What this means is not clear. A causa may be either efficient, or final, or formal, etc. It is evident that the formal cause of an impediment is the law, either divine or human. A final cause can hardly be assigned in this connection, for it would be setting up an impediment to hinder a matrimonial union. Hence nothing else is left but the efficient cause. In other words, either one or both of the parties may have caused or produced the impediment. This may have been done either maliciously or without malice, sinfully or without sin. In the line of the twelve impediments, a sinful cause would be found only in rape, crime, and public honesty, because these three are really founded on unlawful actions due to human agency. There might also be question of a cause, though a purely material one, in cases of mixed religion and spiritual relationship. For the impediments of disparity of worship and mixed religion (though the latter is only prohibitive) arise from a union between two persons whom the Church has declared incapable of contracting marriage. Spiritual relationship exists between the parties if one was sponsor to the other, which may happen when one is baptized shortly before marriage.[4] We believe the intention of the lawgiver was to restrict that cause to a malicious or sinful, or at least deceitful action. In that case it would be merely an application of the well-known axiom that no one should be benefitted by a fraudulent act committed by himself ("fraus sua nemini patrocinari debet.") [5]

2. Besides the parties themselves, the promotor iustitiae or prosecuting attorney of the diocesan court may attack

4 We know of a case where a priest, by sheer distraction, asked the bridegroom to be sponsor for his bride. But luckily the former did not touch his godchild physically and hence contracted no relationship.

5 C. 15, X, I, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a marriage because of impediments which are by nature public. Can. 1037 defines an impediment to be public when it can be proved in court. With the exception perhaps of impotency and crime, all the impediments are more or less of a public character. For certainly age, ligamen, consanguinity, affinity, spiritual and legal relationship, religious profession, sacred orders can be proved by documents, and public honesty presupposes notoriety. As to mixed religion there may be a real doubt, because the baptismal records of non-Catholic denominations are often carelessly kept. We said with the exception perhaps of impotency and crime, for even impotency might become known and proved, especially in case of castrated males and eunuchs. Yet since the Instruction of 1883 seems to exclude in cases of impotency all but the parties themselves, we hardly believe that the promotor iustitiae would have to proceed against them ex officio.[6] As to crime, a different view must be taken, because not only is this impediment of a public character, but the crime itself is directed against the public welfare. Hence if the attorney should have strong indications as to the existence of a crime, and especially if there were a rumor pointing to the existence of that impediment, he would have to order further, but cautious, investigation to be made, until the truth would appear or the doubt disappear.[7]

3. All others, even blood relations, have no right to attack a marriage, though they may denounce the nullity of a marriage to the Ordinary or promoter of justice. Who are these "reliqui omnes"? In the first place the relatives of the couple, because they are supposed to know better than outsiders of the existence of an impediment.[8]

6 For inst., male singers of an advanced age with a soprano or alto voice cannot but be suspected; cfr. Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XI, 7, 2.

7 Instruction of 1883, n. 3.

8 C. 2, C. 35, q. 6; c. 3, X, IV, 18.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Besides these, every Catholic is allowed to "denounce"—not "accuse"—the nullity of a marriage. From this privilege no one is excluded. Hence the old law [9] which excluded from the right of denouncing such as acted from dishonest motives or had wilfully neglected denunciation at the time the banns were published, must be corrected.

ACCUSATION POST MORTEM

CAN. 1972

Matrimonium, quod, utroque coniuge vivente, non fuerit accusatum, post mortem alterutrius vel utriusque coniugis ita praesumitur validum fuisse, ut contra hanc praesumptionem non admittatur probatio, nisi incidenter oriatur quaestio.

A marriage not "accused" during the life-time of both parties is after the death of either one or both presumed to have been valid, and against this presumption no proof is admitted, except as an incidental question or side-issue. The chief reason for this canon is to protect the legitimacy and hereditary rights of the offspring. Besides, it seems improper [10] to admit one to accusation after the death of a party who may be innocently slandered. Hence the S. Congregation could confidently assert in 1842 that never before had an accusation against the validity of a marriage been admitted after the death of one of the parties.[11] The reasons for such post mortem trials are generally to be sought in personal interests and material gain accruing from inheritance. However, says our text, if the question was raised incidentally, it might be admitted. Thus if the principal question or point

[9] Cfr. X, IV, 18.
[10] C. 7, X, IV, 17.
[11] S. C. C., Sept. 17, 1842; July 30, Dec. 3, 1735 (Richter, Trid., p. 278, n. 134; n. 135).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would be the legitimacy of the offspring, the next or incidental question would be the validity of the marriage.[12] But it may be added that the conjectural proofs for the validity of a marriage which is dissolved by death and impugned by some near relative after the death of one party, are readily admitted, especially if not the marriage tie itself, but its consequences are at issue.[13]

CAN. 1973

Soli coniuges ius habent petendi dispensationem super matrimonio rato et non consummato.

The married parties alone have the right to petition for a dispensation from a marriage ratified but not consummated.[14]

12 Cfr. c. 7, X, IV, 17.

13 S. C. C., Barcin., Dec. 16, 1893 (A. S. S., t. 26, 407 ff.)—a very interesting case for defenders.

14 Of course the petition may be made by others, but it must be made in the name of the parties and at their request.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

LEGAL PROCEEDINGS

ARTICLE I

WITNESSES

CAN. 1974

Consanguinei et affines de quibus in can. 1757, § 3, n. 3, habentur testes habiles in causis suorum propinquorum.

Blood relations and affines, although otherwise excluded, may be admitted as witnesses in matrimonial cases of their kin, because these, as a Palea of the Decree says,[1] know their genealogy or pedigree better than strangers.

TESTIMONIUM SEPTIMAE MANUS

CAN. 1975

§ 1. In causis impotentiae vel inconsummationis, nisi de impotentia vel inconsummatione aliunde certo constet, debet uterque coniux testes, qui septimae manus audiunt, inducere, sanguine aut affinitate sibi coniunctos, sin minus vicinos bonae famae, aut alioquin de re edoctos, qui iurare possint de ipsorum coniugum probitate, et praesertim de veracitate circa rem in controversiam deductam; quibus iudex ad normam can. 1759, § 3, alios testes potest ex officio adiungere.

§ 2. Testimonium septimae manus est argumentum

1 C. 2, C. 35, q. 6; cc. 5, 22, X, II, 20; c. 3, X, IV, 17.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

credibilitatis quod robur addit depositionibus coniugum; sed vim plenae probationis non obtinet, nisi aliis adminiculis aut argumentis fulciatur.

In cases of impotency or non-consummation, unless the facts are ascertained from other sources, each of the parties must produce witnesses, called of the seventh hand (septimae manus), who are related to the parties by blood or affinity, or at least neighbors of good reputation, or otherwise well-informed persons, who will testify under oath to the probity of the parties and their truthfulness concerning the controverted matter. To these the judge may ex officio add other witnesses. This testimony of the septima manus is a proof of credibility which adds weight to the deposition of the consorts, but it has not the force of full proof unless it is supported by other circumstances or arguments.

The septimae manus proof is of Germanic origin. It was adopted by Gratian [2] and by the Decretals.[3] It means that the husband should bring forward seven persons of either sex, and any age or condition, if possible of his own kin, who are acquainted with his character, actions, and conduct. In the same manner the wife should present seven relatives, friends, or acquaintances. Thus fourteen persons, after having been duly sworn, testify to the trustworthiness and truthfulness of the married couple. But they cannot directly testify to the non-consummation of the marriage, although some indirect statements may be elicited from them. Thus they may be asked whether the couple lived together affectionately, whether there were quarrels, whether medicine was used to cure impotency or a physician was consulted.[4]

2 C. 2, C. 33, q. 1, is from a letter of Greg. I, but the text has the interpolation of septimae manus.

3 Cfr. cc. 5, 7, X, IV, 15.

4 Instructio Orient., tit. VI, art. 5 (Coll., n. 1588).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But all these testimonies do not afford full proof unless they are supported by other evidence. Such an aid (adminiculum) or support would be found in the supplementary oath of the woman testifying to non-consummation.[5] But a relatively surer way is that proposed in the following canons. We say relatively surer, because in case the woman would have led a life of prostitution after a civil divorce, bodily inspection could hardly bring results.[6]

ARTICLE II

BODILY INSPECTION

CAN. 1976

In causis impotentiae aut inconsummationis requiritur inspectio corporis utriusque vel alterutrius coniugis per peritos facienda, nisi ex adiunctis inutilis evidenter appareat.

CAN. 1977

In peritis eligendis, praeter normas in can. 1792–1805 datas, serventur praescripta canonum qui sequuntur.

Cases of impotency and non-consummation require bodily inspection of both or one of the parties, which is to be performed by experts, unless circumstances — like those just mentioned — render it evidently useless. The experts must be chosen by the judges after consultation with the defensor vinculi. Besides, the following canons must be observed.

CAN. 1978

Ad periti munus ne admittantur qui coniuges priva-

5 C. 4, X, II, 19.

6 Cfr. Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 9, 466, 376 (contains two decisions, but without date or source); in this case dispensation was granted on other canonical proofs.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tim inspexerint circa factum cui innititur petitio declarationis nullitatis vel inconsummationis; licet tamen hos tanquam testes inducere.

Those shall not be admitted as experts who have privately (as physician or midwife) examined the parties concerning the vital point upon which the petition for having the nullity of marriage declared or the non-consummation chiefly hinges; such private experts may, however, be introduced as witnesses.

CAN. 1979

§ 1. Ad inspiciendum virum, duo periti medici ex officio deputari debent.

§ 2. Ad mulierem vero inspiciendam duae obstetrices, quae legitimum peritiae testimonium habeant, ex officio designentur; nisi maluerit mulier a duobus medicis ex officio pariter designandis inspici vel id Ordinarius necessarium habuerit.

§ 3. Corporalis mulieris inspectio fieri debet, servatis plene christianae modestiae regulis et adstante semper honesta matrona ex officio designanda.

1. The two physicians who are to inspect the man are to be appointed ex officio. This means that they have to promise under oath that they will perform their duty conscientiously and without human respect.[7]

2. The two midwives who have to inspect the woman must be legally approved (by a state diploma or county or city certificate) and must also be appointed ex officio. Therefore they, too, have to be sworn in and must enjoy a good reputation.[8] But the woman may, if she so chooses, or if the Ordinary deems it necessary, be in-

[7] Instructio Orient., tit. VI, art. 5 (Coll., n. 1588).
[8] Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

spected by two physicians to be appointed ex officio.

3. The inspection must be conducted with becoming Christian modesty and always in the presence of a worthy matron to be chosen ex officio. This matron is also obliged to take an oath and to keep the secret.[9]

CAN. 1980

§ 1. Mulieris inspectionem obstetrices vel periti, seorsum singuli, exsequi debent.

§ 2. Singuli medici vel obstetrices singulas relationes conficiant, intra terminum a iudice praefinitum tradendas.

§ 3. Potest iudex relationes ab obstetricibus confectas examini alicuius periti medici subiicere, si id opportunum existimaverit.

1. The midwives who perform the inspection on the woman must do it separately.

2. Each physician or midwife has to draw up a separate report within a term to be fixed by the judge. In this report, says an instruction of the Holy Office,[10] they may state the result of their inspection and what they think about the nature of the impotency, whether it is acquired or natural, absolute or relative. This report should be sworn to and handed to the chancellor of the matrimonial court.

3. The judge may, if he thinks it advisable, submit the report of the midwives to the examination of an expert physician, who should ascertain whether the inspection was made along scientific lines.[11]

9 Ibid. Of course, physicians and midwives are bound by professional secrecy.

10 Instr. Orient., tit. VI, art. 5. How non-consummation in case of a woman destitute of ovaries and uterus may be proved we leave to physicians to decide; but they should not forget to mention that fact in their report, and what they think about impotency and sterility.

11 Inst. cit., ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1981

Peracta relatione, periti, obstetrices ac matrona, seorsum singuli, a iudice interrogentur, secundum articulos a vinculi defensore antea concinnatos quibus ipsi, praestiti iuramento, respondeant.

After the report has been received, the experts, the midwives, and the matron are to be questioned separately according to the points previously drawn up by the defensor vinculi, and must answer under oath.

CAN. 1982

Etiam in causis defectus consensus ob amentiam requiratur suffragium peritorum, qui infirmum, si casus ferat, eiusve acta quae amentiae suspicionem ingerunt, examinent secundum artis praecepta; insuper uti testes audiri debent periti qui infirmum antea visitaverint.

The verdict of experts is required also in cases of defective consent caused by insanity. They must, if the case admits, examine the patient as well as those acts of his which cause suspicion, according to the rules of their art (psychiatry). Besides, experts who have attended the patient before his illness should be heard as witnesses.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

PUBLICATION OF THE ACTS — CLOSE OF TRIAL — SENTENCE

CAN. 1983

§ 1. Publicato processu fas adhuc est partibus novos testes, ad normam tamen can. 1786, super diversis articulis inducere.

§ 2. Si vero testes iam excussi super iisdem articulis antea propositis denuo audiendi sint, servetur praescriptum can. 1781, integro iure defensoris vinculi opportunas proponendi exceptiones.

1. Even after the publication of the process the parties are allowed to introduce new witnesses to testify on various points. To understand this ruling we must remember that the publication of the process takes place after all the evidence has been collected, before the discussion of the case begins and before sentence is pronounced. It means that the whole material, consisting of all the proofs given by the parties, the witnesses and the experts, is made known to the parties and their lawyers, so that these may inspect it, and, if they wish, demand a copy.[1] This is the processus publicatio. Now, in virtue of the ordinary rules,[2] new witnesses should not be admitted after the publication of the acts, lest the proceedings be drawn out indefinitely. Yet, because matrimonial trials are matters of great importance, the legislator permits the parties to bring new witnesses, provided no fraud or bribe is employed, and provided both parties consent and the attorney or defender does not object. The judge has to make a formal decree permitting the introduction of new evidence.

1 Cfr. can. 1858 f. 2 Cfr. can. 1786.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. If witnesses who have already been examined are to be again questioned on the same points, the examination must be performed before the depositions have been published (antequam acta seu testificationes publici iuris fiant), provided the judge deems it necessary and there is no danger of a secret agreement or bribery.[3] The defender always has the right to object to the reintroduction of the same witnesses on the same points.

CAN. 1984

§ 1. Defensor vinculi ius habet ut in allegando, petendo et respondendo, tam in scriptis quam in defensione orali, audiatur postremus.

§ 2. Quare tribunal ad definitivam sententiam ne deveniat, nisi prius vinculi defensor interrogatus declaraverit sibi nihil deducendum vel inquirendum superesse.

§ 3. Si vero ante praefinitum a iudice iudicii diem defensor nihil deduxerit, praesumitur eum nihil iam deducendum habere.

1. The defender is entitled to be heard last, when allegations are made, petitions filed, or answers given, and he may exercise this right either in writing or by word of mouth.

2. Hence the tribunal shall not proceed to render a verdict, unless the defender has formally declared, upon request, that he has nothing more to bring forward or to inquire into.

[3] Can. 1781.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. If, however, the defender has brought forward nothing to the contrary before the day set for the trial, it is presumed that he has nothing more to say.

Can. 1985

In causis quae spectant ad dispensationem matrimonii rati et non consummati, iudex instructor neque ad publicationem processus neque ad sententiam super ipsa inconsummatione et causis ad dispensandum deveniat, sed omnia acta una cum voto scripto Episcopi et defensoris vinculi transmittat ad Sedem Apostolicam.

If the case concerns a dispensation from a matrimonium ratum non consummatum, the judge who drafted the case may neither publish the acts nor pronounce sentence as to the non-consummation or the reasons for the dispensation, but must send all the acts together with the written view of the bishop and of the defender to the Holy See.

Note that only in case of a dispensation from a merely ratified marriage has the judge to abstain from giving sentence.[4] If the trial merely concerns impotency, the Ordinary is allowed to give sentence in the first instance, either for or against the nullity of the marriage (constat vel non constat de impotentia in casu). Thus also in other cases of impediments, of defect of consent and form.

From this canon it appears that, besides the three judges, there should be an officialis to preside over and conduct the trial and to determine the administrative rules for conducting cases.[5] Hence index instructor here

4 S. O., Aug. 6, 1890, ad 7 (Coll., n. 1737).

5 Can. 1577.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

means the officialis of the diocese. But since the Code [6] permits that in smaller dioceses the offices of officialis and vicar-general may be held by one and the same person, it is evident that the vicar-general would in this case act as iudex instructor. He would therefore be the moderator, as he was formerly called, and as such should draw up the case, according to the petition filed by the parties. As soon as he has received this petition he shall cause the chancellor or the secretary of the matrimonial court to put it down in writing, issue rules and ordinances in accordance with the general rules on trials and with those governing matrimonial trials in particular, which are conducive to the regular and orderly compilation of the acts, convoke the tribunal, summon the parties and their witnesses, and grant delays when justly demanded. All these things must be recorded in the acts by the chancellor or secretary.[7] But the real judge in matrimonial matters is the Ordinary of the diocese, or rather the board of three judges. Hence the matrimonial court should be composed as follows: the moderator (officialis or vicar-general); the three judges; the defender and the secretary. The bishop may be personally present at every session, but it is expedient that he leave the judgment to the tribunal, over which the officialis of the diocese presides.[8]

The three judges must proceed collegialiter, as a body, and give their verdict by majority vote.[9] This is the first instance, but it may be that an appeal is taken. Hence the Code proceeds as described in the following chapter.

6 Can. 1573, § 1.
7 Instruction of 1883, n. 9 (Coll., n. 1587).
8 Can. 1578.
9 Can. 1577.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VI

APPEALS

CAN. 1986

A prima sententia, quae matrimonii nullitatem declaraverit, vinculi defensor, intra legitimum tempus, ad superius tribunal provocare debet; et si negligat officium suum implere, compellatur auctoritate iudicis.

The defensor vinculi must, within the time granted by law, appeal to a higher tribunal if the first sentence was in favor of the nullity of the marriage. Should he neglect to do his duty, he may be compelled thereto by the judge.

The time within which an appeal may be made is ten days from the date when he has received knowledge of the first sentence.[1] But an appeal may be taken only if the first sentence declared the marriage null. If the sentence was in favor of validity, and the parties are satisfied, the defender shall abstain from appealing, and the whole trial may be considered as closed.[2]

CAN. 1987

Post secundam sententiam, quae matrimonii nullitatem confirmaverit, si defensor vinculi in gradu appellationis pro sua conscientia non crediderit esse appellandum, ius coniugibus est, decem diebus a sententiae denuntiatione elapsis, novas nuptias contrahendi.

If the second sentence confirms the first given in favor of nullity, and the defender of the court of appeals (who

1 Can. 1881.

2 Benedict XIV, "Dei miseratione," § 8; Instructio, 1883, n. 25.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is a different one from that of the first instance) does not feel himself obliged in conscience to appeal, the parties are free to marry again after the expiration of ten days from the date when the second sentence became known to them. Pending the appeal, i. e., during the time between the first and second sentence, the party in whose favor the nullity was declared in the first instance is not allowed to remarry; and if he or she should have attempted a marriage before the second sentence, they must be separated, or else they are to be treated as guilty of polygamy.[3]

CAN. 1988

Decreta matrimonii nullitate, Ordinarius loci curare debet, ut de ea mentio fiat in baptismorum et matrimoniorum regestis, ubi matrimonii celebratio consignata invenitur.

After the second sentence in favor of nullity, the Ordinary should see to it that the annulment of the marriage is duly recorded in the baptismal and matrimonial registers of the place where the marriage was contracted.

CAN. 1989

Cum sententiae in causis matrimonialibus nunquam transeant in rem iudicatam, causae ipsae, si nova argumenta praesto sint, retractari semper poterunt, firmo praescripto can. 1903.

Since no sentence in matrimonial trials ever becomes a res iudicata, a case may be reopened at any time, provided new proofs are offered; but these proofs must be of a weighty nature and supported by documents.

A res iudicata is a controversy definitively settled by a twofold identical sentence, or by one sentence from which no appeal has been taken within the legitimate term, or from which an appeal is not admissible.[4] Therefore, even if the nullity of a marriage had been confirmed by the second instance, and the parties entered a new union, the former case may yet be reopened. This is a favor iuris of matrimonial cases, because marriage is indissoluble and a matter of public welfare.[5] It follows that no prescription or lapse of time may be invoked against the right of attacking a marriage. However, since the trial is conducted on such rigorous lines, it would be unjust to listen to frivolous reasons or proofs already heard and refuted. Therefore weighty and new reasons must be proposed.[6] It is evident that a verdict given by the Holy See cannot be impugned upon the ground of can. 1989, or reversed by the Ordinary without notifying the Apostolic See.

[3] Benedict XIV, "Dei miseratione," § 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It is advisable to have a summary statement drawn up before the trial is reopened.[7]

4 Can. 1902.

5 Smith, Marriage Process, p. 343.

6 Benedict XIV, "Dei miseratione," § 11. For this purpose the acts of all matrimonial trials are to be kept in the diocesan archives.

7 Leitner, l. c., p. 558.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VII

CASES EXCEPTED FROM THE PRECEDING RULES

CAN. 1990

Cum ex certo et authentico documento, quod nulli contradictioni vel exceptioni obnoxium sit, constiterit de exsistentia impedimenti disparitatis cultus, ordinis, voti sollemnis castitatis, ligaminis, consanguinitatis, affinitatis aut cognationis spiritualis, simulque pari certitudine apparuerit dispensationem super his impedimentis datam non esse, hisce in casibus, praetermissis sollemnitatibus hucusque recensitis, poterit Ordinarius, citatis partibus, matrimonii nullitatem declarare, cum interventu tamen defensoris vinculi.

This canon will probably evoke a sigh of relief from more than one ecclesiastic who has to deal with matrimonial cases. For it dispenses with almost all the formalities of a regular trial, which always take time and money.

1. The impediments which are brought forward in order to have a marriage declared null and void are: disparity of worship, sacred orders, solemn religious profession, the bond of a previous marriage, consanguinity, affinity, and spiritual relationship,— seven in all. That the others are not included is owing partly to the nature of these impediments, partly to the difficulty of complying with the required conditions.

2. The conditions which govern the application of this canon are: (a) that the existence of the impediment be ascertained by a reliable and authentic document, which cannot be rejected or disregarded; (b) that it be equally certain that no dispensation had been granted from the impediment.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Authentic documents are such as are reliable and trustworthy because written or issued by the proper authorities. Such are the genuine acts of the Roman Court, judicial acts and documents drawn up by an ecclesiastical notary, baptismal and matrimonial records kept in the archives of a diocese, parish, or religious community, and copies made from these originals. Such are also civil documents of a public character, issued according to the laws of the country. All these, ecclesiastical as well as civil documents, are presumed to be genuine until the contrary is proved.[1] Thus an "affidavit," if issued with the proper formalities, in case of a marriage, is prima facie evidence of such marriage in any court of Missouri,[2] and must therefore be considered an authentic document in the ecclesiastical court.

Private documents, the Code says elsewhere,[3] afford no full proof, and are excluded by our text. It has happened that a soldier without any commission from the authorities made an investigation concerning a Baptism. The result was considered insufficient, especially since the defensor vinculi was not present.[4] Had the soldier obtained an authentic document from an ecclesiastical court, the investigation could not have been objected to as purely private.

A document quod nulli contradictioni vel exceptioni obnoxium sit, is such a one as described above, provided it is authentic, no matter whether issued by the ecclesiastical or the civil authorities. The proof that it is not genuine would have to be furnished by the plaintiff (actor) or

1 Can. 1813 f.
2 Revised Statutes of Mo., sect. 4563.
3 Can. 1817.
4 S. O., June 10, 1896, Albany, N. Y. (Coll., n. 1940).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

his lawyer, not by the defendant (reus). Whether a paper received from a Protestant minister concerning Baptism is authentic must be decided from another viewpoint.[5]

It is furthermore required that no dispensation had been granted from said impediments. Therefore copies of all the dispensations forwarded by the diocesan court should be kept on file for cases of emergency, at least in the form of lists indexed according to the species of the various impediments. The Roman Court keeps its records in good order and in this respect may serve as an example to diocesan courts.

3. The Code adds that in these cases the solemnities thus far mentioned (in the preceding canons, which prescribe the regular trial) may be omitted, and the Ordinary, upon having summoned the parties, may declare the marriage null and void, provided the defensor vinculi is satisfied. This is a decided modification, not only of Benedict XIV's Constitution "Dei miseratione," but also of former decrees[6] which required a summary trial when a marriage was to be declared invalid because of disparity of cult. Now the formalities of a regular trial may be omitted, and all that is required is certainty gained from authentic documents that no dispensation was granted, summoning of the parties, intervention of the defender, and a declaration of nullity. An appeal to a higher tribunal is not required if the defender is satisfied;[7] nor is recourse to the Holy See necessary in that case.[8] But can. 1988 must be observed.

5 This must be judged according to the rules given under mixed marriages. It would also require an affidavit issued by civil authority in order to authenticate it.

6 S. O., June 10, 1896 (Coll., n. 1940).

7 S. O., June 5, 1889 (Coll., n. 1706).

8 S. O., June 21, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 443).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1991

Adversus hanc declarationem defensor vinculi, si prudenter existimaverit impedimenta de quibus in can. 1990 non esse certa aut dispensationem super eisdem probabiliter intercessisse, provocare tenetur ad iudicem secundae instantiae, ad quem acta sunt transmittenda quique scripto monendus est agi de casu excepto.

If the defender prudently believes that the impediments mentioned in the preceding canon did not exist or have probably been dispensed from, he is obliged to appeal the case to the judge of the second instance, to whom all the acts must be transmitted with the notification that the case belongs to the excepted class. Reasons for doubt may arise from the nature of the documents. Thus a pastor's record, although signed and sealed by the pastor, may be doubtful because not verified by the episcopal court.[9] A case might be made out against spiritual relationship, because the names of the sponsors were illegibly written or there was doubt as to identity, especially if the name is a very common one. In cases of consanguinity error is possible as to the degree. Concerning the marriage tie doubts may arise as to the examination of the free status of the contracting parties, etc.; much depends on the character of the papers and the attitude of the defender.

CAN. 1992

Iudex alterius instantiae, cum solo interventu defensoris vinculi, decernet eodem modo de quo in can. 1990, utrum sententia sit confirmanda an potius pro-

9 Instruction of 1883, n. 31 (Coll., n. 1587).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cedendum in causa sit ad ordinarium tramitem iuris, quo in casu eam remittit ad tribunal primae instantiae.

The judge of the second instance, with the sole intervention of the defender, shall decide, as stated in can. 1990, whether the first sentence is to be confirmed or a regular trial instituted; in the latter case the matter is to be referred back to the tribunal of the first instance.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

APPENDIX I

SOME SPECIMEN PETITIONS FOR MATRIMONIAL DISPENSATIONS

For Mixed Marriages or Disparity of Worship

To the Rt. Rev. Bishop N. N.:

N....., a Catholic of this parish, wishing to marry N....., a non-Catholic, humbly prays the Right Rev. Bishop, in virtue of the faculties granted by the Holy See, to grant a dispensation from the impediment of mixed religion (or disparity of cult).

The non-Catholic party has complied with the conditions prescribed by law (can. 1061).

Or if not complied with in writing: The non-Catholic party refuses to give the promises in writing, but has made an oral promise to the same effect. The reasons are: angustia loci, aetas superadulta, periculum matrimonii contrahendi coram ministro acatholico, etc.

Please find enclosed $.... for alms.

To the Apostolic See:

Ad pedes Sanctitatis Vestrae provolutus humillime rogat N. Catholicus super impedimento disparitatis cultus, quatenus matrimonium inire valeat cum N. acatholica non baptizata, vel saltem valde dubie baptizata. Promissiones prout de iure requiruntur sunt praestitae (vel saltem oraliter factae sincere).

Causae vero sunt.....

Pro qua gratia, . . .

The Ordinary should write below the signature, or on a special paper: Petitionem hanc enixe commendat Ordinarius oratoris, cuius rationes, in quantum scit, veritate nituntur, et promissiones sincere factas esse credit.

Pro Sanatione in Radice

To the Bishop:

N....., (fictitious name), wishing to validate his (or her) marriage with B....., humbly prays the Right Rev. Bishop, in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

virtue of the faculties granted by the Holy See, to grant a revalidation (sanatio in radice), removing the impediment of (for ex. crime of adultery with promise of marriage), which he (or she) concealed at the time of marriage with B., who is still ignorant thereof.

The reasons for requesting a sanatio in radice are, on the one hand, scandal and the danger of incontinence resulting from separation if imposed; on the other hand, impossibility of obtaining the renewal of B.'s consent without serious danger of dissension.

Double Impediment

(See Can. 1050)

Beatissime Pater:

Exponitur humiliter Sanctitati Vestrae pro parte oratricis N., dioecesis N., ex loco N., quod cum dicta oratrix catholicae religioni addictissima nubere intendat viro N. non baptizato, cui etiam coniuncta est in secundo gradu affinitatis lineae collateralis, Sanctitatem Vestram humillime rogat, quatenus benigne dispensare dignetur de hoc duplici impedimento. Oratrix est vidua tribus liberis onerata, quorum senior quinquennium non excedit. Insuper propter res familiares ipsius mulieris loco huic adnexas vix alium virum invenire poterit quippe cum locus ipse acatholicis potius quam catholicis abundet et numerum focularium 100 non superet.

Pro qua gratia. . . .

Ita res se habere parochus oratricis testatur, quapropter hunc supplicem libellum enixe commendat.

N. N.
Episcopus Ordinarius Dioecesis N.

For a Sanatio in Radice to the S. Poenitentiaria

Beatissime Pater:

Ad pedes Sanctitatis Vestrae humiliter exponit parochus loci N., dioecesis N., in Statu N. Mulier quaedam nomine (fictitious name), cum esset legitime coniuncta viro (fictitious name), carnaliter cognita fuit a Ioanne, cui post primi mariti mortem nupsit in facie ecclesiae. At obstare videtur impedimentum criminis, quippe cum non solum adulterium commisit cum dicto Ioanne, verum etiam serio promisit perdurante eodem legitimo matrimonio se nupturum ipsi post viri mortem. Insuper fatetur mulier quod vir praesens ipsi patefecerit se nunquam fuisse baptizatum ante eorum matrimonium, quamvis tamquam catholicus se gesserit semper. At momento periculi sat proximo mortis ipse peterit baptismum, cumque nullus sacerdos poterit haberi aut adiri convenienter mulier ipsum rite baptizavit. At post recuperatam valetudinem noluit vir renovare consensum, quocumque modo oblatum, et mulier timens, ne propter anteactae vitae suae consuetudinem praefatus vir ipsam forsitan relinqueret et prolem reclamaret acatholicis tradendam, rogavit instanter, ut Sanctitas Vestra saluti eius necnon prolis benigne consulere dignetur, quatenus opus sit, per sanationem in radice. Quoad publicitatem horum impedimentorum in quantum scio, nullus est in loco isto, qui hos coniuges non crederet veros, vel quidquam mali suspiceret, et quominus divulgaretur vix timendum est.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Pro qua gratia. . . .

N. N., PAROCHUS.[1]

1 Cfr. Pyrrhus Corradus, Praxis Dispensat. Apost. (Migne, Cursus Theol. Vol. xviii); Putzer, Commentary in Facult. Apost., ed. 4a, pp. 122 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

APPENDIX II

(See Can. 1099, § 2, p. 303)

It may be worth while to add a few observations on this section, especially since Sabetti-Barrett (Theologia Moral. 27th ed. 1919, p. 940), has drawn attention to the same. Our canon evidently enumerates three classes of persons who are, or are not, respectively, obliged to observe the Catholic form of marriage. The first class is that of Catholics, whether they are such now, at the moment of marriage, or have been such previously and fallen away. We will designate these by the letter A. The second class is that of non-Catholics who never belonged nor now belong to the Catholic Church, regardless of whether or not they were baptized. The letter B shall designate them. The third class comprises persons born of non-Catholic parents, but baptized in the Catholic Church, though not raised as Catholics. The letter C shall stand for these. Putting the three classes into a mathematical schema we have the following possibilities:

If A marries A — Bound by Catholic form.
If A " B — " " " " .
If A " C — " " " " .
If B " A — " " " " .
If B " B — Not bound by Catholic form.
If B " C — " " " " " .
If C " A — Bound by Catholic form.
If C " B — Not bound by Catholic form.
If C " C — Then what?

We believe they are obliged to observe the Catholic form. Our reason is: C forms a class for itself, distinct from class B, and as the text states that one in Class C is not bound to observe the form when he marries one of Class B, the Code manifestly wishes to restrict that freedom from the observance of the law to the sole case of a marriage between C and B. Otherwise the lawgiver would have undoubtedly stated: when they marry among themselves — quoties inter se contrahant. Hence the wording, it seems to us, taken in its strict sense, would oblige parties in Class C to observe the form if they marry among themselves. The objection that they are ignorant of the law, and practically spurn it, proves nothing, for it could be urged also against § 1 of our canon, because should-be Catholics who have fallen away and marry among themselves, or with non-Catholics, are also bound by the Catholic form. The old principle that by Baptism one is bound to obey the ecclesiastical law is here again apparent (can. 87). That non-Catholics (in the strict sense) are exempted is an exception and must be strictly interpreted.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

APPENDIX III

In cases where doubts arise as to whether baptism was conferred at all, or conferred validly, and, consequently, whether a marriage contracted between two non-Catholics, or between a Catholic and a non-Catholic, was valid, the following rules[1] may with some safety be applied, since they are based upon official decisions.

1. A marriage contracted between a Catholic, or a non-Catholic who has undoubtedly been baptized, and a non-Catholic whose baptism is doubtful, is to be considered valid.

2. A marriage contracted between two non-Catholics, if the baptism of both parties is doubtful, must be held valid.

3. Invalid is a marriage contracted between a party whose baptism is doubtful and one who certainly never was baptized.

However, this last rule now, after May 19, 1918, must not be applied to such marriages as are contracted between strictly non-Catholics, i.e., such as never have been Catholics either by baptism or conversion, on account of can. 1070.

On rules 1 and 2 see S. O., Nov. 17, 1830 (Coll. P. F., n. 821):

"R. 1. Quoad haereticos quorum sectae ritualia praescribunt collationem Baptismi absque necessario usu materiae et formae essentialis, debet examinari casus particularis.—2. Quoad alios qui iuxta eorum rituale baptizant valide, validum censendum est Baptisma. Quoad si dubium persistat, etiam in primo casu, censendum est validum Baptisma in ordine ad validitatem matrimonii."

S. O., Sept. 9, 1868 (Coll. P. F., n. 1334):

"1. Utrum, in casu dubii de valore baptismi, qui ita baptismum dubium acceperunt, in iudicando de aliis difficultatibus, v. g. circa matrimonium, iaponenses ut christiani, vel adhuc ut infideles considerandi sint.

"2. Utrum si dubium de valore baptismi remaneat, et S. Congregationi solvere dubium non visum sit opportunum, de his qui [1] Wernz, Ius Decretalium, ed. 2, 1912. Vol. IV, 2, p. 384 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sic dubie baptizati sunt, in rebus quae ad matrimonium spectant, ac si vere et valide baptizati fuissent iudicandum sit, vel non.

"R. Ad. 1. Generatim loquendo, ut christiani habendi sunt ii de quibus dubitatur an valide baptizati fuerint.

"Ad. 2. Censendum est validum baptisma in ordine ad validitatem matrimonii."

On rule 3 see S. O., July 14, 1880 (Coll. P. F., n. 1536):

"1. Matrimonium dubie baptizati cum non baptizata estne validum?

"2. Matrimonium duorum dubie baptizatorum estne validum etiamsi sint consanguinei, affines, etc.

"R. Ad. 1. Matrimonium esse habendum uti invalidum ob impedimentum cultus disparitatis.

"Ad. 2. Matrimonium habendum esse ut invalidum ob impedimentum consanguinitatis vel affinitatis."

S. O., Feb. 4, 1891 (ibidem, n. 1746):

"Qui invalide baptismum receperunt, tamquam ethnici habendi sunt, ac proinde si isti matrimonia inter se contraxerunt, nisi obstet aliquod impedimentum iure naturae dirimens vera habenda erunt. Qui valide aut dubie baptizati fuerint, ii subsunt impedimentis etiam iure ecclesiastico dirimentibus.—At fieri potest ut una pars valide aut dubie, altera vero invalide baptizata fuerit. Hoc in casu eorum matrimonium nullum erit ob cultus disparitatem."

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

APPENDIX IV

(On Canons 1048, 1063, and 1139.)

Our opinion was asked on the following case: James, a Catholic, had contracted marriage with Gemma, a baptized Episcopalian, A. D. 1913, but before a non-Catholic minister, therefore invalidly, on account of the form prescribed having been neglected (can. 1099). Now, A. D. 1920, he wishes to return to the Church and receive the Sacraments. His would-be wife consents to leave him perfect freedom in the exercise of his religion, is also willing to renew her consent before a Catholic priest and two witnesses, but absolutely refuses to guarantee at the present time to have the children brought up as Catholics. What is to be done?

1. According to can. 1139, 1, the marriage could be healed in the root, because it was invalid on account of defective form.

2. Can this sanatio be applied? A decree of the Holy Office, Dec. 22, 1916 (A. Ap. S., Vol. IX), reads that in our case the sanatio rather than convalidation with renewal of the consent before the priest and two witnesses, should be applied, that is to say, healing in the root is preferred to simple convalidation; most probably in order not to expose the sacred minister to an (at least passive and illicit) co-operatio in sacris. But what about the divine-natural law which forbids granting a dispensation when the precautions are not guaranteed? For, as stated above, the non-Catholic party absolutely refuses to guarantee the Catholic education of the children. Here we can only state that the Supreme Pontiff, and he alone, can declare whether the divine-natural law which requires the guarantee of Catholic education is binding in that particular circumstance and instance. A reason for benign interpretation lies in the promise of the non-Catholic party to permit the husband to exercise the Catholic religion with perfect freedom. This concession may pave the way to the other promise being made, at least tacitly. Besides the sincere desire of being and living as a Catholic is to be greatly valued.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. Now the question arises whether our bishops enjoy the power of applying the sanatio in casu. According to the decree of Aug. 2, 1918, it would seem that our Ordinaries and those of Great Britain have that power (supra, p. 114). However, we would not venture to vindicate it in the case in question. For although the sanatio itself, as such, would cause no difficulty, because can. 1139, 1, would admit and the decree of Aug. 2, 1918, would not contradict it, yet there is an obstacle. For, as stated above, the divine-natural law requiring Catholic education is here jeopardized and needs a declaration, which, according to the view of the School, can only be given by the Supreme Pontiff, i.e., by the Holy Office. This was the stand taken by the Holy Office in the above-mentioned decree. The Ordinary had asked whether the faculty of healing in the root — which he had already obtained from the Apostolic See — was contained in the faculty of healing in the root mixed marriages which were invalidly contracted on account of clandestinity or non-observance of the form presented by the "Ne temere." The answer was that it was not contained therein and that therefore the Holy Father should be asked for the favor of healing all marriages invalidly sanated by the bishop.

Hence the case in question would have to be sent to the S. Congregation of the Sacraments, which will ask at least the parere or view of the Holy Office.

"Ordinarius Dioecesis N., obtenta iam facultate sanandi in radice matrimonia mixta, nulla ex capite clandestinitatis quia non celebrata ad normam Decreti 'Ne Temere,' quando pars acatholica renuit se sistere coram parocho catholico, quaerit nunc:

"1) Utrum quando pars acatholica non renuit se sistere coram parocho catholico, renuit tamen omnino praestare debitas cautiones, providendum sit per dispensationem et renovationem consensus coram parocho catholico passive se habente, vel potius per sanationem in radice: et quatenus providendum sit per sanationem in radice,

"2) Utrum facultas sanandi in radice in hoc secundo casu comprehensa censenda sit necne in facultate iam obtenta sanandi in radice matrimonia mixta, nulla ex capite clandestinitatis, vel

"3) Utrum peti debeat an non nova facultas a S. Sede.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"In plenario conventu Supremae Sacrae Congregationis Sancti Officii, habito feria IV, die 20 nov. 1912, propositis suprascriptis dubiis, Emi ac Rmi Dni Cardinales in rebus fidei et morum Inquisitores Generales, omnibus mature perpensis, respondendum decreverunt:

"Ad Ium, Negative ad primam partem, affirmative ad secundam.

"Ad 2um, Non comprehendi.

"Ad 3um, Provisum in secundo. Et supplicandum SSmo ut sanare dignetur in radice matrimonia ex hoc capite nulla quae usque adhuc invalide ab Episcopis sanata fuerint.

"Et sequenti feria V, die 21 eiusdem mensis, SSmus D.N.D. Pius divina providentia PP. X, in solita audientia R.P.D. Adsessori eiusdem Supremae Sacrae Congregationis impertita Emorum Patrum resolutionem benigne adprobare et confirmare et sanationem in radice matrimoniorum quae ex hoc capite nulla usque adhuc invalide ab Episcopis forte sanata fuerint largire dignatus est.

"Contrariis non obstantibus quibuscumque.

"Datum Romae, ex Aedibus S. Officii, die 22 decembris 1916.

"ALOISIUS CASTELLANO, S. R. et U. E. Notarius."

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

APPENDIX V

The War Faculties

Here we may add a remark concerning the duration of the war faculties. Do they still hold? The treaties of Versailles and St. Germain have been signed by the parties immediately concerned, but our country has reasonably delayed signing on account of intrinsic difficulties. Besides the treaties with Turkey and Bulgaria have not yet been signed. Furthermore, a state of war still exists in Russia, and Jugo-Slavia, and if it is true what we read in the papers, about twenty other wars are still going on. Hence we believe that, until formal peace is established in all countries, the war faculties can be made use of.

November, 1919.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

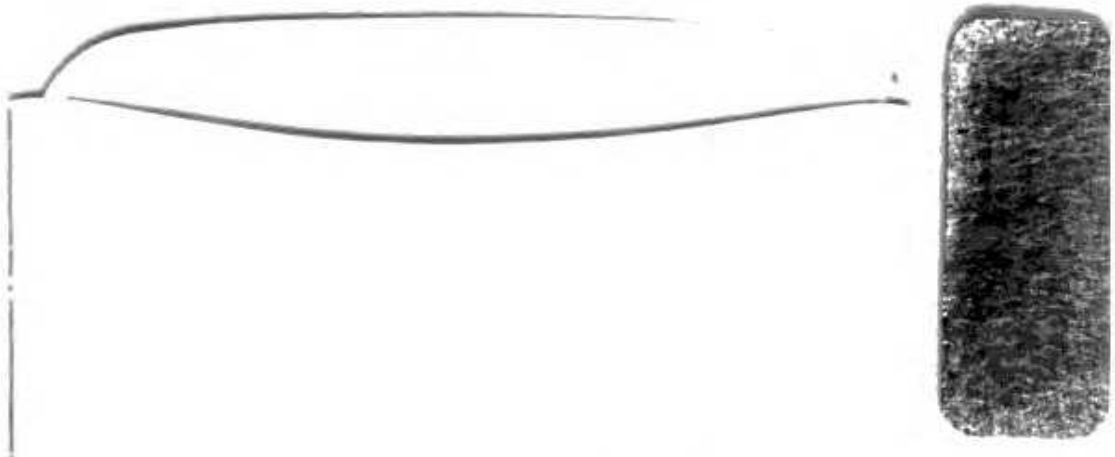
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

may be kept



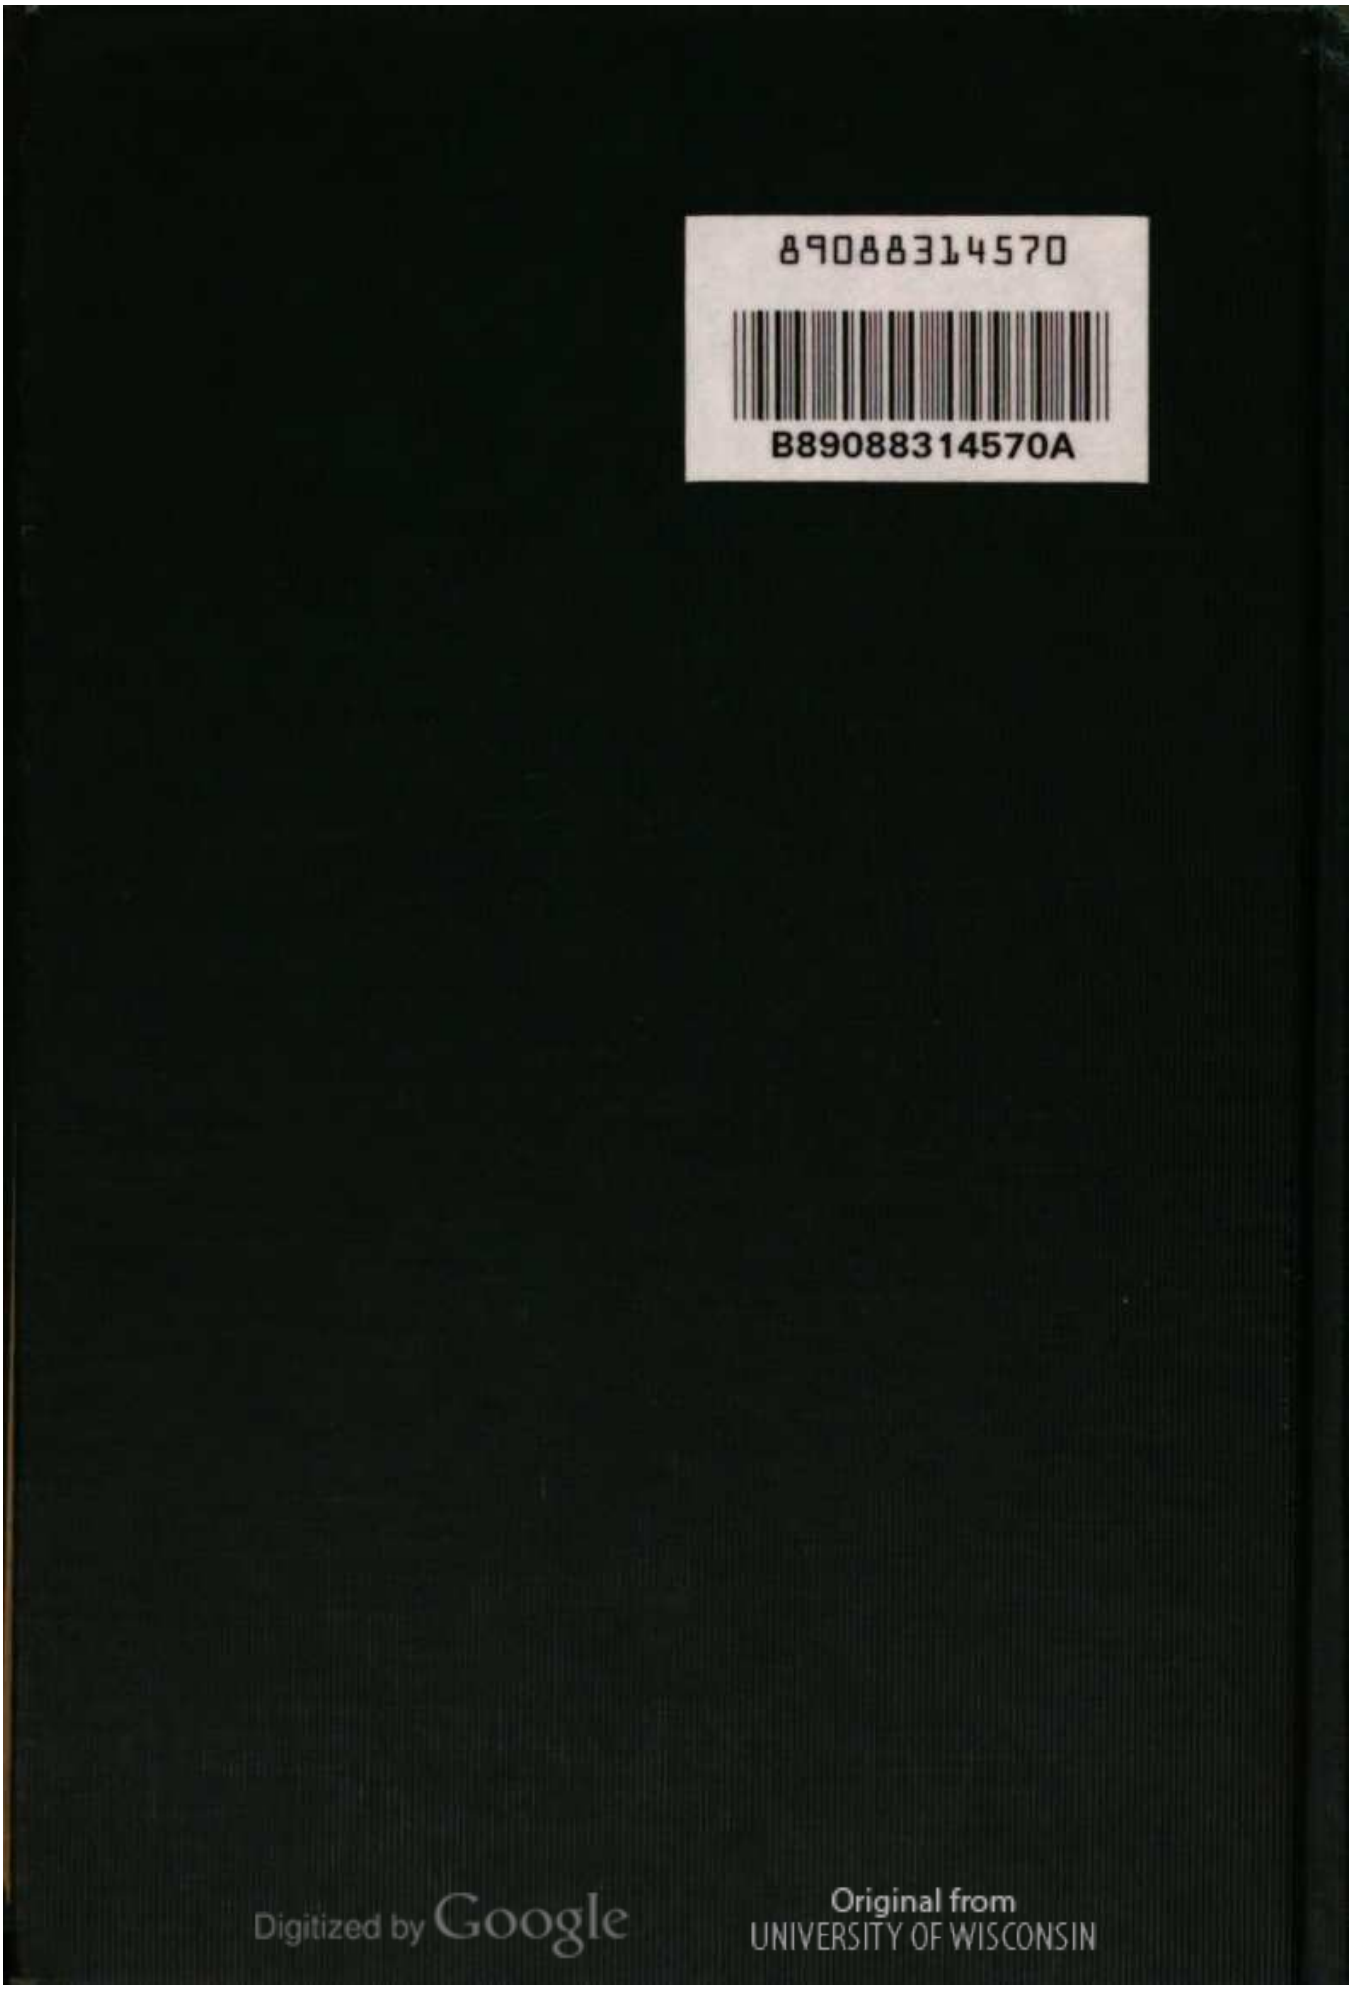
89088314570

b89088314570a

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google



Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A COMMENTARY on CANON LAW

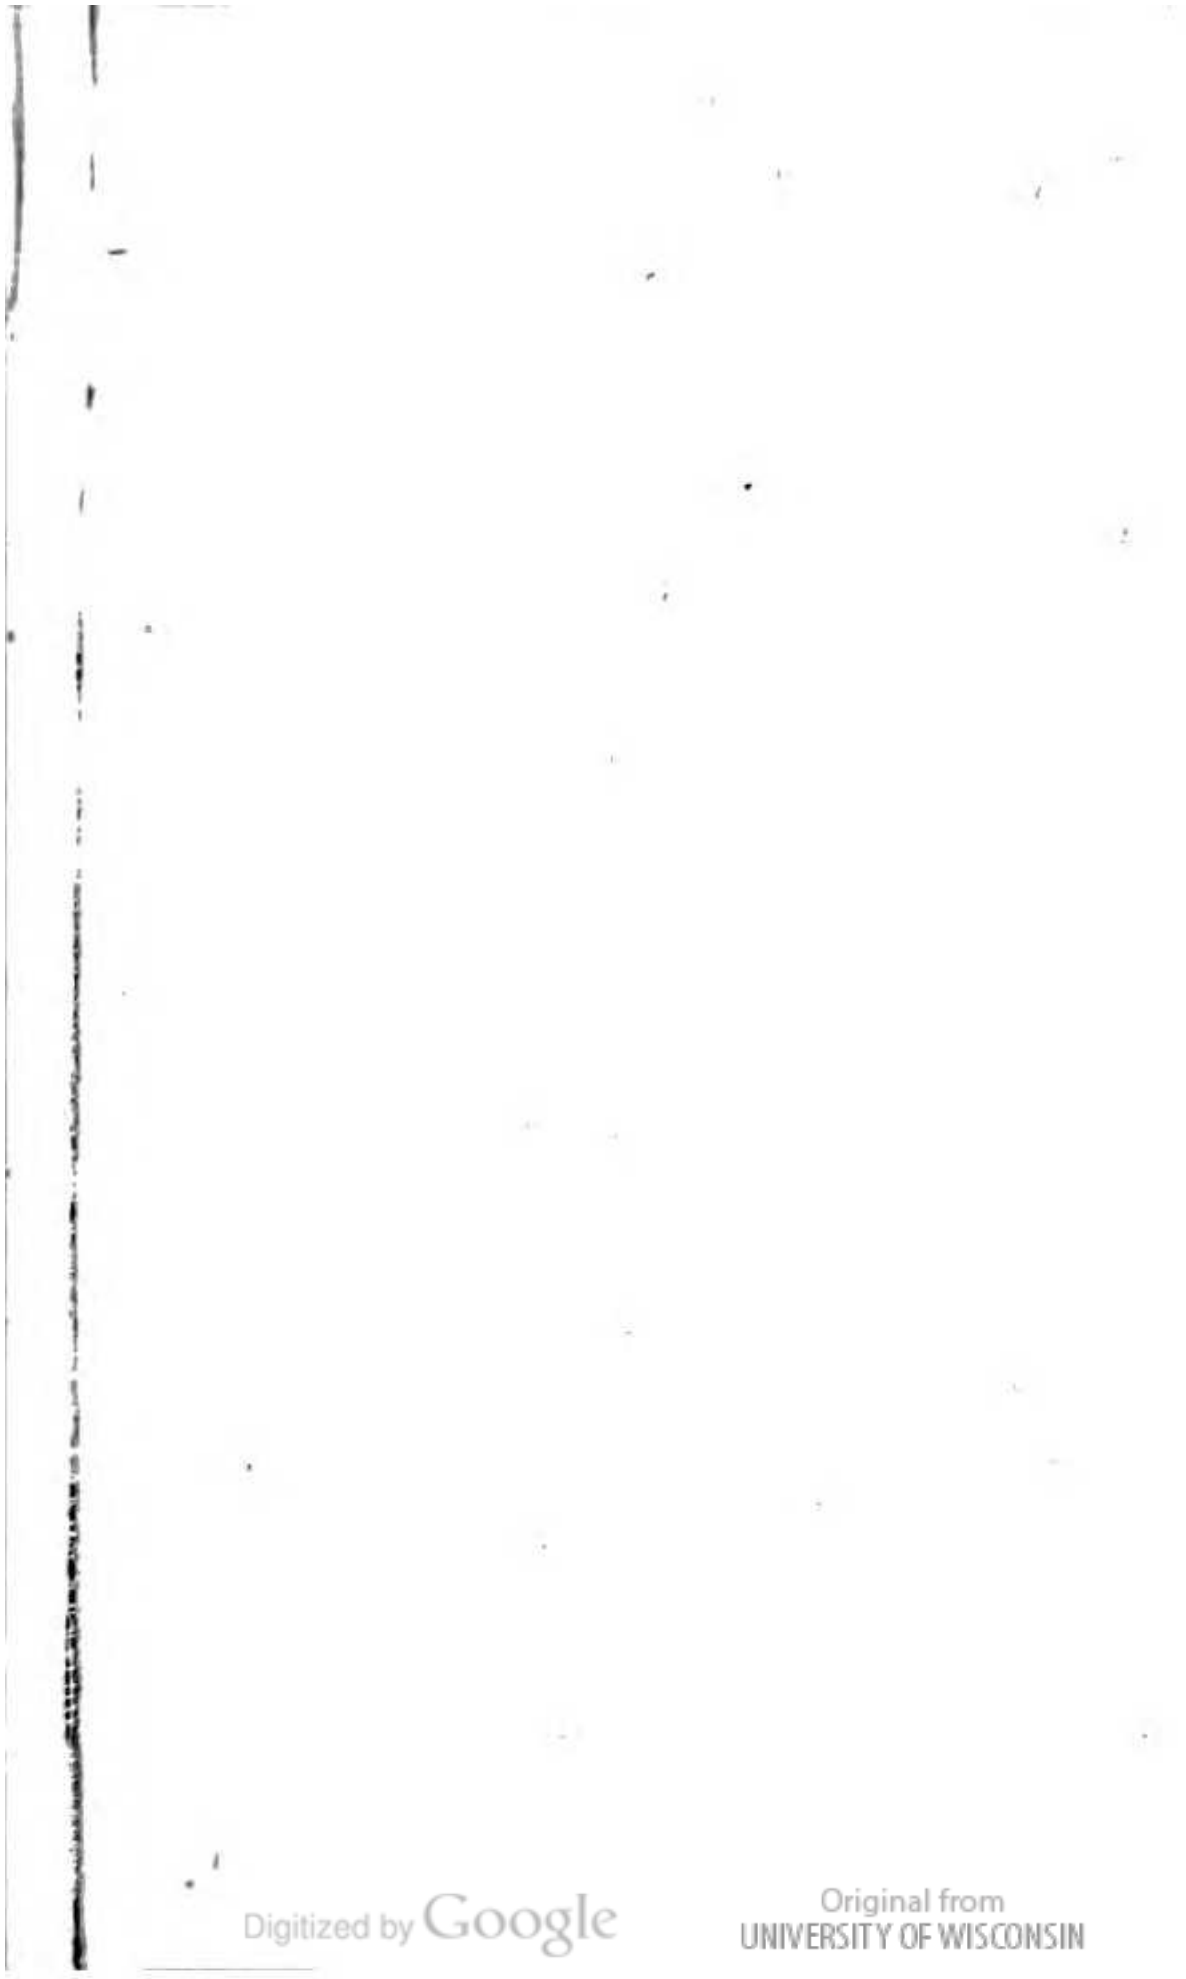
Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library

of the



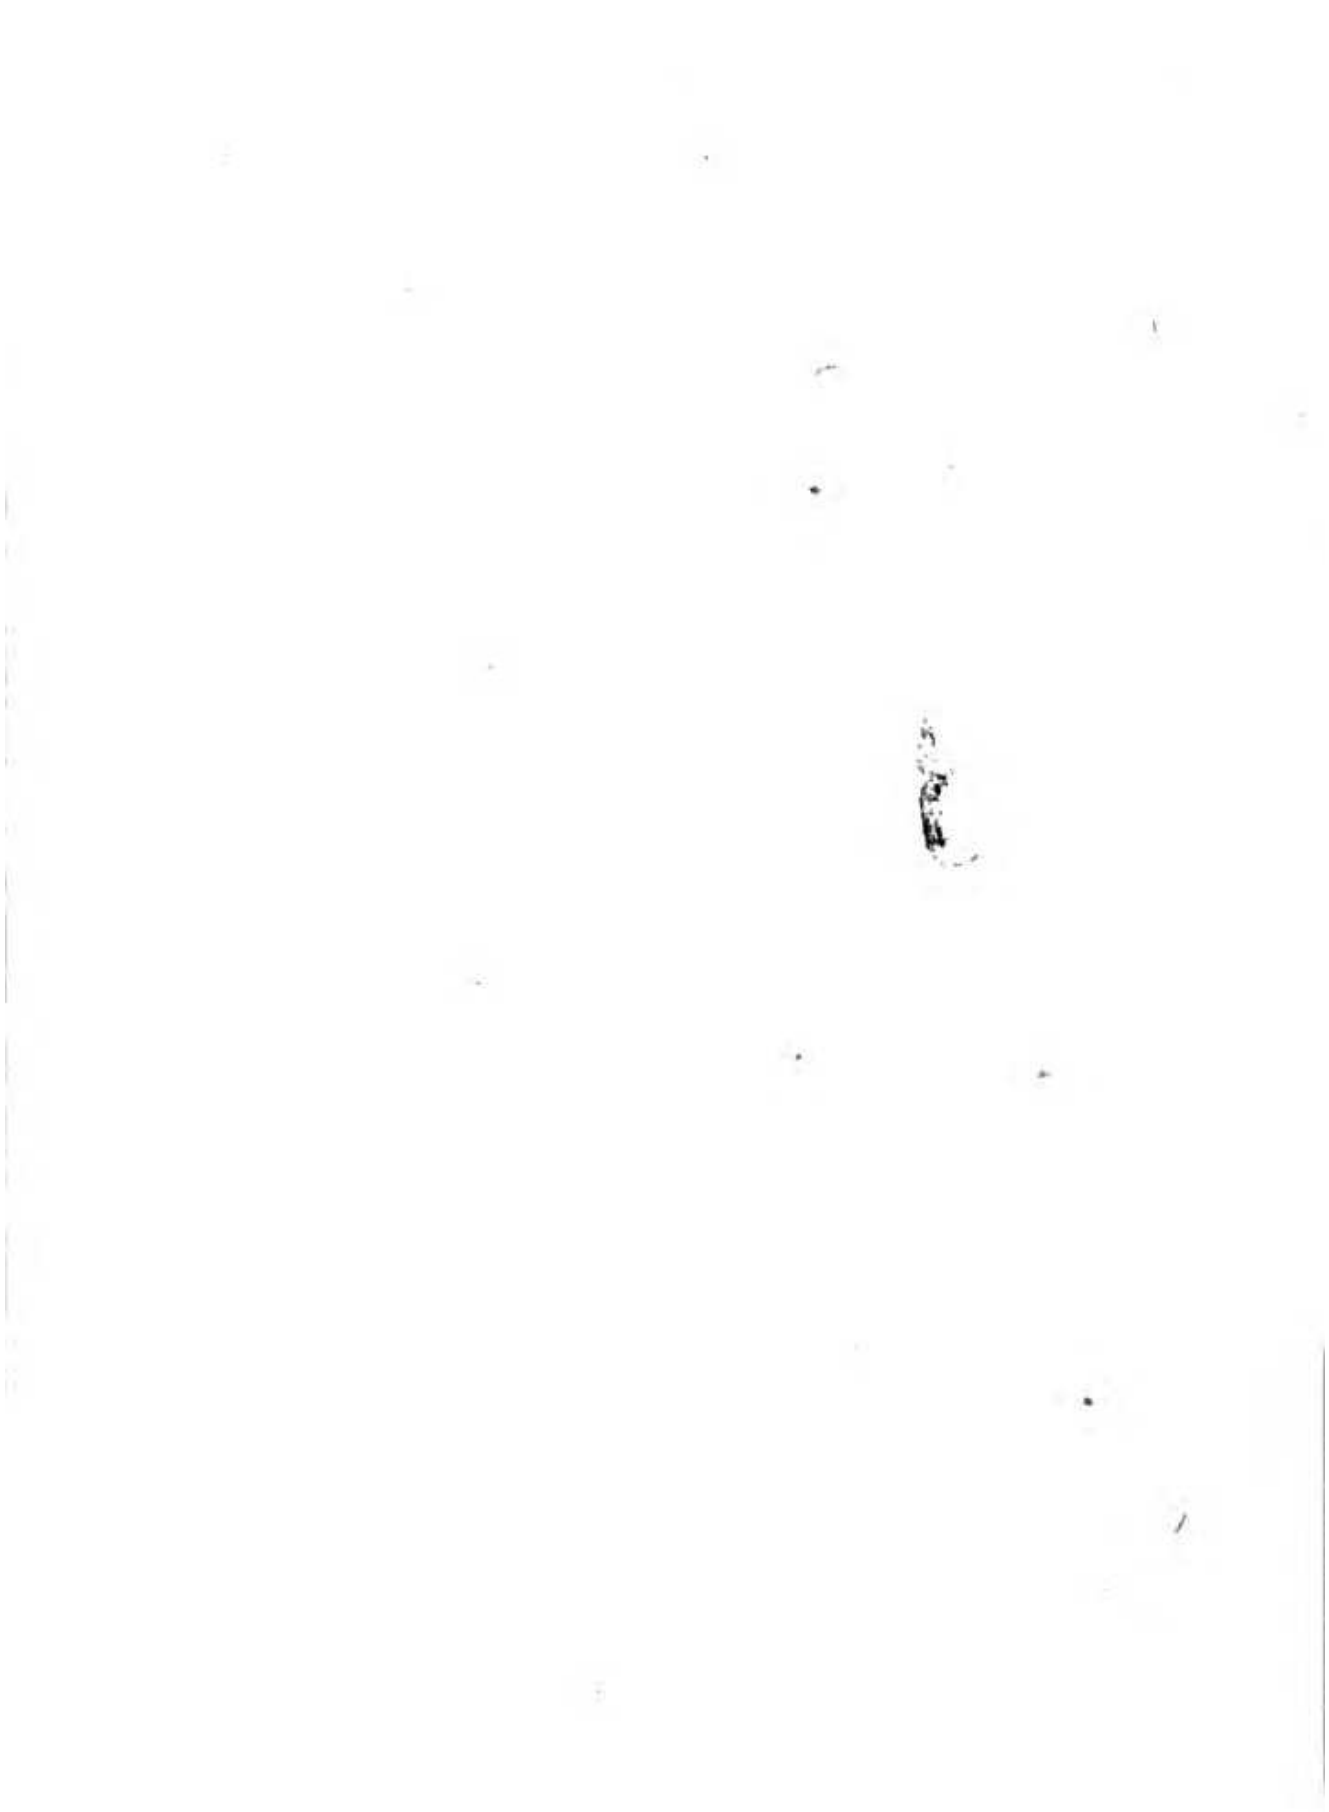
University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google



Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

By THE REV. P. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

VOLUME VI
Administrative Law
(Can. 1154-1551)

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68, GREAT RUSSELL ST., LONDON, W. C.
1921

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CUM PERMISSU SUPERIORUM

NIHIL OBSTAT

Sti. Ludovici, die 18. Nov. 1920

F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum.

IMPRIMATUR

Sti. Ludovici, die 22. Nov. 1920

✠Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici.

Copyright, 1921
by
Joseph Gummersbach

All rights reserved
Printed in U. S. A.

VAIL-BALLOU COMPANY
BINGHAMTON AND NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CQ
587682
·B12
6

IN RELIGIONE ET LABORE
SOCIO CARISSIMO
VIRO DOCTRINA EXCELLENTISSIMO

AD

S. VINCENTIUM SEMINARII
EGREGIO RECTORI
S. THEOLOGIAE DOCTORI

R. P. AMBROSIO KOHLBECK, O. S. B.

HANC
DE SEMINARIIS
LEGUM COLLECTIONEM
AUCTOR DEDICAT AMANTER

Green Book Shop
6 Mar 46

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

PAGE

BOOK III — PART II. SACRED PLACES AND TIMES 1

SECTION I. SACRED PLACES IN GENERAL 2
Definition 2
The Minister of Consecration 3
The Minister of a Blessing 6
Registration and Proof 7
Immunity of Sacred Places 9

TITLE IX. CHURCHES 12
Definition 12
Building of Churches 13
Dedication of a Church 19
The Consecration of Churches and Altars 23
Anniversary of Consecration 24
Titles and Titular Feasts 25
Church Bells 28
Loss of Consecration or Blessing 32
Effect of Consecration or Blessing 33
Desecration of a Church 35
Consequences of Desecration 41
The Reconciliation of Churches 42
Decorum of the House of God 46
Ius Asyli 47
The Title of Basilica 49
Entrance Fees not Allowed 50
The Administration of Churches 51
Trustees 55
Repair of Churches 58

TITLE X. ORATORIES 65
Definition and Division 65
Chapels of Cardinals and Bishops 68
Private Cemetery Chapels 69

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

Public Oratories 70
Semi-Public Oratories 72
Private Oratories 78

TITLE XI. ALTARS 84
Definition and Species 84
Requisites 86
Consecration of Altars 91
Loss of Consecration 93
Titles of Altars 96
Profane Uses Not Tolerated 97

TITLE XII. ECCLESIASTICAL BURIAL 100
Burial vs. Cremation 100
Ecclesiastical Burial 102

CHAPTER I. CEMETERIES 104
Blessed Cemeteries 104
Rights of the Church in Regard to Cemeteries . . 106
Interdict, Violation, etc., of Cemeteries 108
Owners of Cemeteries 108
Keeping of Cemeteries 111
Waiting Time 112
Exhumation 113

CHAPTER II. FUNERAL SERVICES AND INTERMENT . . 115
Conveying Bodies to Church 115
Parochial Rights in Regard to Burial 116
Transfer to One's Own Church 118
Burial of Cardinals and Bishops 120
Funeral of Beneficiaries 121
Funerals of Religious 122
Guests and Students of Religious 124
Selection of Sepulture 126
Ancestral Tombs 132
Duties and Rights of Pastors in Regard to Burials . 133
Burial 139
Funeral Processions 140
Mourners and Emblems 141
Funeral Fees 144
Portio Paroecialis 146
Recording of Deaths 150

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

CHAPTER III. ECCLESIASTICAL BURIAL, TO WHOM GRANTED OR DENIED 151
To Whom Granted 151
To Whom Denied 152
Exhumation of Corpses 159

SECTION II. HOLY SEASONS 160
Dispensations 163
Reckoning Feasts and Fast Days 168

TITLE XIII. HOLYDAYS 170
Obligations Connected with Holydays 172
Where Mass May be Heard 175

TITLE XIV. ABSTINENCE AND FASTING 177
The Law of Abstinence 177
The Law of Fasting 177
Days of Abstinence and Fasting 179
Particular Laws 180
Who Is Obliged to Fast and Abstain 184

PART III. DIVINE WORSHIP 186

Public and Private Worship 189
Approbation of the Liturgy 190
Communicatio in Sacris 192
Approbation of Devotions and Litanies 198
Independence from Secular Interference 200
Duty of the Ordinary 201
Separate Seats for Men and Women in Church . . 204
Distinguished Seats in Church 206
Church Music 208

TITLE XV. RESERVATION AND WORSHIP OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT 213
Open Churches 218
The Blessed Sacrament Altar 218
The Tabernacle 221
The Pyx 224
The Tabernacle Light 225
Altar Breads 226

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Frequent Assistance at Mass and Visits to the Bl. Sacrament 227
Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament 227
The Forty Hours' Devotion 233

TITLE XVI. WORSHIP OF THE SAINTS, SACRED IMAGES, AND RELICS 235
Public Worship of the Saints 236
Patron Saints 240
Pictures of Saints 241
Restoration of Statues and Paintings 243
Alienation of Relics and Images 244
Authentication of Relics 247
Exposition of Relics 251
Relics in the Bishop's Pectoral Cross 252
Precautions against the Sale and Profanation of Relics 253

TITLE XVII. SACRED PROCESSIONS 255
Definition and Division 255
Corpus Christi Procession 257
Other Processions 261
Religious Not Allowed to Hold Public Processions without the Permission of the Ordinary . . . 263
Pastors and the Clergy in Relation to Processions . 264
Order of Processions 265

TITLE XVIII. SACRED VESSELS, UTENSILS, VESTMENTS, ETC. (SACRA SUPELLEX) 267
Care and Maintenance 267
Cardinalitial, Episcopal, and Clerical Supellex . . 270
Duty of Making a Valid Testament 277
Custody of the Sacra Supellex 279
Further Directions Regarding the Sacra Supellex . 280
Blessing of the Sacra Supellex 281
Loss of Blessing or Consecration 284
Handling Sacred Vessels 286

TITLE XIX. VOWS AND OATHS 289

CHAPTER I. VOWS 289
Definition and Capacity 289
Kinds of Vows 292

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Reserved Vows 293
Personal Obligation 295
Cessation of Obligation 297
Irritation of Vows 299
Dispensation from Vows 303
Commutation of Vows 307

CHAPTER II. OATHS 310
Definition 310
The Obligation Arising from an Oath 312
Nature of Obligation 313
Cessation of Obligation 314
Dispensation from Oaths 316
Interpretation 316

PART IV. THE TEACHING OFFICE OF THE CHURCH 318

Right of the Church to Teach 319
The Material Object of Faith 322
Dangers to Faith 328
Profession of Faith 329
Bishops as Judges in Matters of Faith 336

TITLE XX. PREACHING THE WORD OF GOD 338
Missio Canonica 341

CHAPTER I. THE PASTOR'S DUTY 343
Catechetical Instruction 343
Catechists 346
Obligations of Religious 347
Duties of Parents 349
Diocesan Regulations 350

CHAPTER II. SERMONS 351
Faculty Required for Preaching 351
Religious Preachers 352
Religious vs. Ordinaries 354
Examination 356
Extradiocesan Preachers 359

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Who May Preach 362
The Pastor's Duty to Preach 364
Instruction in Christian Doctrine in Other than Parish Churches 366
Lenten and Advent Sermons 367
Subjects of Sermons 368
Duty of the People 369

CHAPTER III. MISSIONS 370
Missions to Non-Catholics 370

TITLE XXI. SEMINARIES 373
Right of the Church to Educate the Clergy . . . 374
The Duty of Pastors with Regard to Clerical Vocations 376
Diocesan Seminaries 377
The Seminaristicum 380
The Bishop's Duties in Regard to the Seminary . . 388
Seminary Officials 389
Diocesan Seminary Board 390
Qualifications of the Chief Seminary Officials . . 391
Seminary Confessors 393
Scholarships 394
Admission to Seminaries 395
Plan of Studies for Little Seminaries 396
Philosophy and Theology 398
Qualifications of Seminary Professors 401
The Religious Training of Seminarists 403
Exemption of the Seminary from Parochial Jurisdiction 406
Seminary Discipline 408
Students Outside the Seminary 410
Dismissal of Students 410

TITLE XXII. SCHOOLS 411
The Duty of Christian Education 411
Religious Instruction in Schools 413
Non-Catholic Schools 414
The Right of the Church to Establish Schools . . 416
Universities, Faculties, and Degrees 419
Rights Attaching to the Degree of Doctor 421

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Catholic Schools to be Established 422
Clerics to Pursue Higher Studies 423
Religious Instruction under Church Authority . . 423
School Inspection by the Local Ordinaries . . . 426

TITLE XXIII. THE CENSORSHIP AND PROHIBITION OF BOOKS 428
Right of the Church 428

CHAPTER I. PREVIOUS CENSORSHIP 433
Obligations of Clerics and Laymen 440
Various Exceptions 444
Bible Versions 447
When a New Approbation is Demanded 449
Diocesan Censors 450
The Imprimatur Must be Given in Writing . . . 452

CHAPTER II. THE PROHIBITION OF BOOKS 454
Who Has the Power to Forbid Books 454
Books Forbidden by the Apostolic See 458
The Obligation of Denouncing Books 459
The Effects of Prohibition 463
List of Forbidden Books 466
Exception in Favor of Theological Students . . . 475
Persons Exempt from the Prohibition 477
Faculties 478
Booksellers 481
Penal Sanction 483

TITLE XXIV. THE PROFESSION OF FAITH 485
Who Must Make It 485

PART V. BENEFICES AND OTHER NON-CORPORATE ECCLESIASTICAL INSTITUTIONS . 491

TITLE XXV. ECCLESIASTICAL BENEFICES 493
Definition 493
Division of Benefices 496

CHAPTER I. ESTABLISHMENT OR ERECTION OF BENEFICES 498
Competent Authority 498
Requisites of Erection 498

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

CHAPTER II. UNION, TRANSFER, DIVISION, DISMEMBERMENT, TRANSFORMATION, AND SUPPRESSION OF BENEFICES 501
Union 501
Transfer, Division, Dismemberment, etc. 502
Rights of the Local Ordinaries 503
Religious Benefices 505
Transfer of Secular Parochial Benefices 506
Division of Parishes 506
Pensions 513
Transformation 515

CHAPTER III. BESTOWAL OF BENEFICES 516
Cardinals and Ordinaries 516
Benefices Reserved to the Holy See 517
Acceptance 518
Provision to be Made for Life 519
Qualities of Beneficiaries 519
No Deductions Permissible 519
On Whom Benefices May be Conferred 520
Installation 521
Prescription and Titulus Coloratus 521
A Litigant Benefice 522

CHAPTER IV. IUSPATRONATUS OR ADVOWSON 524
Popular Patronage 526
Transmission of Patronage 527
Authentic Proof Required 527
Privileges of Patrons 527
Wife and Minors 528
Time of Presentation 528
Collegiate Presentation 529
Candidates 531
Rejection of the Candidate Presented 532
Effect of Accepted Presentation 532
Obligations of Patrons 533
Loss of the Iuspatronatus 534
Indult of Presentation 535

CHAPTER V. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF BENEFICIARIES . 536
Rights in General 536

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Order and Canonical Hours 538
Obligations of Administration 539
Leases 540
How the Revenues are to be Divided in Case of the Beneficiary's Death 540
What is to be Done in Case of Vacancy 541
Episcopal Revenues 541

CHAPTER VI. RESIGNATION AND EXCHANGE OF BENEFICES 542
Resignation 542
Exchange of Benefices 544

TITLE XXVI. OTHER NON-CORPORATE ECCLESIASTICAL INSTITUTIONS 546

PART VI. THE TEMPORAL POSSESSIONS OF THE CHURCH 549

Right of the Church to Possess Property 549

TITLE XXVII. THE ACQUISITION OF ECCLESIASTICAL PROPERTY 557
Division and Transfer of Church Property . . . 558
Begging 560
The Cathedraticum 561
Subsidium Charitativum 563
Prescription 566
Donations and Legacies 570
Change of Last Will 574

TITLE XXVIII. THE ADMINISTRATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY 577
The Sovereign Pontiff 577
The Local Ordinaries 578
The Diocesan Board of Administration 579
Administrators of Individual Institutions 581
The General Duties of Administrators 582
Special Duties of Administrators 586

TITLE XXIX. CONTRACTS 590
Ecclesiastical and Civil Contracts 590
Alienation 592

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Formalities of Alienation 599
Donations 601
Mortgages and Debts 603
Sale and Exchange 604
Administrators and Relatives Excluded 605
Lease or Rent 605
Interest 608

TITLE XXX. PIOUS FOUNDATIONS 610
Definition 610
Safeguards of Foundations 612
Formalities 613
Exempt Religious 614
Reduction of Obligations 615

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

BOOK III—PART II

SACRED PLACES AND TIMES

INTRODUCTION

After the treatise on the Sacraments and Sacramentals, we come to sacred places as the next subject of consideration. Sacred places partake, as it were, of the sacramental nature and may, therefore, be truly called vehicles of sanctification. Besides, being consecrated or blessed, they may be claimed by the ecclesiastical authorities as their own, and are not subject to civil power.

Means of sanctification are also sacred times, namely holydays and days of fasting and abstinence. These form the subject-matter of Part II of the Third Book of the Code.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION I

SACRED PLACES IN GENERAL

DEFINITION

CAN. 1154

Loca sacra ea sunt quae divino cultui fideliumve sepulturae deputantur consecratione vel benedictione quam probati liturgici libri ad hoc praescribunt.

Sacred places are places set aside for divine worship, or for the burial of the faithful, by a consecration or blessing prescribed for this purpose by the approved liturgical books.

The custom of withdrawing certain buildings from profane uses and dedicating them to the divinity, is as old as divine worship itself. The act by which a place is made sacred, is called consecration or blessing. The canonical effects of both are the same. These effects consist partly in the destination of an otherwise profane thing for sacred functions and worship, partly in the prohibition of profane acts being performed in sacred places. Hence Can. 1172 mentions the violation or defilement of a church if certain acts are committed therein. Besides, the sacred character is apparent from the ius asyli referred to in Can. 1179. Finally, though this is not specially mentioned in the text, certain profane acts must not be performed in sacred places. Such acts are civil trials, theatrical and purely secular entertainments,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

political or merely worldly meetings, and every species of buying and selling.[1]

As we said, the canonical effects of consecration and blessing are identical. But there is a difference in the sacramental effects. Consecration is an act performed by the bishop with certain prayers and anointing with oil and chrism, whereas a blessing consists of prayers and aspersions with holy water, which, even though reserved to the bishop, may also be performed by priests.[2] Consecration, therefore, is also called solemn dedication, whereas a blessing is a less solemn initiation.[3]

The liturgical books which contain the formularies for consecrations and blessings are the Roman Pontifical and the Roman Ritual.

THE MINISTER OF CONSECRATION

CAN. 1155

§ 1. Consecratio alicuius loci, quanquam ad regulares pertinentis, spectat ad Ordinarium territorii in quo locus ipse reperitur, dummodo Ordinarius charactere episcopali sit insignitus, non tamen ad Vicarium Generalem sine speciali mandato, firmo iure S. R. E. Cardinalium consecrandi ecclesiam et altaria sui tituli.

§ 2. Ordinarius territorii, licet charactere episcopali careat, potest cuilibet eiusdem ritus Episcopo licentiam dare consecrationes peragendi in suo territorio.

Our canon substantially repeats the old law, which made it very plain that no strange bishop, even though he

1 Cfr. Aichner, Compendium Iuris Eccl., § 203, 3.

2 Cfr. Pontificale Rom., De ecclesiae dedicatione sive consecratione; Rituale Rom., tit. VIII, c. 27.

3 Wernz, Ius Decretal., III, n. 436, p. 437, ed. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

has built a church at his expense in another diocese, may consecrate a temple outside his own territory.[4] Abbots were forbidden to consecrate churches and altars.[5] This provision is here reenacted, for even regulars have to call in the bishop in whose territory a church is to be consecrated. Only in case the local Ordinary, after repeated requests on the part of the regulars, should refuse to perform the consecration, are they permitted to call in another bishop, as Leo X had enacted at the Vth Lateran Council.[6]

A Vicar General who is endowed with the episcopal dignity, may consecrate sacred places only by special commission from the Ordinary, which should be repeated every time a consecration is to take place.

Cardinals who are not bishops may by law validly consecrate the churches and altars of their own title. Cardinals who are endowed with the episcopal character may, in virtue of a special privilege, consecrate churches and altars everywhere with the consent of the local Ordinary.[7]

An Ordinary who is not endowed with the episcopal character may grant the faculty of consecrating places to any bishop of the same rite. Thus a Prelate or Abbot Nullius, if he is not a bishop, may call any bishop of the same rite into his diocese for that purpose. The same applies to vicars-capitular or administrators. Sede vacante the regulars also must apply to the latter, who shall call in a bishop for the purpose.[8]

From all the ancient texts, which in this case have not been abolished, it follows that the episcopal character is 4 Cc. 1, 3, C. 16, q. 5.

5 C. 10, C. 16, q. 1.

6 "Dum intra," Dec. 19, 1516, § 12.

7 See can. 239, § 1, n. 20. The Cardinal-Vicar of Rome is not entitled to consecrate titular churches and altars of other cardinals; S. Rit. C., Jan. 30, 1879 (Dec. Auth., n. 3478).

8 Many, De Locis Sacris, 1904, p. 32.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

required for valid consecration, although this requisite is of merely ecclesiastical (but universal) law. The consequence is that the Pope, and he alone, can dispense from this law and grant the faculty to consecrate places to such as are not bishops. Benedict XIV granted to Abbot Engelbert of Kempten in Bavaria the privilege of consecrating his abbey-church. A personally granted privilege seems to be required, as Benedict XIV insinuates in his letter.[9] If an abbot claims the right to consecrate a church, he must possess a special privilege of the Apostolic See and exhibit it to the bishop who would otherwise be entitled to perform the function.[10]

A consequence of this requirement is that any validly consecrated bishop, even though he be a heretic, or a schismatic, or under censure, may validly, though not licitly, consecrate churches and altars.

Notice the term "eiusdem ritus," which excludes a mixture of rites. Hence a Latin Ordinary may not licitly grant permission, say to the Ruthenian bishop of our country or Canada, to consecrate a Latin church.[11]

Observe, finally, the expression, "Ordinarius territorii," which includes all Ordinaries, whether their territories are large or small, and also the abbots and prelates mentioned in can. 319, § 2.

It may be added that a metropolitan has no right to interfere with consecrations in the territories of his suffragan bishops.

9 "Ex tuis precibus," Nov. 16, 1748.

10 S. Rit. C., April 14, 1674 (Dec. Auth., n. 1505).

11 S. O., June 16, 1831 (Coll. P. F., n. 822): "non expedire," which means that the consecration would be valid, but illicit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE MINISTER OF A BLESSING

CAN. 1156

Ius benedicendi locum sacrum, si hic pertineat ad clerum saecularem vel ad religionem non exemptam, vel ad laicalem, spectat ad Ordinarium territorii in quo locus reperitur; si ad religionem clericalem exemptam, ad Superiorem maiorem; uterque vero potest alium sacerdotem ad hoc delegare.

The right of blessing a sacred place belongs (1) to the Ordinary in whose territory the place is situated, concerning all places which belong to the secular clergy, or to non-exempt religious, or to lay persons, even though these be an ecclesiastical corporation which constructed the church;[12] (2) to the major superior, if the place belongs to exempt religious, i. e., who are such either in virtue of their regular character or by reason of a special privilege.

The Ordinary as well as the religious superior may delegate another priest, whether secular or religious, whether pastor or not,[13] to bless a place, but not to consecrate it.[14] Hence provincials, abbots, guardians, conventual priors and all who enjoy the power of quasi-provincials, may bless churches and altars either themselves or through others.[15]

CAN. 1157

Non obstante quolibet privilegio, nemo potest locum sacrum consecrare vel benedicere sine Ordinarii consensu.

12 S. Rit. C., Oct. 7, 1645 (Dec. Auth., n. 889).

13 Ibid., and Aug. 7 1875 (ibid., n. 3364, ad 1).

14 S. Rit. C., Oct. 7, 1645.

15 Reg. Iuris, 68, 72 in 6°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

No one may bless or consecrate a sacred place without the consent of the Ordinary, notwithstanding any privilege.

The Ordinary whose consent is required for consecration, is the one in whose territory the church or altar is located. This rule, we repeat, binds all, regulars and seculars, individuals and corporations, no matter whether or not they have built, or helped to build, the church or altar.[16] To bless a church or altar the consent of the Ordinary is required, as explained under can. 1156.

The name of Ordinary, in this latter case, also comprises the higher religious superiors.

The required consent may be given either in writing or orally, but should, in ordinary cases, be express. In urgent cases we believe consent may be lawfully presumed for a blessing, but hardly for a consecration, because a consecration is a pontifical right, which may not be exercised in alien territory.[17]

REGISTRATION AND PROOF

CAN. 1158

De peracta consecratione vel benedictione redigatur documentum, cuius alterum exemplar in Curia episcopali, alterum in ecclesiae archivo servetur.

CAN. 1159

§ 1. Consecratio vel benedictio alicuius loci, modo nemini damnum fiat, satis probatur etiam per unum testem omni exceptione maiorem.

§ 2. Si de ea legitime constet, nec consecratio nec

16 Cc. 1, 3, C. 16, q. 5; S. Rit. C., Oct. 7, 1645 (Dec. Auth., n. 889).

17 Trid., Sess. 6, c. 5, de ref.; c. 28, C. 7, q. 1, inflicts one year's suspension a divinis, but our Code contains no penalty.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

benedictio iterari potest; in dubio autem, peragatur ad cautelam.

After the consecration or blessing a report should be drawn up, of which one copy is to be kept in the episcopal court, and another in the archives of the church.

Consecration or blessing can be proved by one trustworthy witness, provided no damage is done to a third person.

Neither consecration nor blessing is to be repeated after legal proof has been furnished that it has taken place; but if there is doubt, the act may be performed provisionally (ad cautelam).

A sufficient proof would be the testimony of an authentic document or the deposition of an eye-witness.[18] Damage would be caused if a consecrated or blessed church were given over to profane uses. Formerly one who consecrated a church or an altar was entitled to the tithes offered there. Hence the requirement of an unprejudiced witness.

Reconsecration is forbidden for an analogous reason as rebaptism, viz.: because the ceremony imprints an indelible character.[19] For this reason canonists have taught that if a positive doubt exists as to whether a church or an altar has been consecrated, the consecration should take place, and Benedict XIV sanctioned this teaching, now embodied in the Code.[20] The mere age of a church would not create a positive doubt as to its not being consecrated or dedicated. The constantly observed anniversary of the dedication, especially if for the consecration of the main altar some kind of document were preserved, would make reconsecration unnecessary, even though there were no

18 C. 16, Dist. 1, de cons.; S. Rit. C., Aug. 19, 1634 ad 1 (Dec. Auth., n. 611).

19 C. 3, Dist. 68; C. 10, Dist. L, de cons.; c. 111, Dist. 4, de cons.

20 "Iam inde," Nov. 17, 1706.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

authentic document and no traces of the crosses appeared on the walls.[21] If neither crosses nor documents are available, and the church was entirely remodelled or rebuilt, consecration must take place.[22] If the doubt cannot be dispersed, consecration should be performed provisionally. This does not mean conditional consecration, but, as the text says, ad cautelam, according to the formula contained in the Roman Pontifical.

IMMUNITY OF SACRED PLACES

CAN. 1160

Loca sacra exempta sunt a iurisdictione auctoritatis civilis et in eis legitima Ecclesiae auctoritas iurisdictionem suam libere exercet.

Sacred places are exempt from the jurisdiction of the civil authority, and the lawful ecclesiastical authority freely exercises jurisdiction in them.

This is what is called localis immunitas, or exemption from civil power in the use and administration of these places. Even the pagans felt awe and reverence for sacred places. The very terms ἱερόν and sanctum instilled respect for the spot or district set apart for the gods. No criminal or unclean person was allowed to enter these temene or sacred precincts, and no animal was admitted into them. The fact that such places were either erected or protected by public authority shielded them from vexation and profanation.[23] All this goes to show that there is in man what we might call a natural instinct of 21 S. Rit. C., Nov. 27, 1706 (Dec. Auth., n. 2174).

22 S. Rit. C., Dec. 17, 1875; Aug. 19, 1878 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3385, 3462).

23 Cfr. Stengel, Die Griech. Kultusaltertümer, 1898, p. 18 ff.; Ramsay-Lanciani, Manual of Roman Antiquities, p. 372 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reverence for things that belong to God. It was not priestly arrogance, then, on the part of the Christian Church that she claimed these natural prerogatives and that the Christian emperors accorded them, as it were, spontaneously. A specific exemption was the ius metatus or right of quartering soldiers in churches. The Church would not permit secular trials, civil or criminal, to be held in sacred places, nor purely worldly meetings, markets, and political assemblies.[24] This immunity still exists. Our States have enacted laws which protect at least the safety and decorum of church meetings. While no church is "established" here in the European sense of the word, all are "established for the purpose of the security of the worshippers from penalties or from molestation in the act of worship."[25] Church purposes in the United States are strictly private purposes, it is true, but they are of more than passing interest to the general public.[26] This, of course, naturally implies that the administration and government of a sacred place belonging to the Catholic Church must be acknowledged and carried out according to its own constitution and laws. For without such authority the important provisions in the constitutions which guarantee the free enjoyment of religious beliefs and worship to every person would become nugatory.[27] The Catholic Church cannot permit her temples to become — as was customary before 1776[28] — places for town meetings, lectures, concerts, temperance or political meetings and for other profane purposes.

24 Cfr. cc. 1, 5, X, iii, 49; c. 2, 6°, III, 23.

25 Cfr. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 286.

26 Ibid., p. 407: "Says the Missouri court in a dedication case: it is presumed that in the nineteenth century, in a Christian land, no argument is necessary to show that church purposes are public purposes."

27 Ibid., p. 286.

28 Ibid., p. 407.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here we may add some practical observations occasioned by the recent influenza epidemic. The Church is not opposed to sanitary and hygienic regulations intended to safeguard the public health and welfare. But she cannot recognize the authority of a local board of health to close a church or to command the clergy to do so. Such measures, when necessary, have to be taken through the hierarchy, i. e., the bishop of the diocese, who should not shirk his duty. This is an act of jurisdiction proper to the diocesan court.

A last remark: The text does not state on what ground the Church claims immunity for sacred places, whether by divine or ecclesiastical law. The majority of canonists attribute it either to divine law or (at least) to the natural dictates of reason. The latter view may be safely defended on the basis of universal consent.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE IX

CHURCHES

DEFINITION

CAN. 1161

Ecclesiae nomine intelligitur aedes sacra divino cultui dedicata eum potissimum in finem ut omnibus Christifidelibus usui sit ad divinum cultum publice exercendum.

By the term church is understood a sacred building dedicated to divine worship, chiefly for the purpose that it may be made use of by all the faithful for public services.

The Latin term ecclesia (from ἐκκαλέω) was the first in vogue among Christians for their meeting places.[1] "Temple" was rarely used up to the fourth century, probably to avoid confounding Christian places of worship with Jewish and pagan temples.

The definition of "church" in the Code contains three characteristics: (a) sacred building, to distinguish it from altars and furniture and common buildings; (b) dedicated to divine worship, by consecration or solemn blessing; and (c) chiefly for the purpose that it be open to all the faithful. The last-named characteristic distin-

1 Cfr. I Cor. 11, 12; Tertull., De Velandis Virg., 13; De Pudicitia, 4. The term dominicum, from the Greek κυριακόν, was also used early; from this latter expression the Scotch kirk, English church, and German Kirche arose. Other terms, like basilica and martyrium, have a specific meaning as to form or kind.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

guishes a church from an oratory, either domestic or semi-public, for oratories may vie with, or even surpass churches in size and be consecrated like them, but, unlike churches, are intended only for certain classes of people or certain families.[2]

BUILDING OF CHURCHES

CAN. 1162

§ 1. Nulla ecclesia aedificetur sine expresso Ordinarii loci consensu scriptis dato, quem tamen Vicarius Generalis praestare nequit sine mandato speciali.

§ 2. Ordinarius consensum ne praebeat, nisi prudenter praeviderit necessaria non defutura ad novae ecclesiae aedificationem et conservationem ad ministrorum sustentationem aliasque cultus impensas.

§ 3. Ne nova ecclesia ceteris iam exsistentibus detrimentum afferat, maiore fidelium spirituali utilitate non compensatum, Ordinarius, antequam consensum praebeat, audire debet vicinarum ecclesiarum rectores quorum intersit, firmo praescripto can. 1676.

§ 4. Etiam sodales religiosi, licet consensum constituendae novae domus in dioecesi vel civitate ab Ordinario loci retulerint, antequam tamen ecclesiam vel oratorium publicum in certo ac determinato loco aedificent, Ordinarii loci licentiam obtinere debent.

CAN. 1163

Benedicere et imponere primarium ecclesiae lapidem, ad eos spectat, de quibus in can. 1156.

2 S. Rit. C., May 18, 1883, ad IV, 5; June 5, 1899 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3574, 4025).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1164

§ 1. Curent Ordinarii, audito etiam, si opus fuerit, peritorum consilio, ut in ecclesiarum aedificatione vel refectione serventur formae a traditione christiana receptae et artis sacrae leges.

§ 2. In ecclesia nullus aperiatur aditus vel fenestra ad laicorum domus; locaque, si adsint, subter ecclesiae pavimentum aut supra ecclesiam, ad usum mere profanum ne adhibeantur.

Can. 1162 provides that the consent of the Ordinary must be obtained for building a church. No church, says § 1, may be built without the express consent, in writing, of the diocesan Ordinary. The Vicar General cannot give this consent without a special mandate from the Ordinary.

This is partly old and partly new law, as far as the written consent is concerned. The Council of Chalcedon forbade religious to construct oratories without the consent of the diocesan.[3] Other synods also insist upon this formality.[4]

§ 2 rules that the Ordinary shall withhold his consent until he is convinced that the necessary means for building and maintaining a new church, and for supporting the ministers and defraying other expenditures of religious worship, will not be wanting. This, too, is ancient practice. Ancient councils insisted on the necessary dowry (dos) for every new church.[5] This requirement is also stated in the Roman Pontifical.[6] The Ordinary is

[3] C. 10, C. 18, q. 2.

[4] Cfr. c. 44, C. 16, q. 1 (Worms); c. 9, Dist. 1, de cons. (Orleans).

[5] C. 26, C. 16, q. 7; c. 8, x, III, 40.

[6] P. II, tit., de benedictione et impositione primarii lapidis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

therefore most solemnly charged to examine the financial prospects of a new church.

§ 3 of can. 1162 adds another condition for the consent: In order that the new church may not become a detriment to churches already existing, if the loss would not be compensated by the spiritual advantage of the faithful, the Ordinary shall, before giving his consent, hear the interested rectors of the neighboring churches, with due regard, however, to can. 1676. This canon is a repetition of an old Roman Law which passed into the Decretals,[7] and rules that everyone,— in our case every rector of a church already in existence,— who believes himself to be injured by the erection of a new church, may sue for an injunction before the judge. The effect is somewhat similar to legal estoppel, but is only temporary, until the judge has decided the case. But although the new building should not be continued while the case is pending, the builder may go on with the work, provided he gives security to restore everything to the condition before the work commenced in case the sentence should be against him. Our Code grants two months to the plaintiff or objector to prove his contention. This term may be prolonged or shortened by the competent judge. Hence the bishop has to listen to the objections of the interested rectors, summon the parties and witnesses, in fact, conduct an ecclesiastical trial, at least in summary form.

§ 4 mentions religious who wish to build a church or public oratory. These, although they have already obtained the consent of the local Ordinary for establishing a house in the diocese or city, must obtain the permission of the local Ordinary before they can build a church or public oratory in a certain and specified place. Concerning this we have said enough elsewhere,[8] and nothing we have said needs modification. We will only add a case: A religious community had received permission to build a house in a certain city. They did so, and opened a public oratory within the boundaries of a parish church as yet in the "catacomb" or basement stage. This drew some substantial and perhaps niggardly parishioners to the new chapel, who contributed neither to the oratory of the religious nor to the parish church. The solution is evident. The bishop had to stop the new chapel or else cut off part of the parish and give it to the religious.

7 Cfr. Dig. 39, 1; Cod. VIII, 10, 14; X, V, 32, de novi operis nuntiatione; Gasparri, De SSma Euch., 1897, I, n. 125, p. 81.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Note that after the promulgation of the Code no religious, however exempt, can escape the law; and if the bishop granted permission before the promulgation, he may now withdraw it, provided the building was not commenced or the site changed. For the Code says: in a certain and specified place. Besides, under § 1 of can. 1162 written consent is required.

Can. 1163 rules that the blessing and laying of the cornerstone belongs to those who are entitled to bless the church. Hence the Ordinary or his delegate, or the superior of exempt religious or his delegate, may bless and lay the corner-stone.

Can. 1164 admonishes Ordinaries to see to it that new churches are built and old ones repaired in accordance with the time-honored laws of Christian architecture and the rules of sacred art.

This can best be explained in the school-room, where lectures on Christian art should be given. The earliest form of church building was the basilica, which was 8 Cfr. Vol. III, p. 89, can. 497. Formerly they only needed the permission of the Holy See for building a monastery; c. 4, 6°, V, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

evolved from the ancient Roman dwelling-house.[9] About the eighth century the Romanesque style absorbed the basilica, and later the Gothic style added its distinct and pointed features. Out of these arose two mixtures, viz., Barocco and Rococo, of which the former may have some claim to the name of traditional architecture, whereas the extreme Rococo can hardly be called anything else but a mental and architectural aberration. Then there is the Byzantine style, which has found favor here and there, even in our country, and certainly comes up to the requirements of Christian art.

Our text adds that, if necessary, experts should be consulted. This is a dictate of common sense. The rules of art demand that the style should fit into the landscape and its surroundings. The financial resources also must be considered. But a well-trained taste will be able to erect a monument even of cheaper material. Finally the practical and acoustic side should receive attention. Too many and heavy pillars are hardly practicable for a parish church; too great a distance between people and altar is not compatible with the all-absorbing idea of the sacrifice. These are merely suggestions based on experience.

§ 2 of can. 1164 says that no opening or window may lead from the church into the house of lay people and that the space underneath or above the church should not be used for profane purposes.

As to the first clause it may be noted that an episcopal palace [10] or priest's residence may be built in such a way that a gate or window leads into the church. Religious, with the permission of the bishop, may have a choir built in their house leading into the church, from which they may assist at Mass or pay their visits to the Bl. Sacrament.

9 Cfr. Lowrie, Monuments of the Early Church, 1901, p. 83 ff.

10 This was formerly refused; cfr. Gasparri, l. c., n. 127, p. 83.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The next clause may cause surprise to more than one pastor, for it would seem to affect the so-called combination-buildings (church and school combined) so often found here. If there is nothing else attached to such a building, we believe it is not forbidden, for the text says, "ad usum mere profanum," which cannot be applied to a parish school. The case is different if the basement or the hall above the church would be used for merely profane meetings or entertainments. The decisions are decidedly against such use, even if the basement were only used as a theatre for the school-children.[11] The reason is that the church together with the basement is, as a whole, consecrated (per modum unius). The decisions have consecration in view. Do they apply to churches which are blessed? There is no doubt that, as stated above, the canonical effect of consecration and blessing, as far as the church is concerned, is the same. However, there is a difference between consecration and blessing, and we hardly believe that a combination building could be consecrated. Besides, as shall be seen under can. 1172, the defilement of a church must affect the church itself. Hence it is commonly taught that the sacristy or tower of a church, or a crypt which has neither chapels nor a burial place, is not polluted by acts performed therein.[12] From this it would seem to follow that the basement or hall of a church is not, strictly speaking, included in the church proper. The consequence would be that the hall or basement of the church (if this were merely blessed) might be used for purposes which would otherwise be excluded.

We would also draw attention to the fact of necessity which exists in many places. However, we must add 11 S. Rit. C., May 4, 1882 (Dec. Auth., n. 3546).

12 Many, l. c., p. 78 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that the intention of the lawgiver certainly is to prohibit merely worldly uses which have no connection with the church. Dances, balls, and noisy banquets should not be held in these places.

We add some decisions. A dormitory, even for clerical students, is not permitted immediately above the ceiling of the chapel or church; only if it is separated by an intervening space or room provided with solid walls, may it be placed above the church.[13] There should be no cellar under the church.[14]

DEDICATION OF A CHURCH

CAN. 1165

§ 1. Divina officia celebrari in nova ecclesia nequeunt, antequam eadem vel sollemni consecratione vel saltem benedictione divino cultui fuerit dedicata.

§ 2. Si prudenter praevideatur ecclesiam conversum iri ad usus profanos, Ordinarius consensum eius aedificationi ne praebeat, aut saltem, si forte aedificata fuerit, eam ne consecret neve benedicat.

§ 3. Sollemni consecratione dedicentur ecclesiae cathedrales et, quantum fieri potest, ecclesiae collegiatae, conventuales, paroeciales.

§ 4. Ecclesia ex ligno vel ferro aliove metallo benedici potest, non autem consecrari.

§ 5. Altare consecrari potest etiam sine ecclesiae consecratione; sed una simul cum ecclesia debet saltem altare maius consecrari aut altare secundarium, si maius sit iam consecratum.

§ 1. Divine service may not be held in a new church

13 S. Rit. C., May 11, 1641; July 27, 1878 (Dec. Auth., nn. 756, 3460).

14 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1867 (ibid., n. 3156).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

before it has been solemnly consecrated or at least dedicated to the worship of God by a blessing.

This law dates back to remote antiquity. Eusebius, the "Father of Church History," tells us that, soon after the persecutions had ceased, churches were dedicated in the presence of gatherings of bishops, priests, and a great multitude of lay-people, who counted distance nothing, being united in love and joy on the occasion. He inserts his own discourse delivered at the dedication of a church at Tyre.[15]

No special ritual for church dedications can be traced before the eighth or ninth century. According to the two most ancient Ordines Romani, the chief ceremony appears to have been the translation of relics. A description of the liturgical act of dedication in use in France at the beginning of the eighth century shows that it closely resembled the present rite, as found in the Roman Pontifical.[16] Thus we may say that, although at first churches were perhaps dedicated by celebrating the divine mysteries, yet from the eighth century onward a special ritual was followed, which finally developed into the present rite.

Dedication then is performed by either consecration or blessing.

Consecration essentially consists in anointing with chrism the twelve crosses which are placed on the walls or pillars of the church, with the formula: "Sanctificetur et consecretur hoc templum in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, etc."[17] The bishop should go around the whole church three times. If this cannot be done, he

15 Hist. Eccl., X, 3, 1 ff. (cfr. Die Griech. Christl. Schriftsteller, by Schwarz-Mommsen, Vol. II, 860 ff.)

16 Cfr. Duchesne-McClure, Divine Worship, 1903, p. 407 ff.

17 S. Rit. C., April 12, 1614 (Dec. Auth., n. 319).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

should at least go about those parts which are accessible.[18] If (e. g., on account of bad weather) the prayers and sprinkling of the outside walls cannot take place, what is to be done? The S. Congregation answered as follows: If possible, recourse should be had to the Holy See; but if the consecration cannot be delayed, the solemn function may begin in the sacristy, or in the vestibule, or in some other convenient place, and the outside walls should be sprinkled as well as it can possibly be done; but the people are not to be admitted into the church from the beginning of the ceremony.[19] One and the same bishop must consecrate the church and the main, or at least one, altar.[20]

Blessing a church consists essentially in sprinkling the upper and lower part of the walls, either inside or outside, with holy water. All churches and public oratories must be at least blessed according to the formula in the Roman Ritual.[21] Unless they are blessed no titular feast may be celebrated.[22] Nor does the fact that the cemetery is blessed create a presumption in favor of the church.[23] Before the blessing is imparted, divine service may not be celebrated in a church. This means that Mass may not be said, the sacraments may not be administered, and there is to be no preaching; for these offices especially constitute divine worship (cfr. can. 2256).

§ 2. If it can be reasonably foreseen that a church will be turned to profane uses, the Ordinary shall not consent to its being built, nor consecrate or bless it after it is built. There would be room for prudent fear if a church

18 S. Rit. C., Sept. 19, 1665, ad 1 (ibid., n. 1321).

19 S. Rit. C., Feb. 22, 1888 (ibid., n. 16).

20 S. Rit. C., March 3, 1866 (ibid., n. 3142).

21 S. Rit. C., June 5, 1899 (ibid., n. 4025).

22 S. Rit. C., Sept. 2, 1871, ad II, 3 (ibid., n. 3255).

23 S. Rit. C., Feb. 21, 1896, ad IV, (ibid., n. 3888).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or public oratory belonged to a private family and thus be liable to transfer and subsequent profanation by way of sale or alienation.[24]

§ 3. Cathedral churches and also, as far as possible, collegiate, conventual, and parish churches, should be solemnly consecrated.

§ 4. Churches built of wood or iron, or some other metal, may be blessed, but not consecrated.

As to rural chapels and oratories of confraternities or pious associations, they may be consecrated if built of stone or brick, but if the bishop does not wish to consecrate them he may delegate a priest to bless them.[25].

Churches built of reinforced concrete (caementum armatum) may be solemnly consecrated, provided that the places for the twelve crosses and the door posts of the main entrance be of stone.[26]

§ 5. An altar may be consecrated even if the church is not consecrated; but together with the church the main altar (or, if the main altar is already consecrated), a side altar must be consecrated. This section embodies the substance of former decisions of the S. Congregation, as summarized in a decree of the S. Rit. C., June 8, 1896. This decree states that the consecration of a church without the simultaneous consecration of at least one altar is valid but illicit if performed without Apostolic dispensation.[27] The reason is to be sought in the integrity of the whole ceremony.

24 S. Rit. C., May 4, 1882, ad I (ibid., n. 3546).

25 S. Rit. C., Aug. 7, 1875, ad 1 (ibid., n. 3364).

26 S. Rit. C., Nov. 12, 1909 (n. 4240).

27 Dec. Auth., n. 3907 (also nn. 1321, 2177).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES AND ALTARS

CAN. 1166

§ 1. Ecclesiarum consecratio, quamvis quolibet die fieri possit, decentius tamen diebus dominicis aliisve festis de praecepto peragitur.

§ 2. Episcopus consecrans et qui petunt ecclesiam sibi consecrari, per eum diem qui consecrationem praecedit, ieiunent.

§ 3. Cum consecratur ecclesia vel altare, Episcopus consecrator, licet iurisdictione in territorio careat, indulgentiam concedit unius anni ecclesiam vel altare visitantibus in ipsa consecrationis die; in die vero anniversaria quinquaginta dierum, si sit Episcopus; centum, si Archiepiscopus; biscentum, si S. R. E. Cardinalis.

§ 1. Although churches may be consecrated on any day, it is meet that Sundays or holydays of obligation be chosen for that purpose.

§ 2. The consecrating bishop as well as those who have petitioned for consecration, shall fast on the day preceding the consecration.

This fast is of strict obligation. It is personal as well as local.[28] Thus if a founder asks the bishop to consecrate a church or public oratory, he is bound to fast the day before; if a chapter or corporation (v. g., parish) or religious community ask for consecration, the whole chapter, etc., are bound to fast, including those who voted against the consecration.[29] But the chaplain of religious communities of sisters who asked for the favor would not have to fast, even though he submitted the petition to the 28 S. Rit. C., July 29, 1780; Sept. 12, 1840 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2519).

29 Many, l. c., p. 33.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bishop. Of course, if he had asked for it personally, he too would be bound to fast.

§ 3. At the consecration of a church or altar the consecrating bishop, though he may not have jurisdiction over the territory, grants an indulgence of one year to all who visit the church or altar on the day of the consecration; of fifty days for the anniversary of the consecration; of 100 days if he be an archbishop, 200 if he be a cardinal.

ANNIVERSARY OF CONSECRATION

CAN. 1167

Festum consecrationis ecclesiae quotannis celebretur ad normam legum liturgicarum.

The feast of the consecration of a church is to be celebrated annually according to the rubrics.

The latest decrees [30] concerning this subject are: Provided the cathedral church has been consecrated and not merely blessed:

(a) The feast of the dedication is a primary feast and festum Domini;

(b) The anniversary must be celebrated as a first-class feast with octave throughout the diocese by the secular clergy and also by the religious clergy if the latter follow the diocesan calendar; if they have their own calendar, they must celebrate the anniversary of the dedication of the cathedral as a feast of the first class without octave;

(c) The anniversary must be celebrated on the day proper and not transferred to a Sunday; [31]

(d) The anniversary of the dedication of the cathe-

30 S. Rit. C., Nov. 1, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 646 f.).

31 If the day is not recorded or remembered, the Ordinary, with the advice of the chapter, may semel pro semper assign a day.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dral must be celebrated separately from the dedication of all the churches of the diocese; for the latter feast (dedicatio omnium ecclesiarum dioeceseos) a day may be designated by the Ordinary;

(e) The same rule must be observed by religious orders or congregations with regard to the celebration of the dedication of all the churches of their institute;[32]

(f) The feast of the dedication of all the churches of a diocese (or institute) must be understood in the sense that each church celebrates its own dedication.[33]

TITLES AND TITULAR FEASTS

CAN. 1168

§ 1. Unaquaeque ecclesia consecrata vel benedicta suum habeat titulum; qui, peracta ecclesiae dedicatione, mutari nequit.

§ 2. Etiam festum tituli quotannis celebretur ad normas legum liturgicarum.

§ 3. Ecclesiae dedicari Beatis nequeunt sine Sedis Apostolicae indulto.

§ 1. Each consecrated or blessed church must have its own title, which cannot be changed after the dedication.

§ 2. The titular feast is to be celebrated annually according to the rubrical laws.

§ 3. Churches cannot be dedicated to a Beatus without an Apostolic indult.

Titulus[34] is the name by which a church is known and distinguished from other churches. It is not unlike the name given in Baptism. If the name is that of a person, 32 S. Rit. C., Oct. 28, 1913, I, 3, c. f. (A. Ap. S., V, 458).

33 S. Rit. C., Feb. 12, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 76).

34 Cfr. Gasparri, De SSma Euch., 1907, I, n. 137 ff.; Many, l. c., p. 52 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this person is called the patron of the church, provided he or she be a Saint (persona creata, non increata), for patron signifies advocate, which does not apply to a Divine Person.

Titles of churches may be: the Blessed Trinity or one of the three Divine Persons,[35] Jesus Christ or one of the biblical mysteries, the Blessed Virgin or any one of her special attributes, the angels and saints or some conspicuous events in their lives, as, for instance, the conversion of St. Paul.

When two saints are chosen as patrons for one church, they are generally taken per modum unius, e. g., SS. Philip and James. But if at the dedication two different saints are chosen divisim, they are celebrated on their respective days. Sometimes it happens that a secondary title or patron is added because it has been transferred from a church forsaken or destroyed.

The text says that the title cannot be changed. For the title being chosen at the laying of the corner-stone and made stable or perpetual at the dedication, is the distinctive and permanent attribute of a church. Hence it has been decided more than once that the bishop cannot of his own accord change the original title, but an Apostolic indult is required for the purpose.[36] If the Holy See adds the title of an abandoned church to another, the title thus added is a secondary one.[37]

§ 3 says that no church shall be dedicated to a Beatus, i. e., one who is beatified, but not yet canonized by a formal decree of the Holy See. In the case of such as have been venerated as saints by a constant tradition before the 35 God the Father is, as far as we know, not chosen, because of the fact that He is not represented as sent (defectu missionis divinae).

36 S. Rit. C., Sept. 6, 1834, ad 2; Sept. 12, 1857, ad 17 (l. c., nn. 2719, 3059).

37 S. Rit. C., April 20, 1822, n. 1 (ibid., n. 2619; t. IV, p. 221).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

time of Alexander III (1159–1181), the public veneration takes the place of the formal decree of the Apostolic See,[38] and they may therefore be chosen as patrons for churches.

§ 2 concerns the titular feast. The chief rules as to that are the following:

1. The titular feast of the cathedral church must be celebrated with octave by the whole clergy of the diocese, including those religious who follow the diocesan calendar. Regulars (not religious who have no calendar of their own) must observe the feast as one of the first class, but without octave, if they have their own calendar.[39] This celebration includes office and Mass.

2. The church whose clergy is obliged to observe the feast is any consecrated or blessed church. Oratories, either public or semi-public, are included, provided they are either consecrated or solemnly blessed; likewise episcopal chapels, oratories of seminaries, hospital chapels, chapels of religious houses, etc.[40]

3. The clergy obliged to say the office and Mass of the titular feast are: (a) the pastor and his assistants.[41] (b) Missionaries assigned to several missions, but residing at one, are bound only to the feast of the residential church.[42] (c) Rectors, seminary professors, and students who live in the seminary, must recite the office of the seminary church.[43]

4. Regulars must celebrate the feast of their own church;[44] but if they merely live in a house adjoining a 38 Many, l. c., p. 54 f.

39 S. Rit. C., Nov. 11, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 647 f.).

40 S. Rit. C., June 5, 1899 (n. 4025).

41 S. Rit. C., Sept. 2, 1871; Aug. 11, 1877 (ibid., nn. 3255, 3431).

42 S. Rit. C., Aug. 25, 1882; Feb. 27, 1883 (ibid., nn. 3554, 3571).

43 S. Rit. C., Feb. 27, 1847 (ibid., n. 2939).

44 S. Rit. C, Sept. 18, 1877, ad 1 (n. 3437).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

church which they do not own, they are not allowed to recite the office of that church.[45] A religious community in charge of a public church must recite the office of the titular feast of that church with octave.[46]

5. Chaplains of sisters are not bound to say the office of the titular feast of the chapel which they serve.

6. The bishop must recite the office of the titular feast of the cathedral church, and if he has two bishoprics aeque principaliter united, he has to recite the office of both cathedral churches, if they have different titles.

If a church is simply called "St. Mary's," the proper title is the Assumption; "Our Saviour's" is celebrated on the feast of the Transfiguration.[47]

CHURCH BELLS

CAN. 1169

§ 1. Cuilibet ecclesiae campanas esse convenit, quibus fideles ad divina officia aliosque religionis actus invitentur.

§ 2. Etiam ecclesiarum campanae debent consecrari vel benedici secundum ritus in probatis liturgicis libris traditos.

§ 3. Earum usus unice subest ecclesiasticae auctoritati.

§ 4. Salvis conditionibus, probante Ordinario, appositis ab illis qui campanam ecclesiae forte dederint, campana benedicta ad usus mere profanos adhiberi nequit, nisi ex causa necessitatis aut ex licentia Ordinarii aut denique ex legitima consuetudine.

§ 5. Quod ad campanarum consecrationem vel ben-

45 Gasparri, l. c., p. 96.
46 S. Rit. C., April 7, 1876, ad IV (n. 3397).
47 Gasparri, l. c., p. 95, 97.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

edictionem attinet, servetur praescriptum can. 1155, 1156.

§ 1. It is becoming that every church have bells, by which the faithful may be called to the divine service and other religious acts.

§ 2. Church bells must be either consecrated or blessed according to the rites prescribed in approved liturgical books.

§ 3. Their use is regulated exclusively by the church authorities.

§ 4. Aside from the stipulations made by the donor with the approval of the Ordinary, a blessed bell cannot be used for merely profane purposes, except in case of necessity, or by permission of the Ordinary, or by lawful custom.

§ 5. The consecration or blessing of bells is governed by can. 1155 and 1156.

We need not dwell on the origin of bells. Suffice it to say that from the word "signum," used in ancient monkish rules,[48] to campana, or bell proper, which appears in the Liber Pontificalis under Stephen II (752–757), there lie about 250 years.[49] The eighth century witnessed the development which gave rise to the use of bells for churches as we know it. Complaint was made by the regulars against prelates who forbade religious to have church bells, and Pope Gregory IX put an end to these molestations.[50]

§ 1 simply affirms the convenience and propriety of having bells in every church, whether in charge of secular or religious clergy. Nothing is said about their number or size.

48 Reg. S. Bened., c. 43.

49 Cfr. Cath. Encyc., II, 418 ff. Bells are often called nolae, which is a reminder of the legend that St. Paulinus of Nola invented them.

50 C. 16, x, V, 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 mentions the consecration and blessing of bells, which, as § 5 enacts, must be regulated according to can. 1155 and 1156.

The formula of consecration is found in the Pontificale Romanum. It should be used for the bells of consecrated churches.[51]

According to can. 1155, the consecration of bells is reserved to the local Ordinary, and delegation to a simple priest can only be given by the Holy See.[52]

There is also a formulary for blessing bells in the Roman Ritual.[53] It is intended for bells to be used for church or chapel purposes.[54] For this function the Ordinary or an exempt religious superior may delegate any priest without recourse to the Holy See.[55] If the consecration is performed on several bells, the washings and anointings are made per modum unius during the recitation of the Psalms. The water must be blessed for each function, but not for each bell, if several are consecrated at the same time.

If a delegate performs the consecration and has received delegation for one bell only, whilst there are several, delegation for the others may be presumed.

If, for some reason, there is no water blessed by the bishop available, the delegate may, in case of necessity, bless water himself.[56]

One delegated to consecrate bells must strictly follow the Pontificale; he must not omit the anointings or muti-

51 S. Rit. C., Jan. 22, 1908 (Dec. Auth., n. 4211).

52 S. Rit. C., April 19, 1687 (ibid., n. 1781). The anointing may not be omitted.

53 See ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 77* ff.

54 There is also a blessing of bells not intended for church uses; see ed. cit., p. 84.*

55 It is not becoming that the bishop in pontificalibus should climb a ladder to bless bells which cannot be taken down; S. Rit. C., July 16, 1594 (l. c., n. 52).

56 S. Rit. C., April 14, 1885 (n. 3630).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

late or change the formula, and he must employ a deacon.[57]

Nothing forbids the consecration of bells made of pure iron or steel.[58]

Bells consecrated or blessed for the service of churches or chapels, are strictly sacred things and, as such, subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Church. They must not be rung for merely secular purposes, worldly festivities, political meetings, executions, etc. Their guardian is the pastor or the sacristan canon of the cathedral chapter, who, in case of doubt, especially when serious consequences are to be apprehended, is bound to report to the Ordinary.

§ 4 leaves a wide margin in regard to the use of church bells. (a) The will of the founder must be respected, if any stipulations have been made with the approval of the bishop. (b) Necessity justifies the ringing of church bells in time of flood, fire, war, etc.[59] (c) The permission of the Ordinary may be given for any laudable purpose, e. g., to celebrate a victory or the restoration of peace, the return of soldiers, civic festivals, etc. (d) Lawful custom sanctions the use of church bells for any of the aforesaid or similar purposes.

But it must be emphasized that the ringing of bells consecrated or blessed for church purposes cannot lawfully be dictated by the civil authorities, since, as said above, by consecration or blessing these objects have a sacred character imprinted upon them.

The question whether bells used by a church are its property or belong to some one else can sometimes be

57 S. Rit. C., June 23, 1853 (n. 3015).

58 S. Rit. C., Feb. 6, 1858 (n. 3067).

59 In that case the sexton or any parishioner may ring the bell without asking the pastor or bishop, especially if there are no other means of communication.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

determined only by the intention of the founder, but unless the stipulated and proved intention of the founder [60] makes an exception, the control of church bells lies solely with the ecclesiastical authority, i. e., the Ordinary of the diocese.

LOSS OF CONSECRATION OR BLESSING

CAN. 1170

Consecrationem vel benedictionem ecclesia non amittit, nisi tota destructa fuerit, vel maior parietum pars corruerit, vel in usus profanos ab Ordinario loci redacta sit, ad norman can. 1187.

A church does not lose its consecration or blessing unless it is totally destroyed, or the larger part of the walls has collapsed, or the Ordinary has turned the building over to profane uses, according to can. 1187.

It would be equal to entire destruction if the whole wall, apse and roof had been removed.[61] But a partial repair of, say, two-fifths of the walls would not require re-consecration. Thus, e. g., if the framework or joists of a church were consumed by fire, or the framework of the tower had fallen upon the arch of the middle aisle and damaged the walls, no reconsecration would be required.[62] Even if the whole church is successively repaired, reconsecration is not required, provided each part repaired is smaller than the parts not repaired.[63] Furthermore, although the whole plastering (intonaco) were removed 60 Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 374 f. If the civil authorities should ask the church authorities to moderate the ringing of bells, no one would object to such a petition, provided it were reasonable.

61 S. Rit. C., Sept. 4, 1875 (n. 3372).

62 S. Rit. C., July 13, 1883 (n. 3504).

63 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1872 (n. 3269).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

together with the crosses, and new plastering, stucco, or marble substituted, no re-consecration or re-blessing would be necessary; but the crosses should be painted anew or replaced by new ones.[64] Even if the church is considerably enlarged and interiorly embellished with marble or stucco, as long as the old walls remain in the proportion of 3 to 2 or 5 to 3, no re-consecration or re-blessing is required, though the crosses, as stated above, must be renewed.[65]

As to the reduction of a consecrated or blessed church to profane uses we refer to can. 1187. The Ordinary alone can do this, and hence, if a church was turned over to profane uses by human malice or violence, it may be called defiled, provided Can. 1172 is verified, but it is not execrated, and execration is here to be understood.[66]

EFFECT OF CONSECRATION OR BLESSING

CAN. 1171

In sacra aede legitime dedicata omnes ecclesiastici ritus perfici possunt, salvis iuribus paroecialibus, privilegiis et legitimis consuetudinibus; Ordinarius autem, praesertim horas sacrorum rituum, potest, iusta de causa, praefinire, dummodo ne agatur de ecclesia quae ad religionem exemptam pertineat, firmo praescripto can. 609, § 3.

One of the effects of consecration or blessing is that, in every sacred edifice properly dedicated, all ecclesiastical rites may be performed, with due regard to parochial 64 S. Rit. C., May 4, 1882; June 8, 1896, ad II; Aug. 9, 1897 (l. c., nn. 3345, 3907, 3962).

65 S. Rit. C., Jan. 16, 1886 (n. 3651); this holds good even if the primary intention was to repair or enlarge the whole church.

66 Many, l. c., p. 66.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rights, privileges, and lawful customs. But the Ordinary may, for a just cause, determine the hours of service, provided the church does not belong to exempt religious.

This law comprises every church or public oratory duly consecrated or blessed. The ecclesiastical rites which may be performed in such sacred edifices are the divine offices mentioned in can. 1165, § 1.

The Code adds: salvis iuribus paroecialibus, privilegiis et legitimis consuetudinibus. This means that a church or public oratory may be solemnly consecrated or blessed, yet, as long as it is no parish church, no parochial rights can be exercised therein, unless the parish priest should choose it for parochial functions. Besides it may happen that, for instance, a confraternity enjoys certain privileges for its members, e. g., the burial right may be attached to a church, even though it is not a parish church.

Lawful custom may introduce rights which might otherwise be claimed by the parish church, for instance, that of having a baptismal font.[67]

As to the hours of service, it has been more than once decided that the bishop may, either at a synod or outside, determine the hour of the parochial Mass, as well as forbid that Mass be said in secular chapels before the parochial Mass. However, the S. Congregation has repeatedly urged pastors to say Mass at hours convenient for the faithful. The pastor is not entitled to forbid that Mass be said before the parochial Mass.[68] It was declared that an archpriest has no right to forbid chaplains of a public oratory to say Mass before the parochial Mass, unless this oratory was subject to the parish church, whose archpriest attempted to enforce the prohibition in question.[69]

67 Cfr. S. C. C., May 17, 1749 (Richter, Trid., p. 131, n. 8); can. 775.

68 Bened. XIV, Inst., 44, nn. 9 ff.

69 S. Rit. C., July 11, 1643 (n. 842).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Exempt religious, even though warned by the bishop, are not obliged to abstain from celebrating Mass or performing other functions even while the bells are ringing for the parochial Mass. Thus the S. C. Concilii has decided several times.[70]

Our canon refers to can. 609, § 3, which has been sufficiently explained in Vol. III of this Commentary.

DESECRATION OF A CHURCH

CAN. 1172

§ 1. Ecclesia violatur infra recensitis tantum actibus, dummodo certi sint, notorii, et in ipsa ecclesia positi:

1°. Delicto homicidii;

2°. Iniuriosa et gravi sanguinis effusione;

3°. Impiis vel sordidis usibus, quibus ecclesia addicta fuerit;

4°. Sepultura infidelis vel excommunicati post sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam.

§ 2. Violata ecclesia, non ideo coemeterium, etsi contiguum, violatum censetur, et viceversa.

By desecration (pollutio ecclesiae, as it was formerly called) is here understood a moral violation of a church by diverting it from a sacred to a profane use. It is induced only by acts described in the law and differs from execration in as much as the latter entails the loss of consecration or blessing, whilst desecration only requires reconciliation or rehabilitation.

Up to the time of the Decree of Gratian no clear distinction can be established between desecration and execration, as may be seen from the canons the Master 70 Cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 136, n. 45.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

alleges.[71] The term "pollutio" does not occur in the classical texts of Gratian, but was probably brought in by the glossators. Violatio is used by Pseudo-Hyginus.[72] Pollutio and reconciliatio are the terms employed in the Decretals.[73]

The Code has apparently omitted from the list of acts which induce violation the seminis effusio,[74] but instead of it has inserted a new mode of desecration, which can only be determined by subsequent practical legislation.[75]

§ 1. A church is violated (or desecrated) by the following acts, provided they are certain, notorious, and committed in the church itself, to wit:

1. The crime of homicide;
2. Injurious and serious shedding of blood;
3. Impious or sordid use to which the church was diverted;
4. The burial of an infidel or one excommunicated by a declaratory or condemnatory sentence.

§ 2. The desecration of a church does not entail the desecration of the cemetery, even though the latter adjoins the church, and vice versa, desecration of the cemetery does not involve desecration of the church.

Homicide must here be strictly understood, as the killing of any human being, whether young or old; hence it also covers abortion and suicide. It does not matter whether the crime is committed by poison, or hanging, or the use of a weapon.

The text further says delicto. A crime supposes a 71 C. 3, Dist. 68; cc. 19, 20, 27, 28, Dist. 1, de cons.

72 C. 19, Dist. 1, de cons.

73 Cc. 7, 10, x, III, 40.

74 C. 10, x, III, 40.

75 Whether the effusio seminis humani is included in § 1, n. 3° (as the Irish Eccl. Record, 1919, 460, maintains) seems doubtful, because usus is hardly ever employed in such connection, unless a church were used for a brothel, which is a repulsive thought.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

grievous fault, and therefore homicide committed by a child, or by an insane or frenzied person, would not desecrate a church. If a drunkard perpetrates such an act, it depends on whether the action was in any way foreseen or not. If it was not foreseen, it does not desecrate the church.[76] Lynching, however, and even the judiciary execution of a sentence of capital punishment would induce desecration. No crime is involved if one kills an aggressor in self-defence.

Iniuriosa et gravis sanguinis effusio means the shedding of human blood in such quantity that it may be called a pouring out. Hence a few drops, or the oozing from a light wound would not desecrate a church, and the authors[77] speak of a copious shedding of blood. The word gravis may have another meaning, viz. graviter culpabilis, grievously sinful. Hence if boys would beat one another, or if a teacher would punish boys in church, it would scarcely amount to a grievous fault.[78] If by a serious blow from another the nose would bleed copiously, some assert desecration, while others deny it.[79] The correct answer depends partly on the interpretation of iniuriosa, because the injury may be referred either to the sacred edifice[80] or to the person[81] injured. The text does not decide which is meant. But most probably the act must be injurious to both edifice and person, so that the person injured is really damaged, and the people who witnessed the act look upon it as a serious irreverence done to the church.

The third act which induces desecration is giving the church over to impious or sordid uses. Here the terms

76 Cfr. Gasparri, De SSma Eucharistia, n. 250, Vol. I, p. 177.
77 Gasparri, l. c., n. 251; Many, De Locis Sacris, p. 72.
78 Reiffenstuel, III, 40, n. 16.
79 Gasparri, l. c.
80 Idem, l. c.
81 Many, l. c., p. 71.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google require attention, because, as stated, this cause is new.

Impious has many meanings: ungodly, irreligious, irreverent, unnatural, detestable, etc. Hence using a church for orgies, as happened in the French Revolution, or for Masonic rites, would, in our opinion, desecrate it. Sacrilegious robbery would also have this effect.

Sordidus may be compared with the sordid or mean offices forbidden to the clergy. Thus a church may be called desecrated if it was used for a barracks, especially if it has also served to quarter horses or mules;[82] although the S. Congregation[83] in one instance of a two days' occupation by soldiers decided only for provisional reconciliation. Sordid would also be the use of a church for merely political meetings, if this should happen frequently and under great agitation.

Lastly, the burial of an infidel or an excommunicated person also desecrates a church. By infidels are here understood persons who have never been baptized. Catechumens must not be classed with infidels.[84] Besides, a more benign interpretation would, in our case, exclude from the class of infidels all children of Catholic parents, whether buried with the mother or not.[85] But if this be admitted, why not extend it to the husband or wife of a Catholic partner, since the unbelieving party, according to 1 Cor. VII, 14, is sanctified by the believing party? We make this suggestion with due reserve and because some canonists[86] interpret the term pagans and infidels as including grown persons only, or such as are wilful infidels. Our Code, which does not receive its juridical value from the spurious texts of Gratian's Decree, simply mentions

82 S. Rit. C., March 3, 1821 (Dec. Auth., n. 2612).

83 S. Rit. C., Feb. 27, 1847 (ibid., n. 2938).

84 Cfr. can. 1239, § 2.

85 Gasparri, l. c., n. 253; Many, l. c., p. 75 f.

86 Gasparri, l. c.; see, however, can. 1239.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

infidels, without distinction, thereby including all who are destitute of baptismal grace through their own fault.

Excommunicati must also be interpreted strictly. It includes only those who have been declared excommunicated or condemned to the penalty. It does not include those under suspension or interdict, and therefore the burial of a suspended or interdicted person would not desecrate a church.

Excommunicati are either vitandi or tolerati. Both kinds are here included, provided a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been given.[87]

Concerning heretics or schismatics it may be asked whether their burial in a church would defile it. A decision of the S. Congregation [88] would seem to include all non-Catholics. However, since the Code [89] requires a declaratory sentence even for a poenae latae sententiae, it appears more probable, and more in keeping with the spirit of the law, that a heretic or schismatic against whom no such sentence has been passed, is not included in the category of excommunicated persons whose burial would desecrate a church.[90] The consequence is that most of our present-day heretics, so called, are not touched by this canon.

As four kinds of acts only are specified, no analogy or extension may be admitted.

Furthermore, these acts must be certain, de iure or de facto. De iure certain is desecration if homicide was committed; uncertain de iure would be the amount of blood shed. De facto certain is desecration if the burial of an infidel took place; de facto uncertain is when the 87 Cfr. can. 2259, § 2.

88 S. Rit. C., April 23, 1875 (Dec. Auth., n. 3344); Gasparri, l. c., n. 254.

89 Can. 2223, § 4.

90 This was, as Gasparri owns, the sententia communis before the promulgation of the Code.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fact of infidelity is doubtful, because he may have secretly been baptized. The general rule is that in doubtful circumstances the minimum is taken.[91] However, provisional reconciliation would not be out of place.[92]

The acts inducing desecration must be notorious, i. e. known and committed under circumstances that make it impossible to hide them for any length of time.[93]

Lastly, these acts must be commited in the church itself. If a man would shoot through a window of the church and kill a person outside, the church would not be defiled. But if the person were killed in the church by a shot fired from outside, desecration would take place. The martyrdom of St. Thomas à Becket implied desecration.[94]

Is any church liable to desecration, or only a consecrated or blessed church? It seems the more probable and, we may say, the more common opinion, that only a consecrated or blessed church is to be understood.[95] This would seem to be the more natural interpretation if we compare can. 1165, § 1, and the following one. A building is dedicated to divine worship by consecration or blessing, and no divine services can be held in it before this ceremony has taken place. Now the effect of desecration, as stated in can. 1173, consists precisely in the prohibition of divine services. What then would be the effect of desecration with regard to churches that are neither consecrated nor blessed?

Finally, by church is to be understood the body of the internal church, exclusive of the roof, tower, sacristy, vestibule and adjoining rooms. The crypt or basement is included if it is internally connected with the upper part of the church building.[96]

91 Reg. Iuris 30 in 6°.
92 S. Rit. C., Feb. 27, 1847 (Dec. Auth., n. 2938).
93 Can. 2197.
94 Gasparri, l. c., n. 250.
95 Thus Gasparri, l. c., n. 247.
96 Gasparri, l. c., n. 250; Many, l. c., p. 80 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 corrects the old law[97] and admits no connection between the desecration of a church and that of a cemetery, even though the latter adjoins the former, and vice versa.

CONSEQUENCES OF DESECRATION

CAN. 1173

§ 1. In violata ecclesia, antequam reconcilietur, nefas est divina celebrare officia, Sacramenta ministrare, mortuos sepelire.

§ 2. Si violatio accidat tempore divinorum officiorum, haec statim cessent; si ante Missae canonem vel post communionem, Missa dimittatur; secus sacerdos Missam prosequatur usque ad communionem.

The consequences of desecration are twofold: cessation of divine services and obligation of reconciliation. Until reconciliation is effected, it would be unlawful to hold divine services in a desecrated church or to administer the sacraments or bury the dead there.[98] Hence all liturgical services which have been instituted by divine or ecclesiastical law and are performed exclusively by the clergy,[99] are strictly forbidden in a desecrated church. However, though the injunction is grievous, yet no penalty, either of censure or irregularity, is attached to the transgression.[1]

If the desecration happens during the divine offices, these must cease immediately. Thus the canonical hours, or preaching, or any function should be immediately stopped. Yet we believe that Baptism might be finished if the ceremony had progressed nearly to the act of pour-

97 C. un. 6°, III, 21.

98 Cfr. cc. 27, 28, Dist. 1, de cons.; c. 10, x, III, 40.

99 Can. 2256, n. 1.

1 Neither was a penalty contained in the Constit. "Apostolicae Sedis."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing the water. If the desecration happens before the Canon of the Mass, or after Communion, the Mass must be discontinued. If it happens between the beginning of the Canon and Communion, Mass must be continued until Communion, viz., until the Corpus tuum. This is the rule of the Missal.[2]

Canonists generally hold that if there is no church in a place besides the one desecrated, and reconciliation cannot be promptly effected, the Ordinary may permit the celebration of Mass therein for the people. In case of necessity, for instance, for administering the Viaticum, if no other church is available, Mass may be said in a desecrated church without consulting the bishop, if he cannot be approached.[3] Can. 1176 provides for emergencies.

THE RECONCILIATION OF CHURCHES

CAN. 1174

§ 1. Ecclesia violata reconcilietur, quam citissime poterit, secundum ritus in probatis liturgicis libris descriptos.

§ 2. Si dubitetur num ecclesia sit violata, reconciliari potest ad cautelam.

CAN. 1175

Ecclesia violata ob sepulturam excommunicati vel infidelis ne reconcilietur, antequam cadaver exinde removeatur, si remotio sine gravi incommodo fieri possit.

2 Missale Romanum, tit. De Defectibus, c. X, n. 2.

3 Gasparri, l. c., 243; Many, l. c., p. 83.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1176

§ 1. Ecclesiam benedictam reconciliare potest rector eiusdem vel quilibet sacerdos de consensu saltem praesumpto rectoris.

§ 2. Ecclesiae consecratae valida reconciliatio ad eos spectat de quibus in can. 1156.

§ 3. In casu tamen gravis et urgentis necessitatis, si Ordinarius adiri nequeat, rectori ecclesiae consecratae eandem reconciliare fas est, certiore facto postea Ordinario.

CAN. 1177

Reconciliatio ecclesiae benedictae fieri potest aqua lustrali communi; reconciliatio vero ecclesiae consecratae fiat aqua ad hoc benedicta secundum leges liturgicas; quam tamen non solum Episcopi, sed etiam presbyteri qui ecclesiam reconciliant, benedicere possunt.

The first of these four canons, all of which refer to the matter of reconciling a desecrated church, demands, like the old law,[4] that reconciliation be performed as soon as possible, according to the rites described in the approved liturgical books. If the fact of the desecration is doubtful, a provisional (ad cautelam) reconciliation may take place. The books referred to are the Roman Pontifical and Ritual (tit. viii, c. 28). Priests and bishops should beware of the assumption that a church is reconciled if Mass was said therein after desecration. Hence, even in case Mass has been said in a desecrated church reconciliation is required as a matter of necessity.[5]

Can. 1175 takes up the fourth case of can. 1172, viz.,

4 C. 10, X, III, 10.
5 S. Rit. C., Aug. 19, 1634, ad II (Dec. Auth., n. 611).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

when a church has been desecrated by the burial of an infidel or excommunicated person. Before reconciliation the body must be removed if it can be done without great inconvenience. It may be difficult to recognize the remains, especially if many were buried in the church. Prudence is required under such circumstances.[6] But if the expense caused by the calling of experts and witnesses would be too great, removal would not be required.

Can. 1176 determines the ministers of reconciliation. A church which was only blessed may be reconciled by its rector or by any other priest with the (at least) presumed consent of the rector. Former decisions required that a dignitary,[7] or at least one especially appointed by the Ordinary,[8] should perform the ceremony of reconciliation. Our text requires neither dignity nor faculty. Any priest may lawfully presume the consent of the rector, unless positively forbidden by the latter, or convinced of the intention of the rector to perform the rite himself.

A consecrated church can be validly reconciled only by those mentioned in can. 1156. Hence the Ordinary of the diocese is entitled to reconcile consecrated churches of his own territory, which belong to the secular clergy or non-exempt religious or laymen; and the higher superior of exempt religious can reconcile churches belonging to his order.

However, says § 3 of can. 1176, in cases of serious and urgent necessity, if the Ordinary cannot be reached, the rector of a consecrated church may reconcile it and inform the Ordinary afterwards. This is a liberal extension unknown before. A grave and urgent case would be the celebration of a festival which could not be post-

6 S. Rit. C., April 23, 1875 (n. 3344).
7 S. Rit. C., Feb. 9, 1608 (n. 246).
8 S. Rit. C., March 3, 1821 (n. 2612).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

poned, for instance, first Holy Communion, or a wedding, or a funeral. In that case the Ordinary should be called either by telephone or telegraph; but if it is foreseen that he could not reach the place in time, it would be useless to send a message. Hence the bishop or major exempt religious superior, respectively, must simply be notified of the fact of reconciliation. It goes without saying that this information is not required for the validity of the reconciliation.

The rite to be followed by the rector of the desecrated church is that of the Roman Pontifical.

Can. 1177 says that reconciliation of a blessed church may be effected with ordinary holy water, whereas for a consecrated church water blessed according to the liturgical laws should be used. However, not only bishops, but also priests who perform the act of reconciliation, may bless this water. The Roman Ritual [9] states that a priest endowed with the faculty of reconciling a consecrated church, hence also the rector of the church in case of necessity, must wear amice, alb, cincture, stole and cope of white color. He must follow the rite prescribed in the Pontifical, and consequently use the water blessed by the bishop. If he blesses the water himself, he must follow the Roman Pontifical, at the beginning of Pars II: De Benedictione et Impositione Primarii Lapidis. After the water has been blessed he is to proceed according to the formulary of the Pontifical De Ecclesiae et Coemeterii Reconciliatione, and follow the rubrics there given. If the desecrated church was only blessed, the priest dresses as above, uses ordinary holy water (blessed, for instance, on Sunday before Mass), and proceeds according to the 9 Tit. III, c. 28 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 247 ff.). But the faculty mentioned there is no longer needed in case of necessity; nor is any faculty required for reconciling a church only blessed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ritual, title viii, c. 28: Ritus Reconciliandi Ecclesiam Violatam.

DECORUM OF THE HOUSE OF GOD

CAN. 1178

Curent omnes ad quos pertinet, ut in ecclesiis illa munditia servetur, quae domum Dei decet; ab iisdem arceantur negotiationes et nundinae, quanquam ad finem pium habitae; et generatim quidquid a sanctitate loci absonum sit.

All to whom it pertains shall take care that the churches are kept neat, as becomes the house of God; business and fairs, even though for a pious purpose, must not be held in them, and in general everything that is incompatible with the holiness of the place.

It is unnecessary to recall all the Decretals [10] and papal constitutions which refer to this matter. The very fact that a church is a sacred place, in which tremendous mysteries are celebrated, ought to suffice to keep it neat. Luxury or magnificence, says Benedict XIV, are not required, but neatness and cleanliness are possible everywhere, even in the poorest church.[11] The Pontiff adds: You will find well-furnished and neatly adorned residences, but squalid and barren churches lacking the most necessary furniture. Lack of neatness betrays a lack of interest and perhaps of faith on the part of the priest.

Those immediately concerned are the congregation, especially the trustees and altar society, the clergy and the Ordinary. The latter should make the condition of the church a subject of examination at the time of his canonical visit and issue regulations from which no

10 C. 2, X, I, 27; c. 12, X, III, 1; cc. 1, 5, X, III, 49.

11 Const. "Annus qui," Feb. 19, 1749, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

appeal is admissible. He may inflict penalties against incorrigible pastors.[12] Fairs and markets are not usually held in the churches of our country; but even the vestibule and other places connected with the church should be kept free of them.

IUS ASYLI

CAN. 1179

Ecclesia iure asyli gaudet ita ut rei, qui ad illam confugerint, inde non sint extrahendi, nisi necessitas urgeat, sine assensu Ordinarii, vel saltem rectoris ecclesiae.

Churches enjoy the right of asylum, which implies that criminals seeking refuge therein may, except in case of urgent necessity, not be taken out without the consent of the Ordinary or at least of the rector of the church.

As the Greek term asylos indicates, an asylum was understood to be an inviolable place. Such in the old law was the altar of holocausts, the horns of which were held by the one who fled to the tabernacle or temple to seek safety from revenge or escape being killed without due trial.[13] The Greeks, too, had their statues, temples, and marked off districts which offered safety to criminals.[14] Roman temples, if consecrated, were endowed with the same privilege.[15] Christian churches claimed the ius asyli before the Christian emperors enacted the same into law.[16] The Codex Iustinianus (lib. I, tit. 12) contains a 12 Bened. XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 6; cfr. can. 2182–2184.

13 Ex. 21, 28; III Ki. 1, 50; 2, 28 ff. Besides, there were cities of refuge; Jos. 20, 4; 21, 3.

14 The space of asylum in the temple of Artemis at Ephesus extended to one stadion or 600 feet; cfr. Stengel, Die Griech. Kultusaltertümer, 1898, p. 29 f.

15 Wissova, Religion u. Kultur der Römer, 1902, p. 405.

16 S. Ambrose, Ep. 20, ad Marcell., n. 20 (Migne, 16, 997); Cod. Theod., IX, 45.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

title: "De his qui ad ecclesias confugiunt vel ibi exclamant," forbidding extradition or violent seizure of criminals and reserving the judgment to the bishop. The Decree and the Decretals[17] largely follow the Roman law. Later enactments, especially in papal constitutions, either modified or determined the extent of the right of refuge. According to a Constitution of Gregory XIV ("Cum alias," May 24, 1591) highway robbers and thieves who plundered the fields, those who committed cold-blooded murder or wantonly shed blood, those guilty of lèse majesté in the person of the ruler, and those who prevented the application of the ius asyli were excluded from the benefit of the privilege.[18]

Our text excludes no one, but limits the right of refuge somewhat, as not only the Ordinary (i. e., the bishop) can give permission to extradite, but the rector of the church also. In cases of urgent necessity no permission is required. Such a case would be that of threatening mob violence, from which the officials might save the criminal by quick action.

The churches which enjoy this privilege are those consecrated or blessed, as all authors teach and the text plainly intimates. Common jurisprudence[19] would extend it to churches and public oratories not yet blessed, but dedicated to divine worship. This view may be accepted, as the ius asyli is a favor and consequently liable to a broad interpretation.

No penalties against violators of this right are stated in the Code.

17 Cc. 8–10, 19, 35, C. 17, q. 4; X, III, 49.

18 Benedict XIV., "Officii Nostri," March 15, 1750, § 12, reserved the grant strictly to bishops, excluding even the prelates nullius.

19 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 101.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE TITLE OF BASILICA

CAN. 1180

Nulla ecclesia potest basilicae titulo decorari, nisi ex apostolica concessione aut inmemorabili consuetudine; cuiusque vero privilegia ex alterutro capite colligantur.

No church enjoys the title of basilica, except it has been given to it by the Apostolic See or by immemorable custom. The privileges of each church are to be determined either from the concessions of the Apostolic See or from immemorable custom.

Originally the term basilica indicated the architectural style of the structure. However, the name also implied a royal or stately building characterized by great splendor or prominence. Hence the more illustrious churches, especially those dedicated to renowned martyrs or saints, became known as basilicas. Later a distinction was introduced between basilicae majores and minores. The four major basilicas are: St. John Lateran, in which the Roman Pontiff used to be enthroned and which is the proper See of Rome; St. Peter's on the Vatican, which represents Constantinople; St. Paul's on the Via Ostiense, which designates the See of Alexandria, and S. Maria Maggiore, as representative of the See of Antioch. These four are also called patriarchal basilicas. Besides these there are many minor basilicas, for instance, S. Maria in Trastevere, Monte Cassino, St. Francis of Assisi, Lourdes, etc. These minor basilicas came to be called thus either by the renown of their clergy or because of important events or mere antiquity or splendor.[20] But unless an immemorable custom has borne constant witness to the existence of the title, it now requires a papal grant. The privileges, or rather decorative insignia, are the use of the canopaeum, the tintinnabulum, the palmatoria or bugia, and some vestments for the clergy.

20 S. Rit. C., Aug. 26, 1836 (Dec. Auth., n. 2744, and Vol. IV, p. 357 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ENTRANCE FEES NOT ALLOWED

CAN. 1181

Ingressus in ecclesiam ad sacros ritus sit omnino gratuitus, reprobata qualibet contraria consuetudine.

Admission to divine service must be entirely free, and every contrary custom is hereby reprobated.

Rome, and especially the S. C. Propaganda, was inexorable in rejecting the custom of demanding admission fees of any kind at the doors of churches. The Provincial Council of Cincinnati, held in 1861, thought it could permit the custom in three cities of the then Cleveland diocese. But the Prefect of the Propaganda demanded that the custom be abolished within two years. A similar amendment was prescribed for the acts of the II Plenary Council of Baltimore, in 1866, and finally for the acts of the Provincial Council of Australia, in 1869. From the last-named letter of the Propaganda our text has passed into the Code,[21] which has made the law even more emphatic by adding the reprobation clause. This renders the custom existing in many parts of our country juridically impossible, but it will take some time to eliminate it and to find other sources of revenue. The decree above mentioned forbids the placing of ushers (collectores) at the gate for collecting money from the faithful coming to 21 Coll. Lac., t. III, coll. 220, 230, 506, 1085, 1086; S. C. P. F., Aug. 15 1869 (Coll. n. 1345).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

attend divine service and to hear the word of God. But the S. Congregation does not intend to forbid spontaneous oblations at the Offertory, nor to abolish seat or pew rent.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF CHURCHES

CAN 1182

§ 1. Firmo praescripto can. 1519–1528, administratio bonorum quae destinata sunt reparandae decorandaeque ecclesiae divinoque in eadem cultui exercendo, pertinet, nisi aliud ex speciali titulo vel legitima consuetudine constet, ad Episcopum cum Capitulo, si de ecclesia cathedrali agatur; ad Capitulum ecclesiae collegiatae, si de collegiata; ad rectorem, si de alia ecclesia.

§ 2. Etiam oblationes factas in commodum paroeciae aut missionis, aut ecclesiae sitae intra paroeciae vel missionis fines, administrat parochus vel missionarius, nisi agatur de ecclesia propriam administrationem habente, distinctam ab administratione paroeciae vel missionis, aut nisi aliud ferat ius peculiare aut legitima consuetudo.

§ 3. Parochus, missionarius, rector saecularis ecclesiae, sive saecularis is sit sive religiosus, debet huiusmodi oblationes administrare ad normam sacrorum canonum, deque eis rationem loci Ordinario reddere ad normam can. 1525.

§ 1. This canon first safeguards the administration of church property in general, as governed by can. 1519–1528, and then states to whom pertains the administration of the goods destined for the repair and embellishment of churches and of divine service in cathedral, collegiate, and other churches. In cathedral churches it belongs to the bishop and the chapter conjointly; in collegiate churches, to the chapter; in all other churches, to the rector.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Wherever there is a diocesan chapter, in the canonical and full sense of the term, the administration of the funds destined for the repair and adornment of the cathedral church lies with the bishop and the chapter conjointly. Hence neither the bishop nor the chapter may proceed alone in matters pertaining to the cathedral church.[22] But what if there are no cathedral chapters, as in most of our dioceses,[23] or if they are not established along the lines of the law, as in England? After having perused the Acta et Decreta of our plenary councils we could perceive nothing that would be strictly to the point in our case. The third Council mentions (n. 266) a so-called Apostolic canon, which in substance commits the whole temporal affair to the bishop and then describes the mode in which church property may be held: — by fee simple, in trust, as corporation sole, or as personal property. In treating of diocesan consultors (n. 20) the Council demands the consilium (sic!) of the consultors for any alienation of church property the value of which exceeds $5000. However, this applies to ecclesiastical or diocesan property in general, and does not per se touch cathedral funds. Who, then, is responsible for the repair and decoration of the cathedrals in our country? Since there are no chapters, properly so-called, and the diocesan consultors certainly cannot claim any title to the administration of cathedral funds, it follows that the bishop himself is responsible. He may entrust the cathedral pastor with this important matter, but the ultimate responsibility

22 S. C. EE. et RR., May 23, 1662 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 258).

23 There are honorary canons in the archdiocese of New Orleans, but their rights are unknown to the author.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is the bishop's. This is more clearly enunciated in the ruling of the first Westminster Provincial Council, 1852, n. 24: "The right to the temporal and spiritual administration of the cathedral church remains with the bishop, unless the Holy See shall have provided otherwise."[24] We could not find a contrary proviso. Neither is the Code opposed to our view, for the present canon is plainly intended for chapters which measure up to all requirements of the law. However, we hardly believe this holds of English chapters.

The care for collegiate churches, our text says, belongs to the chapter, not to the provost or pastor. The same may justly be said concerning abbey churches, whilst churches in care of exempt religious must be taken care of by the respective rector, as is the case with all other churches not in possession of a chapter or corporation. For if a corporation (a confraternity, for instance) is in possession of a church, the oblations of which it receives and administers, the right and duty of taking care of that church belongs to the confraternity, under the supervision of the Ordinary of the diocese.[25]

§ 2. Offerings made in favor of a parish church or mission, or of a church located within the boundaries of a parish or mission, are administered by the respective pastor or missionary, unless the church in question has its own separate administration, distinct from the administration of the parish church or mission, or unless a particular law or lawful custom rules differently.

There is no difficulty to be apprehended from this regulation in our country. The only trouble that might arise would be from a sodality or confraternity. How-

24 Coll. Lac., III, col. 948. The cathedral of Newport is an exception, for it has a monastic cathedral chapter (Coll. Lac., III, 957 f.).

25 S. C. EE. et RR., Feb. 11, 1842 (Bizz, l. c., p. 478).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ever, these are generally ruled by the pastor or missionary. Besides, if they form a corporation acknowledged by the civil law, they have a solid basis, provided they give an account to the Ordinary. For an independent confraternity can hardly be imagined.[26] Churches or chapels governed by religious have their own administration and are dependent on the bishop only as far as the law states.

§ 3. The pastor, the missionary, the rector of a secular church, be he a secular priest or a religious, must administer these offerings according to church law and render an account to the Ordinary, as provided in can. 1525.

Those who are obliged to render an account are: (a) pastors, no matter whether they belong to the secular or religious clergy; (b) missionaries, whether secular or religious; (c) rectors of churches which by right belong to the secular clergy, although they are subject to religious.

A reasonable doubt might arise from can. 630, § 4, where the religious superior is said to administer the offerings of a church that belongs pleno iure to a religious community. We stated what we think of that enactment under the respective canon, viz.: It is impracticable for a community which has many expositi. But our canon speaks of all pastors alike and draws no distinction. All, it says, must administer the offerings made to their churches, all must render an account to the Ordinary. In order not to go out of the way we assume it as the logical consequence that the pastor, and not the religious superior, should administer these offerings, for which he is responsible to the Ordinary. Otherwise, if we follow can. 630, § 4, the religious superior would have to administer these offerings and render the account. There seems to be a contradiction here. The natural explanation would seem to be that the pastor actually administers those funds, and the religious superior has the supervision, if he cares to exercise it.

[26] S. C. C., July 7, 1736; July 27, 1737 (Richter, Trid., p. 170, nn. 8 f. and pluries).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Which are the offerings spoken of in our canon? The description of these may safely be taken from the IInd Provincial Council of Westminster, and the IIIrd Plenary Council of Baltimore.[27] They are: pew-rent, collections at the Offertory, seat-money, and funds raised by lectures and house collections. Of all these, therefore, the administrators, as far as repair and embellishment of the church and divine service are concerned, must give an account to the Ordinary every year.[28]

TRUSTEES

CAN. 1183

§ 1. Si alii quoque, sive clerici sive laici, in administrationem bonorum alicuius ecclesiae cooptentur, iidem omnes una cum administratore ecclesiastico, de quo in can. 1182, aut eius vicem gerente, eoque praeside, constituunt Consilium fabricae ecclesiae.

§ 2. Huius Consilii sodales, nisi aliter legitime constitutum fuerit, nominantur ab Ordinario eiusve delegato et ab eodem possunt ob gravem causam removeri.

CAN. 1184

Consilium fabricae curare debet rectam bonorum ecclesiae administrationem, servato praescripto can.

27 Tit. VIII, n. X (Coll., Lac. III, col. 982); Acta et Decreta Com. Baltim. III, n. 90 (ed. 1886, p. 48 f; p. 231 f).

28 See can. 1525, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1522, 1523; sed nullatenus sese ingerat in ea omnia quae ad spirituale munus pertinent, praesertim:

1°. In exercitium cultus in ecclesia;

2°. In modum et tempus pulsandi campanas et in curam tuendi ordinis in ecclesia atque in coemeterio;

3°. In definiendam rationem qua collectae, denuntiationes aliique actus ad divinum cultum ornatumque ecclesiae quoquo modo spectantes in ecclesia fieri possint;

4°. In dispositionem materialem altarium, mensae pro distributione sanctissimae Eucharistiae, cathedrae sive suggestus e quo ad populum verba fiunt, organorum, loci cantoribus assignati, sedilium, scamnorum, capsularum oblationibus recipiendis, aliarumque quae ad exercitium religiosi cultus spectent;

5°. In admissionem vel reiectionem sacrorum utensilium aliarumque rerum quae sive ad usum, sive ad cultum, sive ad ornatum in ecclesia vel sacrario destinentur;

6°. In scriptionem, dispositionem, custodiam librorum paroecialium aliorumque documentorum quae ad archivum paroeciale pertineant.

Can. 1185

Sacrista, cantores, organorum moderator, pueri chorales, campanae pulsator, sepulcrorum fossores, ceterique inservientes a solo ecclesiae rectore, salvis legitimis consuetudinibus et conventionibus et Ordinarii auctoritate, nominantur, pendent, dimittuntur.

Canon 1183 says that if other administrators, either clerical or lay, are chosen, these together with, and under the presidency of, the ecclesiastical administrator, constitute the board of trustees or council of the church fabric.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The members of this committee, unless otherwise legally provided, are appointed by the Ordinary or his delegate and may be removed by him for weighty reasons.

The law does not command the appointment of trustees, but only says, if. Hence though prudence may dictate the measure, as the IIIrd Baltimore Council states,[29] a bishop or pastor would by no means act contrary to the law by not choosing any trustees. It cannot be denied that trustees have at various times in the past acted despotically and with little deference to the spirit and laws of the Church.[30] Hence the Code desires that they be appointed and removed by the Ordinary or his delegate, who in this case may properly be the pastor. But the text admits another lawful way of choosing trustees, and hence the enactments of the IIIrd Council of Baltimore [32] are in perfect keeping with the present law and may be followed as a safe guide.

Can. 1184 commands the trustees to take due care of the church funds, according to can. 1522 and 1523, and not to interfere with the spiritual administration. They are especially forbidden to meddle:

1. With the functions of divine worship in church;

2. With the manner and time of ringing the bells or the order of services in the church and cemetery;

3. With determining the manner of taking up collections, making announcements, and other acts which refer to divine worship or the adornment of the church, and are performed in church.

4. With the arrangement of the altars, communion rails, pulpit, organ and organ loft, seats and benches, col-

29 Acta et Decreta, n. 284 (ed. cit., p. 163).

30 Conc. Prov. Balt. I (Coll. Lac., III, 20); Farley, Life of Card. McCloskey, 1917.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lection boxes and other things belonging to divine service.

5. With the admission or rejection (because of unfitness according to traditional usage or the laws of the Church) of sacred utensils and other things which are destined either for divine worship or the embellishment of church or sacristy.

6. With the manner of writing, arranging or keeping the parochial books and other documents which belong to the archives of the parish.

It may be added, from the Instruction of the S. C. Propaganda [31] from which our text is substantially taken, that in these matters the pastor is to follow the laws of the Church, the diocesan statutes, and episcopal rulings. If the church funds must be used for buying or preserving things required for the adornment of the church, the board of trustees is obliged to see to it that the work is properly done. Should a dispute arise about the necessity of an expenditure, the bishop shall settle it.

Can. 1185 says that the sexton, the singers, the organist, the choir boys, the bell-ringer, the grave-diggers, and all other servers are to be appointed by, depend on, and are to be dismissed by the rector of the church, with due regard to lawful customs, concordats, and the authority of the Ordinary.

REPAIR OF CHURCHES

CAN. 1186

Salvis peculiaribus legitimisque consuetudinibus et conventionibus, et firma obligatione quae ad aliquem spectet etiam ex constituto legis civilis:

31 S. C. P. F., July 21, 1856, n. 21 (Collectanea S. C. P. F. ed. 1917, Vol. I, n. 1127, p. 603).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1°. Onus reficiendi ecclesiam cathedralem incumbit ordine qui sequitur:

Bonis fabricae, salva ea parte quae necessaria est ad cultum divinum celebrandum et ad ordinariam ecclesiae administrationem;

Episcopo et canonicis pro rata proventuum, detractis necessariis ad honestam sustentationem;

Dioecesanis, quos tamen Ordinarius loci suasione magis quam coactione inducat ad sumptus necessarios, pro eorum viribus, praestandos;

2°. Onus reficiendi ecclesiam paroecialem incumbit ordine qui sequitur:

Bonis fabricae ecclesiae, ut supra;

Patrono;

Iis qui fructus aliquos ex ecclesia provenientes percipiunt secundum taxam pro rata redituum ab Ordinario statuendam;

Paroecianis, quos tamen Ordinarius loci, ut supra, magis hortetur quam cogat;

3°. Haec cum debita proportione serventur etiam quod attinet ad alias ecclesias.

CAN. 1187

Si qua ecclesia nullo modo ad cultum divinum adhiberi possit et omnes aditus interclusi sint ad eam reficiendam, in usum profanum non sordidum ab Ordinario loci redigi potest, et onera cum reditibus titulusque paroeciae, si ecclesia sit paroecialis, in aliam ecclesiam ab eodem Ordinario transferantur.

With due regard to special and lawful customs and concordats, and to the duty imposed by civil law:

I. The duty of repairing the cathedral church rests on the following in the order named:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a) On the church funds after deduction of the expenses necessary for the upkeep of divine worship and the ordinary administration of the church;

b) On the bishops and canons according to their respective income, after deducting the necessary support;

c) On the faithful of the diocese, whom, however, the Ordinary should induce by persuasion rather than compulsion to contribute to the necessary expenses according to their means.

It is well known that formerly one of the three or four parts of which the church revenues consisted [32] was reserved for the maintenance and repair of the sacred edifices. However, in course of time the different parts were no longer distinguished and the material care of the church devolved either upon the beneficiary or together with him on all those who derived either spiritual or temporary benefit from the church funds. Besides the right of advowson involved a duty which was borne by the advowee or patron. And since this could be a corporation, it followed that the corporation or community who enjoyed the right of presentation had the obligation to provide for the material support of the church.

That local or special customs played and still play a part in countries where the separation of Church and State is not in effect is quite intelligible and natural. Besides, in some countries the civil law provides for a special board of ecclesiastical administrators. Lastly, conventions or concordats may regulate the obligations of the government concerning church repairs. Thus, e. g., the concordats between the Holy See and Prussia (1822)

32 See cc. 23–30, C. 12, q. 2. These four parts were divided as follows: one for the bishop, one for the support of the clergy, one for the poor and orphans, one for the maintenance of the building and divine service. In Spain, however, the revenues were divided only into three portions, see c. 10, C. 10, q. 1; c. 1–3, C. 10, q. 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and Russia (1847) embody regulations to that effect.[33] (By the way it may be said that such concordats bind also the new rulers.) These, then,— customs, concordats, and civil laws — are acknowledged by our Code and may be followed where they are in force. In our country the order according to which the obligation of repairing the cathedral church devolves on the various beneficiaries is: church fabric, bishop and canons, the faithful.

1. Church funds are moneys accruing from dowry, ordinary income, and extraordinary revenues. From these, first and above all, the expenses for the celebration of divine service[34] and for the ordinary or routine administration,— in other words,[35] the current expenses,— must be defrayed. What is left is to be employed for repairs of whatever description to be made on the cathedral church.

2. If, after deducting the necessary expenses, the church funds prove insufficient, the bishop and the canons must contribute to the necessary repairs, proportionately, i. e., so that the salary of each is taxed pro rata, but the necessary support must not suffer. By this support is understood the personal maintenance of the bishop and canons, to the exclusion of relatives, for their salary is not given, as Benedict XIV says,[36] for the alimentation of the consanguinei or the upkeep of titles and the so-called social status. Benedict XIII allowed the so-called media annata or half of the income of the first year to be collected from all benefices, except such as belonged to col-

33 Cfr. Nussi, Conventiones, 1870, p. 206, p. 277 f., where the Russian government appears to be favorable to the Church.

34 This would include church and altar utensils, bread and wine, sanctuary oil, flowers, etc.

35 Includes the priest's salary, the support of janitor, organist, choir, the expenses for water, heating, light, insurance.

36 Inst., 100, n. XIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

legiate chapters, parishes, benefices reserved to the Holy See and benefices which paid the same at any rate.[37] In our country the way is rather simple, because voluntary contributions or subscriptions generally cover expenses. But the bishop is not simply exempted from this duty if his income is sufficient and the cathedraticum "sat pingue." Diocesan consultors cannot in justice be obliged to contribute, unless the clergy as such is taxed.

3. As to the faithful, we need not add anything, except that formerly the S. Congregation taxed all the cathedral members who lived in or had property within the district. This was called per aes et libram.[38]

II. The duty of repairing the parish church rests upon the following in the order named:

1. On the church funds, as described above;
2. On the advowson or patron;
3. On those who receive some income from the church, in proportion to the rate of such income, to be fixed by the Ordinary;
4. On the parishioners, whom the Ordinary should exhort rather than compel to contribute.

III. The rules given above also apply to other churches, with due regard to circumstances.

We will add that it would be unjust simply to call on the Ordinary for the means of repairing a church. For, as Benedict XIV says, such a procedure is unheard of in law.[39] But what we have said concerning the obligation of the bishop to contribute to the repair of the cathedral church also applies to pastors. The salary of a pastor is church money, not intended for his relatives. As to lay-37 "Pius et misericors," May 25, 1725; Gasparri, De SSma Euch., n. 132.

38 S. C. C., Sept. 5, 1783; Jan. 10, 1784 et pluries (Richter, Trid., p. 121, n. 8 f.); July 20, 1895 (A. S. S., 28, 298 ff.).

39 Inst., 100, n. 1 f. Therefore a well-to-do pastor might well think of his church in his last will.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

men or clergymen who receive some sort of pension from the church funds, these are certainly bound to contribute to the repairs.[40] If a monastery or university should possess a parish or other church incorporated quoad temporalia tantum, it would be obliged to help keep it in good repair.[41] On the other hand it must also be stated that the obligation arises only from benefices, salaries, pensions, and revenues which are derived from the respective church. Hence neither the bishop, nor pastors, nor beneficiaries are obliged to defray such expenses from their private means or patrimony, nor are they bound to share the burden of repairing other churches than their own. The parishioners, as stated above, are treated very leniently in our Code.[42]

Can. 1187, following the tenor of a Tridentine decree,[43] permits a dilapidated church, which is unfit for sacred use and has absolutely no funds from which repairs might be made, to be used for decent profane purposes by the Ordinary. Whenever this happens, all liabilities and revenues are to be transferred to another church by the Ordinary, and if the abandoned church was a parish church, its title, too, must be transferred.

In usum profanum non sordidum means that the secular purpose to which a church is put should be honest or decent. If the church is sold, it should first be execrated. If it is torn down, profanation is hardly possible. But even in the latter hypothesis the title, if the church was a parish church, should be transferred to another church, which may assume it as a secondary title.[44] The obliga-

40 Trid., Sess. 21, c. 7 de ref.; Bened. XIV, Instit., 100, n. XIII.

41 S. C. C., March 11, 1711 (Richter, Trid., p. 121, n. 6).

42 Cfr. S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 10, 1841 (Bizzarri, p. 477 f.).

43 Sess. 21, c. 7, de ref.

44 S. C. C., May 22, 1841; March 31, 1708 (Richter, l. c., p. 121, n. 12 f).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tions referred to in the text consist in taking over the foundation Masses and the celebration of the titular feast.[45]

[45] S C. C., May 22, 1841 (l. c.). The canons were obligated to assist at the solemn Mass.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE X

ORATORIES

DEFINITION AND DIVISION

CAN. 1188

§ 1. Oratorium est locus divino cultui destinatus, non tamen eo potissimum fine ut universo fidelium populo usui sit ad religionem publice colendam.

§ 2. Est vero oratorium;

1°. Publicum, si praecipue erectum sit in commodum alicuius collegii aut etiam privatorum, ita tamen ut omnibus fidelibus, tempore saltem divinorum officiorum, ius sit, legitime comprobatum, illud adeundi;

2°. Semi-publicum, si in commodum alicuius communitatis vel coetus fidelium eo convenientium erectum sit, neque liberum cuique sit illud adire;

3°. Privatum seu domesticum, si in privatis aedibus in commodum alicuius tantum familiae vel personae privatae erectum sit.

§ 1. An oratory is a place destined for divine worship, not, however, principally for the purpose of having all the faithful worship there publicly.

The term oratory occurs in the fourth century and signifies a house of prayer (οἶκος εὐκτέριος). Later it was restricted to small or private chapels.[1] However, mere size is not the distinctive feature. Our Code insists, like

1 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 9.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google former decisions,[2] upon another characteristic: non universo fidelium populo usui, it must not be destined for the use of all the faithful. This is the specific purpose of a church in the technical sense of the term. An oratory is limited to a certain class or group of people. We would also stress the term publice colendam, although the phrase "public service" can have only a secondary meaning.

§ 2. Distinguishes three kinds of oratories, public, semi-public, and private.

1. A public oratory is one built for the benefit of a certain corporation, or of private individuals, but in such a manner that all the faithful have the right to frequent it, at least at the time when divine services are held there.

A founder may have had the intention of constructing a private oratory for his family, say at a summer resort, yet it has become public in the course of time, either by common use or by opening an entrance into it from a public street. Public here means the right of the public[3] to make use of a chapel for divine service. What are the signs or marks of publicity? The Code answers: the right of the public must be lawfully proved. This proof may be given legally in various ways. In one case a chapel had been built in the atrium of a baron's palace. It had a belfry with a bell, a fixed marble altar and other marks of a public oratory, and was declared to be such by the S. Congregation, although there was no entrance from a public street.[4] If an oratory has been erected as a perpetual benefice, it is considered a public oratory.[5] Also if it has an entrance from a public street and is open to all

2 S. C. C., Sept. 9, 1724; S. Rit. C., Dec. 4, 1896; June 5, 1899 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3934, 4025).

3 Cfr. fr. 72, Dig. 18, 1: "Si quid sacri aut religiosi aut publici est," etc.

4 S. C. C., May 31, 1704 (Richter, Trid., p. 130, n. 6); Gasparri, l. c., n. 192.

5 S. C. C., Feb 19, 1619; Many, l. c., p. 129.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the faithful. Summing up the Roman decisions we may say: A gate opening upon a public street or road used by the faithful; an immemorable custom or authentic document issued by the founder or owner of the chapel, even though it has no public entrance; or the title of benefice permanently attached to an oratory, are considered sufficient and evident proofs that an oratory is public. It goes without saying that prescription, say of thirty years,[6] may force a public way or entrance, for instance, upon the grounds or possessions of a landlord. But a mere public entrance or opening upon a public street could hardly be styled sufficient proof that an oratory is public,[7] unless the people are accustomed to frequent it. A legal proof would also be furnished by an express document to that effect issued at the time of the consecration or blessing of the oratory. It would be well for the ecclesiastical authorities to issue such documents. Finally, a legal proof that an oratory is a public one would be the erection or existence in it of a baptismal font, in accordance with can. 774, § 2.

2. Semi-public oratories are such as are built for the convenience of a certain community or class of people, but are not open to all the faithful indiscriminately. Here stress is laid on the corporate or specified class of faithful who make up the ordinary attendance of a chapel. The rest of the faithful cannot set up a claim to be admitted, and if they are admitted, it is by mere favor, which should prejudice neither the community itself nor the parish at large. Such oratories, says a decree of the S. Rit. C., of Jan. 23, 1899, are those attached to seminaries and colleges, pious institutes living under a rule or constitution, houses of retreat, boarding schools and hos-

6 Can. 1511, § 2; Many, l. c., p. 129.

7 Such a public entrance may also be made in a semi-public oratory.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pices destined for the young, hospitals and orphanages, garrisons and prisons.

3. Private or domestic oratories are those erected in private homes for the convenience of a family or private individuals. The term family must here be taken in its strict sense, and excludes artificial persons and corporations. But it includes all the inhabitants of a house living under the authority of the same paterfamilias.[8] Private oratories exist in private homes, which signifies exclusive ownership, so that no public servitude or easement can deprive them of their private character. We find such oratories in the homes of wealthy citizens, in villas, castles, and summer resorts.

CHAPELS OF CARDINALS AND BISHOPS

CAN. 1189

Oratoria S. R. E. Cardinalium et Episcoporum sive residentialium sive titularium, licet privata, fruuntur tamen omnibus iuribus et privilegiis quibus oratoria semi-publica gaudent.

The oratories of resident or titular Cardinals and bishops, even though they be private, enjoy all the rights and privileges of semi-public oratories.

Benedict XIV solemnly declared that oratories of Cardinals and bishops were not included in the decree of the Council of Trent.[9] He said that the homes of these dignitaries cannot be considered as private dwellings and consequently the Tridentine decree forbidding seculars and regulars to say Mass in private houses does not apply to them.[10] This, however, does not mean, as our text says,

8 Becker-Metcalf, Gallus, or Roman Scenes of the Time of Augustus, 1898, p. 151.

9 Sess. 22, de observandis, etc.

10 "Magno cum animi," June 2, 1757, §§ 1, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that such chapels are not private oratories in the modern sense. They are private, but enjoy the rights and privileges of semi-public oratories. Among these privileges is this that other priests, especially the Vicar General, may, even during the absence of the bishop or during the vacancy of the episcopal see, say Mass there either on week-days or holydays of obligation, and those who attend comply with the obligation of hearing Mass.[11] If the episcopal palace maintains a school, all the children and teachers may hear Mass in the chapel, said by any priest, and thereby satisfy their Sunday duty.[12] This privilege was extended to the chapels of all bishops, even though they were only titular bishops.[13] Other functions and offices are mentioned under can. 1193.

PRIVATE CEMETERY CHAPELS

CAN. 1190

Aediculae in coemeterio a familiis seu personis privatis ad suam sepulturam erectae, sunt oratoria privata.

Chapels erected on cemeteries by families or private individuals for their burial place, are private oratories.

Tourists in Italy may have noticed such chapels in the magnificent grave-yards of Milan and Genoa.

In a different class are the chapels erected for the whole cemetery, e. g., in memory of a pioneer priest or a benefactor. If they serve the purpose of a grave-yard chapel in general, the name private oratory cannot be applied to them.

11 S. Rit. C., July 2, 1661 (n. 1196).

12 S. Rit. C., April 8, 1854 (n. 3021).

13 S. Rit. C., June 8, 1896 (n. 3906).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLIC ORATORIES

CAN. 1191

§ 1. Oratoria publica eodem iure quo ecclesiae reguntur.

§ 2. Quare in oratorio publico, dummodo auctoritate Ordinarii ad publicum Dei cultum perpetuo per benedictionem vel consecrationem, ad norman can. 1155, 1156, dedicatum fuerit, omnes sacrae functiones celebrari possunt, salvo contrario rubricarum praescripto.

§ 1. Public oratories are governed by the same law as churches.

§ 2. In a public oratory, therefore, provided it has been dedicated for permanent divine worship by the authority of the Ordinary through blessing or consecration, all sacred functions may be held which are not forbidden by the rubrics.

The rules laid down for the building, consecration or blessing, execration, desecration and reconciliation, rights and privileges, administration and repairs of churches also apply to public oratories.

The ecclesiastical functions which may be performed in public oratories are those mentioned in can. 1171, to wit:

a) All priestly functions, such as high and low Mass, the blessing of candles, ashes, palms, the churching of women, etc.;

b) All the Sacraments, Baptism [14] not excepted, may be administered;

c) All indulgences that can be gained by a visit to a 14 Many, l. c., p. 387, excepts Baptism, but can. 774 f. leave no doubt as to the correctness of the statement in our text.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

church, can be gained also in a public oratory. The public oratories in the residences and hospices of the Capuchins enjoy the same right as the churches of their order.[15]

d) As to burial, it is certain that the Ordinary may grant permission to bury in these oratories, as this was authentically decided.[16]

The last-named decree calls for a remark in view of the demand of can. 1171, that the parochial rights should be safeguarded. If canon 1191, § 2, says that all ecclesiastical functions may be performed in public oratories, it means only those which do not clash with the strictly parochial rights described in can. 462. Can. 464, § 2, must also be considered, which permits the Ordinary to exempt some religious families from the pastor's jurisdiction. Again the local Ordinary, according to can. 1171, may determine the hours of divine service in these oratories, unless they belong to exempt religious. This power he may exercise not only at the time of consecration or blessing, but at any time and for any sound reason, provided, as stated, the oratories do not belong to exempt religious.[17] If exempt religious should cause a disturbance by holding services that trench upon parochial rights or conflict with good order, recourse may be had to the Holy See (S. C. Conc. or Rel.).

Public oratories must be blessed or consecrated and thus forever dedicated to the service of God. Roman practice requires that they be either consecrated according to the Roman Pontifical or blessed according to the Roman Ritual.[18] An oratory so consecrated or blessed is a 15 S. C. Indulg., June 11, 1732 (Prinzivalli, l. c., n. 69).

16 S. Rit. C., Jan. 13, 1704, ad 20 (n. 2123).

17 Bened. XIV, "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1741, § 14.

18 S. Rit. C., June 5, 1899 (n. 4025).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

strictly sacred place, which may not be used for profane purposes and is endowed with the ius asyli.

Lastly, the Code states: salvo contrario rubricarum praescripto. The only contrary rubrical laws we could discover touch the celebration of the titular feast and the feast of dedication. If the oratory is only blessed, no dedication feast is permitted, but only the titular feast. The calendar of a public oratory must be followed by the secular as well as the religious clergy, and the clergy attached to the oratory, or living in the house to which it is attached, must commemorate the title of the same.[19]

If the oratory is consecrated, the feast of the dedication must be celebrated with octave.

It may not be amiss to draw attention to the phrase, auctoritate Ordinarii. Can. 1155 and 1156 declare that the term Ordinary means not only the diocesan bishop, but also the superior of exempt religious. The diocesan bishop has the right to consecrate a public oratory, either personally or by a delegate; the superior of exempt religious may bless a public oratory in the same way.

SEMI-PUBLIC ORATORIES

CAN. 1192

§ 1. Oratoria semi-publica erigi nequeunt sine Ordinarii licentia.

§ 2. Ordinarius hanc licentiam ne concedat, nisi prius per se vel per alium ecclesiasticum virum oratorium visitaverit et decenter instructum repererit.

§ 3. Data autem licentia, oratorium ad usus profanos converti nequit sine eiusdem Ordinarii auctoritate.

§ 4. In collegiis aut convictibus iuventuti insti-

19 S. Rit. C., Sept. 28, 1872; June 27, 1899 (nn. 3279, 4043).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tuendae, in gymnasiis, lyceis, arcibus, praesidiis militum, carceribus, xenodochiis, etc., praeter oratorium principale alia minora ne erigantur, nisi, Ordinarii iudicio, necessitas aut magna utilitas id exigat.

§ 1 forbids the erection of semi-public oratories without the permission of the Ordinary. This is in conformity with the Council of Trent.[20] Anyone may build a semi-public oratory, but only for private devotion, not for the purpose of having public services held there, especially Mass. This is the meaning of the Tridentine decree as well as of later enactments.[21] The local Ordinary may give permission to pontifical as well as diocesan institutes of non-exempt religious to found and open a semi-public oratory.[22] The superior of exempt religious may permit such an oratory to be erected for the convenience of his subjects.

§ 2. The Ordinary shall not grant this permission before he has inspected the oratory either personally or through an ecclesiastical delegate, and found it properly fitted.

§ 3. After the permission has been granted, the oratory may not be put to private uses without the authority of the same Ordinary.

Since the distinction between a semi-public and a private oratory was developed, within the last three decades (owing undoubtedly to the growth of religious communities) it became necessary to define the requisites of both more strictly. Yet it is difficult to find, either in the Roman practice or in the works of canonists, a clear-cut line 20 Sess. 22, de observ. et evit. in celeb. Missae.

21 Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 6.

22 Leo XIII, "Conditae," Dec. 8, 1900, II, n. 3. The faculties mentioned in S. C. P. F., Feb. 29, 1836 (Coll., n. 846), are still valid for countries subject to that S. Congregation.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of demarcation. We surely interpret the mind of the legislator correctly if we apply the general requisites for a private oratory also to the semi-public. The Code, partly rehearsing the Tridentine decree[23] concerning private oratories, requires inspection, but leaves the designation of the place to the owner of the chapel. The inspection must comprise (a) the building, which should be such as to represent a sacred edifice and be constructed of solid materials,[24] or at least plastered; (b) the furniture and utensils which are required for the sacred functions, also the neatness and cleanliness of the place; (c) the surroundings of the oratory and its destination. § 3 clearly states that the chapel must not be used for profane purposes. The S. Congregation has in more than one instance insisted that there should be no dormitory immediately above the oratory or, if this can not be avoided, that a canopy (baldachino) be placed over the altar.[25] Furthermore, the chapel must not contain wardrobes, chests, or trunks for profane use, nor must it be allowed to serve as a parlor or recreation or work room; nor as a hallway, infirmary,[26] or dormitory.[27]

All these things, then, should be looked into by the Ordinary or his delegate, who may be any vir ecclesiasticus (not a mulier), even if he be only in minor orders, provided he has read the title on oratories.

§ 4. In colleges and boarding schools for the young, in high schools and lyceums (intermediate classical schools),[28] in fortresses and barracks (garrisons), in 23 Sess. 22, cit.

24 Private oratories must have at least three walls of stone or brick; the fourth may be supplied by a curtain or tapestry.

25 S. Rit. C., May 11, 1641; Sept. 12, 1840; Nov. 23, 1880 (nn. 756, 2812, 3525).

26 An epidemic might excuse from the observance of this rule.

27 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 157 f.

28 This is the Italian classification of schools, gymnasium standing for a five years' high school, lyceum for a three years' collegiate course.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prisons and asylums, etc., but one principal oratory may be erected, unless the Ordinary should judge that need or great usefulness demand more. According to a decision of the S. Congregation of Rites a special faculty imparted by the Holy See was required to erect other chapels, besides the principal one, in the places mentioned.[29] The Code dispenses with this faculty and leaves the matter to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary. The Ordinary in this case is the diocesan bishop for oratories belonging to secular or non-exempt religious, and the higher superior for oratories belonging to exempt religious.[30]

The decision quoted above also mentions some reasons of need and utility that may prompt the Ordinary to grant permission to erect some minor or accessory oratories besides the principal one. Such a reason, says the S. Congr., would be a great number of priests who would have to say Mass, say in a college or hospital, or the convenience of sick persons unable to visit the main chapel. To this might be reasonably added the cost of fuel.[31] A small chapel requires less coal, and would not only diminish expenses, but increase the comfort, especially of children and persons in delicate health.

A word may also be said concerning oratories of religious erected on their farms or summer resorts, which in Latin go by the name of grangiae,[32] i.e., houses or villas built on the property of religious for sheltering the oeconomus or farm boss and his subordinates, hired hands or servants. A laybrother was generally set up as superintendent, and sometimes a priest resided there to say

29 S. Rit. C., March 8, 1878, ad II (n. 3484).

30 For the text throughout this canon only speaks of the Ordinary, not the local Ordinary, and hence can. 198 may be applied.

31 When there is a coal famine this amounts to a solid reason.

32 Cfr. c. 27, X, III, 39.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Mass. In modern terms such an oratory would be semi-public, as it serves the convenience of a least a portion of a religious community.[33] Then there are religious institutions which own a college or hospital or university with a chapel insufficient to hold the number of attendants or to permit many priests to say Mass at a convenient hour. May the superior of these religious grant permission to erect, besides the principal chapel, another accessory one? If the place is owned by the exempt religious their major superior, i.e., the general, provincial, or conventual prior may grant this permission. If the place is owned by non-exempt religious, the Ordinary in whose diocese the chapel is to be erected, must be asked for permission. It is no longer necessary to have recourse to a privilege granted to the Jesuits,[34] or a communication of privileges. Exempt religious superiors are "Ordinaries" for the purposes of this canon.[35] Besides, can. 1156 dispels any misgiving in this matter. But superiors must inspect the oratory before granting the desired permission.

Can. 1193

In oratoriis semi-publicis, legitime erectis, omnia divina officia functionesve ecclesiasticae celebrari possunt, nisi obstent rubricae aut Ordinarius aliqua exceperit.

Can. 1193 provides that in semi-public oratories, lawfully erected, all divine offices and ecclesiastical functions may be held, as far as the rubrics and the rulings of the Ordinary permit.

33 Sometimes these grangiae or granciae served as summer-resorts for a vacation colony.

34 Gregory XIII, "Decet Romanum," May 3, 1575.

35 See can. 198.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The lawful erection of a semi-public oratory implies, as we have stated, inspection and permission by the Ordinary. Is consecration or blessing required? There is no text which prescribes either. It would be somewhat hazardous to consecrate a semi-public oratory, unless its stability and perpetuity were guaranteed. However, the blessing may be imparted, according to the Roman Ritual, although the simple blessing (Benedictio loci) is sufficient.[36]

Concerning the divine offices and ecclesiastical functions that may be held in semi-public oratories, we have only to repeat what was said under can. 1191. For, as the text implies, the same rules hold for both public and semi-public oratories. But the Ordinary may except some functions, and the members of such communities must abide by his ruling. (Remember that the Ordinary for exempt religious is their own superior.)

The rubrics which must be observed are those of the calendar prescribed for the principal chapel or semi-public oratory.[37] There is no restriction as to the number of Masses allowed in such chapels, or in regard to the priests who wish to say Mass there.[38] The office may be chanted in such chapels, and Mass be said on a fixed or portable altar, even by sick or elderly priests.[39]

If a semi-public oratory has been solemnly blessed, the titular feast must be duly observed,[40] and the oration, 36 For the solemn blessing see Rit. Rom., tit. VIII, c. 27; the benedictio loci, ibid., tit. VIII, cc. 6, 7 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 243 ff.; p. 224 f.).

37 S. Rit. C., May 22, 1876 (n. 3910).

38 S. Rit. C., March 8, 1879, ad I, 1, 2; July 2, 1661 (nn. 3484, 1196).

39 S. Rit. C., Nov. 10, 1906, II (n. 4190); this decision ad II does not upset our contention for the grangiae of regulars, because can. 1192, § 4, is later than said declaration.

40 S. Rit. C., Nov. 29, 1878 (n. 3471).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or at least the name of the titular saint, recited in the office.

PRIVATE ORATORIES

CAN. 1194

In privatis coemeteriorum aediculis, de quibus in can. 1190, Ordinarius loci permittere habitualiter potest etiam plurium Missarum celebrationem; in aliis oratoriis domesticis, nonnisi unius Missae, per modum actus, in casu aliquo extraordinario, iusta et rationabili de causa; Ordinarius autem has permissiones ne elargiatur, nisi ad norman can. 1192, § 2.

CAN. 1195

§ 1. In oratoriis domesticis ex indulto Apostolicae Sedis, nisi aliud in eodem indulto expresse caveatur, celebrari potest, postquam Ordinarius oratorium visitaverit et probaverit ad norman can. 1152, § 2, unica Missa, eaque lecta, singulis diebus, exceptis festis sollemnioribus; sed aliae functiones ecclesiasticae ibidem ne fiant.

§ 2. Ordinarius vero, dummodo iustae adsint et rationabiles causae, diversae ab eis ob quas indultum concessum fuit, etiam sollemnioribus festis permittere potest per modum actus Missae celebrationem.

CAN. 1196

§ 1. Oratoria domestica nec consecrari nec benedici possunt more ecclesiarum.

§ 2. Licet oratoria domestica et semi-publica communi locorum domorumve benedictione aut nulla benedictione donentur, debent tamen esse divino tan-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tum cultui reservata et ab omnibus domesticis usibus libera.

Canon 1194 says, first, that in private cemetery chapels, mentioned under can. 1190, the Ordinary of the diocese may grant permission for several Masses to be said habitually. This clause marks an extension of the former law and of the Roman practice, which required a special faculty for the bishop from the Apostolic See.[41] The term Ordinarius loci here excludes exempt religious superiors.

In other domestic oratories, continues can. 1194, the local Ordinary may permit one Mass to be said, not habitually, but upon occasion, in some extraordinary case, and provided there be a just and reasonable cause. This permission presupposes that the Ordinary has inspected said oratory and found it fit. This, too, is a mitigation of the former practice. The only conditions are: (a) that only one Mass may be said on the occasion or day for which the petition was granted; (b) that this permission be not a habitual or perpetual grant, but effective only for the time being and as long the reason exists; (c) that the occasion be an extraordinary one, for instance, a first Mass, or a jubilee, or a temporary necessity as that caused by an epidemic or quarantine; (d) that the cause be just and reasonable, i.e., not detrimental to others, especially to the parish organization; (e) that the Ordinary first inspect the oratory, as required by can. 1192, § 2.

Can. 1195 refers to domestic oratories erected by virtue of a papal indult. Any one may build or construct an oratory for private devotion, but to have Mass said there 41 Trid., Sess. 22; S. C. C., Dec. 20, 1856; S. C. P. F., Feb. 29, 1836 (Coll., n. 846); S. Rit. C., Sept. 20, 1749 ad 5 (n. 2404).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

requires a papal indult, ever since the Tridentine Council. Therefore, says our canon, unless expressly provided otherwise in said indult, only one low Mass may be said daily in such oratories, except on the more solemn feastdays, and no other ecclesiastical functions are allowed. Before the indult takes effect the Ordinary must inspect and approve the oratory, as required by can. 1192, § 2. He may also, for just and reasonable causes, other than those for which the indult was granted, permit a Mass to be said there even on higher feastdays, but only per modum actus.

This canon distinguishes between the right of having Mass said daily and the right of having Mass said habitually in private oratories. The Council of Trent took away the right of the bishops to permit Mass in private oratories per modum habitus, but left them the power of granting the permission per modum actus for weighty and urgent reasons.[42] The Code requires only a just and reasonable cause.

Can. 1195 speaks of a papal indult, granted by the S. C. of Sacraments. Such indults are almost invariably addressed to the local Ordinary, who is therefore obliged to read the document carefully and note the clausulae. The Ordinary in this case is an executor mixtus, i.e., he is obliged to investigate the truth of the reasons alleged by the petitioner — constito tibi de narratis — and the condition of the oratory, as required by can. 1192, § 2; but he cannot withhold execution if he finds everything to be as required by law.[43]

The text further says that only one low Mass may be said daily in such oratories, even on Sundays, not, however, on the more solemn feastdays. This restriction was 42 S. C. C., Dec. 20, 1856; Many, l. c., p. 151 f.

43 Cfr. Gasparri, De SSma Eucharistia, n. 235, p. 163 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

no doubt made for the purpose of insinuating to the grantee that he should attend his parish church on those days. After the reorganization of feasts by Pius X and the S. C. of Rites,[44] the question naturally arose on which feasts it was forbidden to have Mass in private oratories. The answer was that on the feasts of the Commemoration of St. Joseph, the Annunciation of the B. V. Mary, Corpus Christi, the feast of the Blessed Trinity, the Sunday within the octave of Corpus Christi, and the Sunday on which the feast of St. John the Baptist was celebrated, Mass may be said in private oratories.[45] From this decision it may safely be deduced that the term "more solemn feasts" means the holydays of obligation, which do not fall on a Sunday. The indult may read otherwise, excepting no feastday or restricting the number of other days (nisi aliud in eodem indulto expresse caveatur).

Under § 2 of can. 1195 the Ordinary may permit a low Mass to be said in private oratories even on more solemn feasts, under two conditions: (a) that there be a just and reasonable cause not identical with the one expressed in the indult; (b) that the grant be made per modum actus. If, for instance, the reason for which the indult was given was the merit of the petitioner, old age or physical weakness may be alleged for obtaining from the Ordinary the favor of having a Mass said also on the more solemn feasts. This instance also explains the second condition. Thus, if old age was the reason given, the petition may be granted until age has been turned into eternity, i.e., until death. This is not stretching the tenor of the indult, for it must be remem-

44 Pius X, "Supremi disciplinae," July 2, 1911; S. Rit. C., July 24, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 305 ff.; 350 f.).

45 S. C. Sacr., April 11, 1913 (A. Ap. S., V, 183 f.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bered that the grantee or principal indultarius must be present in the chapel, in order that the members of his household or family may enjoy the privilege of assisting at Mass and complying with the obligation of hearing Mass on the days prescribed. Besides, the indult lasts only as long as the person in whose name it was issued lives and can enjoy it. Finally, according to canonists, the phrase modus actus means as long as the reason exists (durante causa).[46]

Having mentioned the principal grantee and his family, the rescript may mention also the consanguinei and affines, those related by blood and affinity, which is understood to extend to the fourth degree.[47] In former rescripts, issued under Leo XIII, noble guests were also mentioned. This term, strictly speaking, excludes all who are not of noble rank; but we hardly believe that such a rigorous interpretation could be applied to a rescript issued for our country. Hence if guests are mentioned, they too are benefited by the indult. Familiares are servants employed in actual service at the time of Mass, e.g., those who wait upon the Master or Lady of the house at Mass, either as honorary ladies and gentlemen, or by helping a feeble lady or gentleman. Cooks, chauffeurs, or hired men in barn or field, janitors, etc., are not benefited by the indult.[48]

No other ecclesiastical functions are permissible in private oratories. This excludes all strictly parochial and other priestly or ecclesiastical functions, preaching (though a brief exhortation would not be forbidden), the administration of the Sacraments and sacramentals.

What about holy Communion? No matter what can-

46 Many, l. c., p. 153.
47 Ibid.
48 Benedict XIV, "Magno cum animi," June 2, 1751, §§ 11, 12, 19; Gasparri, l. c., n. 236, p. 168.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

onists formerly held, we believe that, since frequent communion is so strongly urged, the distribution of the Eucharist would not be forbidden. At any rate, the permission of the bishop would suffice.[49]

Can. 1196 forbids domestic oratories to be consecrated or blessed like churches. They may, however, and should receive the so-called benedictio loci or domus novae, as contained in the Roman Ritual.[50]

Notwithstanding this defect of consecration or blessing, domestic oratories must be exclusively reserved for divine service and not be used for domestic purposes, as explained under can. 1192, § 3. Nevertheless, a private oratory is, properly speaking, not a sacred, but a profane place, and hence not liable to desecration, nor does it enjoy the ius asyli. It also remains the private property of the owner of the house.[51]

49 Cfr. Bened. XIV. l. c., § 23 f.; Institut., 34, n. 11 f.; Gasparri, l. c., n. 1088, II, p. 332.

50 Tit. VIII, c. 6 f. (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 224 f.); S. Rit. C., June 5, 1899, VI (n. 4025).

51 Many, l. c., p. 174.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XI

ALTARS

DEFINITION AND SPECIES

CAN. 1197

§ 1. Sensu liturgico intelligitur:

1°. Nomine altaris immobilis seu fixi, mensa superior una cum stipitibus per modum unius cum eadem consecratis;

2°. Nomine altaris mobilis seu portatilis, petra, ut plurimum, parva, quae sola consecratur, quaeque dicitur etiam ara portatilis seu petra sacra; vel eadem petra cum stipite qui tamen non fuit una cum eadem consecratus.

§ 2. In ecclesia consecrata saltem unum altare, praesertim maius, debet esse immobile; in ecclesia autem benedicta omnia altaria possunt esse mobilia.

§ 1. In the liturgical sense of the word an immovable or a fixed altar means the upper table with its supports, consecrated together as a whole with the table. A movable or portable altar is a stone, generally of small size, which is consecrated alone, and called portable altar or sacred stone; or the same stone with its support, though the latter was not consecrated together with the table.

§ 2. In every consecrated church at least one, preferably the main, altar must be immovable; but in churches that are only blessed all altars may be movable.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The earliest altar was a mere table copied after secular patterns. It consisted of a rectangular and slightly oblong top, supported by one, four, or occasionally five, legs. This simple and natural shape was retained until well into the fifth century. From the beginning, stone as well as wooden altars were employed. Gradually the Church came to discriminate in favor of stone, on account of its monumental character and greater durability. A change in the form of the altar was brought about in the sixth century by the new impetus given to the veneration of relics. The Holy Eucharist was brought into close relation with the tombs of the martyrs and it was regarded as a matter of prime importance that the altar be brought into the closest possible relation with the tomb, or at least be located directly above it. This was done by building a "confessio," i.e., a chamber surrounding the tomb and connected by a shaft or gallery with the altar. The next stage in the development of the altar arose from the custom, which grew rapidly during the sixth century, of depositing the bodies of the martyrs within the churches. This often led to the construction of a true confessio or crypt; but more often the relics were deposited immediately beneath the plate of the altar and inclosed with a stone cippus or block, roughly cubical in form, hollow within, and ornamented on the front by a doorway, like a miniature tomb. Finally the altar was enclosed on all four sides by plates of stone and became a mere chest for the preservation of relics. Sometimes a sarcophagus or fully extended body was enclosed. The custom of erecting more than one altar in the same church grew out of the cult of relics. Such secondary altars came into use about the beginning of the fifth century, at first in side

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

chapels, later in the main church, nay even in the nave.[1]

These brief remarks seemed necessary to explain the structure of the altar and the importance of relics for the same.

REQUISITES

CAN. 1198

§ 1. Tum mensa altaris immobilis tum petra sacra ex unico constent lapide naturali, integro et non friabili.

§2. In altari immobili tabula seu mensa lapidea ad integrum altare protendi debet, et apte cum stipite cohaerere; stipes autem sit lapideus vel saltem latera seu columellae quibus mensa sustentatur sint ex lapide.

§ 3. Petra sacra sit tam ampla ut saltem hostiam et maiorem partem calicis capiat.

§ 4. Tum in altari immobili tum in petra sacra sit, ad norman legum liturgicarum, sepulcrum continens reliquias Sanctorum, lapide clausum.

§ 1. The table of an immovable altar as well as a sacred stone must consist of one natural stone, whole and not easily crumbled. The altar stone is to be one single slab, which excludes several parts.[2] Even if the several parts should be compactly cemented together so as to appear as one stone, the altar cannot be validly consecrated.[3] A natural or pure stone is one that corresponds to the mineralogical definition of a stone. Any hard and compact stone is admissible, as, e.g., marble, sandstone, travertine, etc. Even slate or schist is allowed, but

1 Cfr. Lowrie, Monuments of the Early Church, 1901, p. 159 ff.

2 S. Rit. C., June 17, 1843; Nov. 10, 1906 (nn. 2861, 4191).

3 S. Rit. C., Sept. 28, 1872; June 8, 1896; Nov. 10, 1906, ad I, II (nn. 3286, 3907, 4191), but the church would be validly consecrated.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pumice-stone or gypsum have been rejected.[4] Because of their composite nature cement plates or blocks must be considered forbidden. The S. Congregation has always refused to admit a marble or wooden cornice or ornament surrounding the table like a wreath.[5] An altar, the nucleus of which is of stone but covered with bricks overlaid with a marble crust, has also been declared unconsecrable.[6] Integer means that the stone should be of one piece, without fractures or crevices. Should the stone have been perforated by cutting or chiseling the repository for relics into it, it would be sufficient to place a piece of marble or other solid slab on the part below, so that the capsula with the relics could be laid on it.[7] That the stone should be of a sort that will not easily crumble (friabilis) follows from the nature of stone. If it were so fragile that the fourth part or more would break off in the act of consecration, the latter would be invalid.[8]

§ 2. In an immovable altar the table or stone plate must extend over the whole altar and be properly joined to the support; the support itself must be of stone, or at least the side props or columns which support the table must be of stone.

§ 3. The sacred stone (portable altar) must be so large that at least the host and the larger part of the base of the chalice may find room thereon.

No dimensions for an altar are prescribed by the rubrics or the S. Congregation of Rites. It ought, however, to be large enough to allow a priest conveniently

4 S. Rit. C., April 29, 1887; June 13, 1899 (nn. 3675, 4032).

5 S. Rit. C., Aug. 29, 1885; April 23, 1893 (nn. 3640, 3797).

6 S. Rit. C., Dec. 14, 1888 (n. 3698), but the invalidity of consecration is not clearly pronounced.

7 S. Rit. C., Feb. 8, 1896 (n. 3884).

8 S. Rit. C., June 8, 1894, n. II (n. 3829).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to celebrate the holy sacrifice upon it, in such a manner that all the ceremonies can be decorously observed.[9] But the S. Congregation has insisted, as does our text, that the altar-stone should cover the whole length and width of the fixed altar, without an ornamental addition.[10] If, for instance, the length of the whole fixed altar is ten feet, and its width from the tabernacle to the front twenty-two inches, the altar-stone must have the same dimensions.

It is absolutely required that the table or mensa be placed immediately upon the support so as to form one whole with it. In one case the S. Congregation demanded that if no connection between the altar-stone and the stipes had been made, stone stipites should be added. The consecration was declared valid, yet only by a special favor was the addition and separate anointing of these stipites granted.[11] From this it is evident that only a moral, though material, conjunction is required, at least for licitness.[12] But the connection must be one of stone with stone.

The support, therefore, (stipes) must be of stone. It may be one solid mass of granite, marble, etc., or it may consist of four or more columns. But it is absolutely necessary that these sides, columns, or small piers be of stone.[13] Columns of copper, brass, or other metal are not allowed. If the bases are of metal, the shaft, and more especially the capitals, must be of stone, or a stone layer must be placed between the columns and the table, 9 Cfr. Schulte, Consecranda, 1907, p. 6.

10 S. Rit. C., Aug. 29, 1885 (n. 3640); the altar was only 2.27 meters in length and 0.57 meters in width, wherefore they put a marble cornice around it.

11 S. Rit. C., June 8, 1894; July 5, 1901 (nn. 3829, 4075).

12 Many, l. c., p. 204.

13 S. Rit. C., Aug. 7, 1875; Dec. 14, 1888 (nn. 3364, 3698).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

otherwise it cannot be consecrated as a fixed altar.[14] The spaces between the side walls (columns or piers) may be left open, or the spaces on the sides and back be filled with any kind of stone, brick, or cement; but the space between the two columns in front should be left open, so that a reliquary can be placed beneath the table.[15]

The portable altar is sometimes also called altare viaticum. Its dimensions are approximately pointed out in § 3, where it is said that the table must be large enough to hold the sacred host and the greater part of the base of the chalice.[16] Besides, as liturgists reasonably state, it should have room enough for the ciborium. In general the dimensions may range between 12 x 12, or 14 x 16 inches.[17]

§ 4. In an immovable altar as well as in an altar stone there must be, according to the rubrical prescriptions, a sepulchre containing relics of saints and closed with a stone.

The historical remarks made above explain this venerable custom. The sixth synod of Carthage (401) enacted that no memoriae martyrum should be tolerated without their relics being present or at least without some historical reminiscence connected with the place.[18] In this canon only the chapels of martyrs are mentioned. Yet, as seen above, the custom of placing relics in the altars soon extended to all churches and altars. When some missionaries in South America claimed the privilege of consecrating altars without relics, the Holy Office,[19]

14 S. Rit. C., May 24, 1901 (n. 4073).

15 S. Rit. C., Sept. 28, 1872; Dec. 20, 1864 (nn. 3282, 3126).

16 S. C. Indulg., March 20, 1846 (Prinzivalli, n. 574).

17 Schulte, l. c., p. 232 f.

18 Can. 17 = c. 26, Dist. 1, de cons. (Hefele, Concil.-Gesch., II, 72).

19 Jan. 17, 1900 (Coll. P. F., n. 2076).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

without entering into an historical discussion, insisted that relics be placed in the altars, but allowed Mass to be said on altars consecrated without relics. Gregory XVI, in a time of persecution, granted to the Vicars Apostolic of the Chinese empire and adjoining realms the faculty of consecrating altars without relics.[20] Consecration without relics would certainly be invalid[21] if no faculty to the contrary had been obtained.

The sepulchrum is a small square or oblong opening made in the table or solid support of the altar, in which the relics are placed. In a fixed or immovable altar the sepulchrum may be placed either behind the altar or midway between its table and foot; or at the front; or midway between its table and foot, or in the table at its centre, somewhat towards the front edge, if its base be solid or hollow; or in the centre on the top of the support, if it be solid.[22]

In portable altars the sepulchrum is located on top of the stone, usually towards its front edge.[23] A portable altar described as consisting of two parts, the upper one of which was of stone, whereas the lower was of wood, with a hollow space between both for the relics, which thus touched both the stone and wooden parts of which the sepulchrum was formed, was declared inadmissible. The sepulchrum must be of natural stone, not of metal, or brass, or cement; the lid, too, must be of stone, though cement may be used for closing it.[24] If cement was employed for the whole sepulchrum the altar must be recon-

20 S. C. P. F., July 8, 1838 (Coll., n. 869).

21 S. Rit. C., Rhedon., Oct. 6, 1837; April 29, 1887 (nn. 2777, 3674).

22 Schulte, Consecranda, p. 7 ff.

23 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1867 (n. 3162).

24 S. Rit. C., Sept. 16, 1881; Dec. 15, 1882 ad I; July 28, 1883 (nn. 3532, 3567, 3585). Portable altars may not be of pumice-stone or gypsum; S. Rit. C., June 13, 1899 (n. 4032).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

secrated; but the S. Congregation granted faculties to use the short formula and have it done by a delegated priest.[25] The cement to be used for closing the sepulchre must be blessed by the bishop according to the formula prescribed for fixed altars. The bishop must lay the cement on the sepulchre and close it, but not place his seal on it.[26]

As to the relics to be placed in the sepulchre, it is understood that only authenticated ones are admitted. If they are authenticated, it matters not whether they are of nameless Saints.[27] Doubtful or uncertain relics are not to be mixed with authenticated ones.[28] If relics lie open and no attestation of their authenticity can be found, they must be replaced by authentic ones and re-enclosed in the sepuchre.[29]

The quality of relics is not determined, except that they must be of Saints. However, it is the general practice, confirmed by official decisions, that they should be relics of at least one martyr, to which relics of confessors and virgins may be added.[30] Whether these relics must be taken from the body (direct relics) or may be obtained from objects connected with the Saint (indirect relics), is nowhere stated, although some writers, like Gardellini, insist on direct relics.[31]

CONSECRATION OF ALTARS

CAN. 1199

§ 1. Ut Missae sacrificium super illud celebrari possit, altare debet esse, secundum liturgicas leges,

25 S. Rit. C., Aug. 30, 1901 (n. 4082).

26 S. Rit. C., May 10, 1890 (n. 3726).

27 S. Rit. C., Sept. 7, 1630 (n. 542).

28 S. Rit. C., Dec. 5, 1851 (n. 2991 ad I).

29 S. Rit. C., Feb. 27, 1847 (n. 2941): S. C. sanavit defectus.

30 S. Rit. C., Oct. 6, 1837; Feb. 16, 1906 (nn. 2777, 4180).

31 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 208; Schulte, l. c., p. 10, also rejects indirect relics; but c. 26, Dist. 1, de cons., admits them.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

consecratum; idest vel totum, si agatur de immobili, vel ara tantum portatilis, si de mobili.

§ 2. Aras portatiles, salvis peculiaribus privilegiis, omnes Episcopi consecrare possunt; quod vero spectat ad altaria immobilia, servetur praescriptum can. 1155.

§ 3. Consecratio altaris immobilis, quae fit sine ecclesiae dedicatione, quamvis omni die fieri possit, magis tamen decet ut fiat die dominico aliove festo de praecepto.

§ 1. In order that the Sacrifice of the Mass may be celebrated upon an altar, it must be consecrated according to the liturgical laws; that is to say, if the altar is fixed, the whole must be consecrated, if it is portable, the altar table.

The resp. rites are contained in the Roman Pontifical, and no deviation from, or abbreviation of them is admissible; not even from the fast (on the day itself) when a portable altar is to be consecrated.[32] However, in forming the crosses from incense and putting on the candles, the consecrator may be assisted by priests.[33]

Fixed altars may be consecrated even in a church which is only blessed, as a church is consecrated even if the altar was not validly consecrated.[34] The vigils must also be observed before the consecration of an altar, as is evident from the Roman Pontifical.

§ 2. Besides those especially privileged, all bishops may consecrate portable altars; as to fixed altars can. 1155 must be observed.

Those specially privileged are the Cardinals, vicars

32 S. Rit. C., May 22, 1841 (n. 2826).

33 S. Rit. C., Jan. 14, 1910 (4244).

34 S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1857, ad XV; June 17, 1843 (nn. 3059, 2862).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Apostolic and prefects Apostolic, as well as their provicars and pro-prefects during the time of vacancy, abbots and prelates nullius.[35] (For the rest, see can. 625 and 1147.) Besides these all bishops, whether residential or titular, may consecrate portable altars. But fixed altars can be consecrated only by bishops and prelates or abbots nullius, if the latter have received the blessing required.

§ 3. The consecration of a fixed altar, if performed apart from the dedication of the church in which it is stationed, may take place on any day, but it is becoming that this ceremony should be performed on a Sunday or holyday of obligation.

LOSS OF CONSECRATION

CAN. 1200

§ 1. Altare immobile amittit consecrationem, si tabula seu mensa a stipite, etiam per temporis momentum, separetur; quo in casu Ordinarius potest permittere ut presbyter altaris consecrationem rursus perficiat ritu formulaque breviore.

§ 2. Tum altare immobile tum petra sacra amittunt consecrationem:

1°. Si frangantur enormiter sive ratione quantitatis fractionis sive ratione loci unctionis;

2°. Si amoveantur reliquiae aut frangatur vel amoveatur sepulcri operculum, excepto casu quo ipse Episcopus vel eius delegatus operculum amoveat ad

35 Cfr. can. 239, § 1, n. 20; can. 294, § 2; can. 310, §2; can. 323, § 2; Bened. XIV, "Ex sublimi," Jan. 26, 1753, § 2; "Quam ex sublimi," Aug. 8, 1755, § 1. The decree of S. Rit. C., Sept. 27, 1659 (n. 1131), mentions no right of other abbots in this respect, and therefore only one resource remains: a directly granted privilege. This is the Roman jurisprudence, not merely our individual and subjective view.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

illud firmandum vel reparandum vel subrogandum, aut ad visitandas reliquias.

§ 3. Levis fractio operculi non inducit exsecrationem et quilibet sacerdos potest rimulam cemento firmare.

§ 4. Exsecratio ecclesiae non secumfert exsecrationem altarium sive immobilium sive mobilium; et viceversa.

§ 1. An immovable altar loses its consecration if the table or mensa is removed from its support, even if only for a moment; but in this case the Ordinary may grant permission to a priest to reconsecrate the altar with the short rite and formula.

Note that the support of a fixed altar is consecrated together with the table, as a whole, and therefore any removal, no matter for whatever reason, of the mensa from its support, necessitates reconsecration.[36] But if only the images, or titles, or ornaments are removed, whilst the support and the mensa remain united, reconsecration is not required.[37]

§ 2. A fixed as well as a portable altar loses its consecration:

1.° By a fracture which is regarded as very considerable by reason either of the break itself or of the anointed place;

2.° If the relics are removed, or the lid of the sepulchre is broken or removed, unless it be done by the bishop or his delegate for the purpose of fastening, repairing, or replacing it, or for the purpose of inspecting the relics.

The Code adopts the decision of S. Rit. C. concerning 36 S. Rit. C., May 15, 1819 (n. 2599), et pluries.

37 S. Rit. C., July 7, 1759 (n. 2450).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the definition of a fractura enormis.[38] Two reasons determine the character of a fracture: its extent and the place where it occurs. If the mensa itself were split into two, three, or four pieces, especially if it touched the sepulchre, the fracture would be "enormous" in the sense of the law.[39] If an anointed corner or cross would crack, the fissure would be sufficient to require reconsecration,[40] provided of course the cross itself would be cracked. For if only a corner would break off, with the cross intact, we hardly believe that the whole altar would have to be reconsecrated. The mere breaking of the seal which is attached to the reliquary of the sepulchre would not entail loss of consecration.[41] If the removal of the stone covering the sepulchre is doubtful, reconsecration must take place, but the S. Congregation, upon request, may grant the use of the short formula.[42] If the stone covering the reliquary was loosened, but the sepulchre was not laid bare, and the sacristan (lay brother) applied lime or cement to fasten it, the consecration is not lost.[43] But if a priest would open the sepulchre and close it again, the consecration would be lost.[44] However, this last statement now requires a modification. If the pastor acted in the name of the bishop, as his delegate, for the purpose of fastening, or repairing, or replacing the lid of the sepulchre, or of inspecting it, no loss of consecration would be entailed. The fact of delegation, however, would have to be expressed, either habitually or per modum actus.

38 S. Rit. C., Oct. 6, 1837 (n. 2777).
39 S. Rit. C., June 23, 1879 (n. 3497).
40 S. Rit. C., Oct. 6, 1837 (n. 2777).
41 S. Rit. C., Dec. 5, 1851, n. I (n. 2991).
42 S. Rit. C., May 18, 1883 (n. 3575).
43 S. Rit. C., Sept. 30, 1875 (n. 3379).
44 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1857, ad V (n. 3162).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. A slight fracture of the cover of the sepulchre does not involve desecration, and any priest may fill it up with cement.

§ 4. The desecration of a church does not involve desecration of either its fixed or portable altars, and conversely. Thus, if soldiers had desecrated a church, but left the altars untouched, the latter would not need reconsecration.[45]

TITLES OF ALTARS

CAN. 1201

§ 1. Sicut ecclesia, ita quodlibet etiam ecclesiae altare, saltem immobile, proprium sibi titulum habeat.

§ 2. Titulus primarius altaris maioris idem debet esse ac titulus ecclesiae.

§ 3. De Ordinarii licentia mutari quidem potest altaris mobilis, non autem altaris immobilis titulus.

§ 4. Altaria Beatis etiam in ecclesiis et oratoriis quibus eorum officium et Missa concessa sunt, dedicari nequeunt sine Sedis Apostolicae indulto.

§ 1. Like the church, so also the altars of a church, at least those that are fixed, must have each its own title.

§ 2. The principal title of the main altar must be the same as that of the church. For instance, if the church is dedicated to the Immaculate Conception, this must also be the title of the high altar. Besides this, the altar may also bear the name of a Saint, e.g., St. Columbkill.

§ 3. With the permission of the Ordinary[46] the title of a portable altar may be changed, but not the title of

45 S. Rit. C., March 3, 1821 (n. 2612).

46 The Ordinary for exempt religious is their superior major.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a fixed altar. The latter requires a papal indult.[47] Thus, for instance, if a new religious congregation obtains a church that formerly belonged to an order, the old title of the altar, or church, respectively, must be retained for the main altar, and even on the side altar, if this is a fixed one, the former title under which the altar was dedicated must be placed, although a new title or image, e.g., of the founder of the congregation, may also be placed there.[48]

Altars may not be dedicated to the Blessed without an Apostolic indult, even in churches and oratories for which the office and Mass of the resp. Beatus has been granted. This law binds also exempt religious, who are therefore not allowed to erect an altar in honor of a Blessed of their order without a papal indult.[49]

PROFANE USES NOT TOLERATED

CAN. 1202

§ 1. Altare tum immobile tum mobile debet esse divinis tantum officiis et praesertim Missae celebrationi reservatum, quolibet profano usu prorsus excluso.

§ 2. Subtus altare nullum sit reconditum cadaver; cadavera autem quae prope altare sepulta forte sunt, distent ab eo saltem spatio unius metri; secus Missam in altari celebrare non licet, donec cadaver removeatur.

§ 1. Immovable as well as portable altars are exclusively reserved for divine service, and every profane use must be excluded.

47 S. Rit. C., Nov. 10, 1906, ad III (n. 4191).

48 S. Rit. C., Aug. 27, 1836, ad V, VII (n. 2752).

49 S. Rit. C., April 17, 1660 (n. 1156).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. No corpses are to be entombed beneath the altar; if corpses are buried near the altar, a space of one metre[50] at least must intervene, otherwise Mass may not be celebrated on the altar until the body is removed.

A quaint custom prevailed in the archdiocese of Durazzo. Mohammedan women, when sick, took refuge under the antipendium of the altar on which Mass was said. This was promptly forbidden by the S. Congregation.[51] A less offensive though also rejected custom is that of leaving the altar cover rolled up on a stick on the altar during Mass.[52]

Altars should not be used as store-rooms, as this is forbidden by the general rubrics.

§ 2 forbids the saying of Mass on an altar which is too near a tomb or grave which contains the corpse or body of a person not canonized or beatified. The distance of one meter (39 inches) must be taken in the full, though not strictly in the mathematical[53] sense, and the dimensions are to be measured in every direction,— height, length, width, depth, including the predella.[54] If an altar is separated from the tomb by a stone chamber, although the distance is less than one meter, Mass may be said.[55] This distance must be observed also in cemeteries, vaults, and subterranean chapels, no matter whether they belong to religious or seculars.[56] Removal is necessary if morally possible. The S. Congregations have permitted bodies to remain if the re-

50 One metre is equal to 39 inches. The movement for introducing the metric system into the U. S. and England can only be welcomed.

51 S. C. P. F., Feb. 25, 1837 (Coll., n. 854).

52 S. Rit. C., June 2, 1883, ad II (n. 3576).

53 S. Rit. C., Jan. 12, 1897, ad II; Aug. 3, 1901 (nn. 3944, 4082).

54 S. Rit. C., Feb. 13, 1666, n. 5; July 7, 1766 (nn. 1333, 2479).

55 S. Rit. C., July 27, 1878 ad II; July 18, 1902 (nn. 3460, 4100).

56 S. Rit. C,. Sept. 28, 1872; April 21, 1873 (nn. 3283, 3294).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

moval could be effected only with difficulty.[57] One decision reads: "If it can be done conveniently."[58] Piety and expenses should also be taken into consideration.

57 S. C. P. F., Nov. 22, 1790, ad 3 (Coll. n. 603).

58 S. Rit. C, 2, 1875 (n. 3339): "si commode fieri potest."

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XII

ECCLESIASTICAL BURIAL

BURIAL VS. CREMATION

CAN. 1203

§ 1. Fidelium defunctorum corpora sepelienda sunt, reprobata eorundem cremationе.

§ 2. Si quis quovis modo mandaverit ut corpus suum cremetur, illicitum est hanc exsequi voluntatem; quae si adiecta fuerit contractui, testamento aut alii cuilibet actui, tanquam non adiecta habeatur.

§ 1. The bodies of the faithful must be buried, cremation being reprobated.

§ 2. Should any one in any way order his body to be cremated, this order cannot lawfully be carried out, and any stipulation, will, or disposition to that effect must be disregarded.

These canons embody a constant, time-honored tradition, which, while it does not directly involve a dogma, has been repeatedly enforced, especially against the Masons. Jews, Greeks, and Romans, various as their customs were at various time, nearly always buried their dead.[1] When, towards the end of the XIIIth century, the custom was introduced of boiling the corpses of those who had died in foreign lands, in order to render them

1 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., Vol. IV, s. v., "Cremation."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more easily transportable, Pope Boniface VIII strictly forbade this abuse, which he styled abominable.[2] It remained for the Freemasons who gathered at Naples, in 1869, to promote cremation and make it part and parcel of their programme. Cremation is frequently practiced in missionary countries because of various difficulties. The Vicar Apostolic of Vizagapatam in Hindustan solicited an answer to the following question: When a dying pagan asks to be baptized, the missionary baptizes him without bothering himself whether the body may be cremated or interred, being convinced that his family would not heed the desire of the deceased, even if he insisted on burial. Is this allowable? The answer was that the missionary should not approve of cremation, but remain passive with regard to it, administer Baptism, and instruct the people.[3] Another pertinent decision is that rendered by the Holy Office[4] to the effect that it is forbidden to be enrolled in a lodge or society the purpose of which is to promote cremation without danger of incurring the censures laid upon Masonic societies; and that it is also forbidden to order one's own body or the bodies of others to be cremated. The decision exhorts Ordinaries to instruct the faithful regarding the abominable custom of cremating human bodies. Another decision concerns amputated limbs, legs or arms. The case was reported from a hospital in the U. S. The answer was that the amputated limbs of non-Catholics may be cremated, if the physician so advises, but those of Catholics should be buried, if possible, in consecrated

2 Cfr. c. 1, Extrav. Comm., III, 6, de sepulturis.

3 S. C. P. F., Sept. 27, 1884 (Coll., n. 1626). Instruction was necessary because cremation was considered a privilege of the caste (raiapont), which the pagans thought would be destroyed by the Catholic religion.

4 S. O., May 19, 1886 (Coll. P. F., n. 1657); cf. also S. O., July 27, 1892 (ibid., 1808).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ground; else, anywhere. If the physician orders cremation, the sisters shall prudently and silently obey his command. The advice is added that a small consecrated lot be kept in the garden adjoining the house for the purpose of burying amputated limbs of Catholics.[5]

ECCLESIASTICAL BURIAL

CAN. 1204

Sepultura ecclesiastica consistit in cadaveris translatione ad ecclesiam, exsequiis super illud in eadem celebratis, illius depositione in loco legitime deputato fidelibus defunctis condendis.

Ecclesiastical burial consists in bringing the body to the church, holding the funeral service over the same in the church, and entombing it in a place destined for the burial of departed Catholics.

The Christian funeral rite differed greatly from the pagan, as a passage from Minuctius Felix eloquently demonstrates. The rules laid down in our canon were observed conscientiously and religiously by the early Christians. They embalmed or enshrouded the body, accompanied the corpse with tapers or torches, singing psalms and hymns, bringing an oblation, (oblatio pro dormitione) and celebrating the love feast.[6] The whole ceremony breathed belief in the resurrection of the body. It is therefore not surprising to read of the insistence of the Roman Court upon the full funeral rite. The custom of burying the bodies of the faithful from their

5 S. O., Aug. 3, 1897 (ibid. n. 1975).

6 "Nec mortuos coronamus; nos exequies adornamus eadem tranquillitate, qua vivimus; nec adnectimus arescentem coronam, sed a Deo aeternis floribus vividam sustinemus;" cfr. Armellini, Lezioni di Archeologia Cristiana, 1898, p. 89 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

homes, without bringing them to church, is styled an abuse to be abolished.[7] Even in missionary countries, where superstitions are mingled with the Catholic rites, the Roman Ritual should be observed and funeral Mass be said praesente cadavere, if at all possible.[8] This service may also be held over human ashes or bones brought from foreign countries.[9] The Church does not abhor modern conveyances, and hence, no matter what means are used for carrying the dead to the cemetery, the pastor should accompany the funeral.[10]

Note well the three parts of a Christian funeral, viz.: transfer of the body to the church; funeral service in the church; interment in the graveyard. All three acts are accompanied by prayers.

The Roman Ritual[11] makes a distinction between the burial of adults and that of children.

The Code now proceeds to treat of cemeteries, of funeral services, and, lastly, of the refusal of ecclesiastical burial.

7 S. Rit. C., April 21, 1873 (n. 3291).

8 S. O., April 10, 1777, ad 2 (Coll. P. F., n. 521).

9 S. Rit. C., Aug. 11, 1883, ad I (n. 3693): provided, of course, no voluntary or self-ordered cremation took place.

10 S. Rit. C., July 15, 1876 (n. 3405).

11 Tit. VI, c. 3; c. 7.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

CEMETERIES

BLESSED CEMETERIES

CAN. 1205

§ 1. Cadavera fidelium sepelienda sunt in coemeterio quod, secundum ritus in probatis liturgicis libris traditos, sit benedictum, sive sollemni sive simplici benedictione ab iis data de quibus in can. 1155, 1156.

§ 2. In ecclesiis cadavera ne sepeliantur, nisi agatur de cadaveribus Episcoporum residentialium, Abbatum vel Praelatorum nullius in propria ecclesia sepeliendis vel Romani Pontificis, regalium personarum aut S. R. E. Cardinalium.

§ 1. The bodies of the faithful must be buried in a cemetery, which may be solemnly or simply blessed according to the ritual books. The solemn blessing, as contained in the Roman Pontifical, can be imparted only by the Ordinary of the diocese, according to can. 1155; the simple blessing may be imparted by the local Ordinary, if the cemetery belongs to the secular or non-exempt religious clergy. However, the bishop may delegate any priest[1] for this function. If the cemetery belongs to exempt religious, the major superior or his delegate is competent.[2]

1 Rit. Rom., tit. VIII, c. 29; can. 1156; S. Rit. C., Feb. 9, 1608 (n. 246).

2 Can. 1155.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

The necessity of burying the bodies of deceased Catholics in consecrated ground has been generally insisted upon, even for pagan provinces, where it was customary to bury infants, not in the family grave, but elsewhere.[3] In Mossul it was customary for Catholics as well as schismatics to be buried in one and the same family lot or vault. This custom was tolerated, as it could not be abolished without scandal.[4]

The cemetery must not be considered as blessed merely because the adjoining church was blessed. These two blessings are entirely different rites.[5] If the whole cemetery was blessed, it is not necessary that the single graves be blessed again, and therefore the benedicto tumuli under the rubric: " when they have reached the grave, the priest shall bless it if it is not already blessed," should be omitted.[6]

There is an apparent conflict between this and a decision of the same Congregation,[7] which orders all graves even in a cemetery already blessed to be blessed again if the grave is made of new material: quoties agitur de sepulcho ex nova materia confecto. The contradiction is only apparent. For the last-mentioned decision regards a new grave made in the shape of a crypt or vault of stone or cement which has been newly added to the cemetery. A simple grave (fossa) dug in the ground already blessed does not need to be reblessed.

§ 2. No bodies shall be entombed in churches except — if the civil laws permit it — the bodies of resident bish-

3 S. O., Feb. 20, 1801 (Coll. P. F., n. 649): this was done because of the belief that infants and unmarried persons had no one to mourn or reverence them.

4 S. O., April 13, 1896 (Coll. P. F., n. 1089).

5 S. Rit. C., Feb. 21, 1896 (n. 3888).

6 S. Rit. C., May 27, 1876, ad V (n. 3400).

7 S. Rit. C., Sept. 4, 1800, ad I (n. 3524).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ops and prelates or abbots nullius. These may be buried in their own church. The same privilege is accorded to the Roman Pontiff, royal personages and cardinals.

We said, "if the civil laws permit it," for it is a well-known fact that in Rome even Cardinals must be buried in the common city cemetery. Although this law is not in perfect keeping with the mind of the Church, yet it cannot be styled iniquitous as far as the mere prohibition of burial in churches is concerned, though in as far as it compels the promiscuous burial of baptized with non-baptized, and of criminals with distinguished prelates, it certainly is unjust and savors of intolerance. The first part of the law, to wit, forbidding burial in churches, would not be objected to by the ecclesiastical authorities, for, as will be seen from the following canon, the Code only demands free possession of cemeteries, whether situated inside or outside of church buildings. If a prelate mentioned in § 2, can. 1205, is buried in a church, his grave, though made in the middle of the choir, must be even with the floor and may not project over the altar of the confessio.[8] Besides, the distance of a meter from the altar must be observed, as prescribed in can. 1202, § 2.

RIGHTS OF THE CHURCH IN REGARD TO CEMETERIES

CAN. 1206

§ 1. Ius est catholicae Ecclesiae possidendi propria coemeteria.

§ 2. Sicubi hoc Ecclesiae ius violetur nec spes sit ut violatio reparetur, curent locorum Ordinarii ut coemeteria, societatis civilis propria, benedicantur, si, qui in eis condi solent, sint maiore ex parte catholici,

8 S. Rit. C., Feb. 20, 1627 (n. 433).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google aut saltem ut in eis catholici spatium habeant, idque benedictum, sibi reservatum.

§ 3. Si ne hoc quidem obtineri possit, toties quoties benedicantur, secundum ritus in probatis liturgicis libris traditos, singuli tumuli.

§ 1. The Catholic Church has the right to possess her own cemeteries.

§ 2. Where this right of the Church has been violated, and there is no hope of recovering it, the local Ordinaries shall take care that the civil cemeteries be blessed, provided the majority of the persons to be buried in them belong to the Catholic faith, or at least that Catholics be granted a separate space, which should be blessed.

§ 3. If not even that much can be obtained, then the single graves must be blessed according to the liturgical books.

§ 1 is nothing else but a corollary from the doctrine of the corporate nature of the universal Church and its autonomous parts. Besides the sacred character of the burial grounds, the right of possessing them exclusively and independently of any outside corporation or society should be guaranteed to the Church. This right is evident from the principle of canon law: "With those with whom we have had no communion when living, we do not communicate when dead."[9] This right, inherent as it is in her very constitution, the Church can exercise effectively only if she possesses her own burial grounds.

§ 2 and § 3 are taken from an authentic answer of the Holy Office,[10] necessitated by the tendencies of the so-called Liberal school. A further declaration says that in common cemeteries, destined for Catholics and non-

[9] C. 12, x, III, 28; Pius IX, "Nunquam certe," June 22, 1868.

[10] S. O., Feb. 12, 1862 (Coll. P. F., n. 1227).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Catholics alike, a separate plot with a separate entrance should be obtained for Catholic burials.[11]

In the United States the Church has so far been allowed to possess her own cemeteries. "Rights of burial under churches or in cemeteries are so far public that private interests in them are subject to the control of the public authorities having charge of police regulations."[12] This, of course, also implies expropriation in case of public utility or health. Otherwise no state or county or municipal authority shall interfere with the right of the Church in matters of cemeteries and burial.[13]

INTERDICT, VIOLATION, ETC., OF CEMETERIES

CAN. 1207

Quae de interdicto, violatione, reconciliatione ecclesiarum canones praescribunt, etiam coemeteriis applicentur.

The regulations of canon law concerning the interdict, the desecration and reconciliation of churches also apply to cemeteries. Hence we refer to can. 1172 ff. Note well can. 1172, § 2, in order not to apply the old canons. What is to be said on interdicts will find its place under the respective heading.

OWNERS OF CEMETERIES

CAN. 1208

§ 1. Paroeciae suum quaeque coemeterium habeant, nisi unum pluribus commune ab Ordinario loci sit legitime constitutum.

11 S. C. P. F., March 29, 1830 (ibid., n. 812).

12 Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, Ch. XVI, p. 439.

13 Ibid.: "While thus the right

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Religiosi exempti possunt habere coemeterium proprium, a communi coemeterio distinctum.

§ 3. Etiam aliis personis moralibus vel familiis privatis permitti potest ab Ordinario loci peculiare sepulcrum, extra commune coemeterium positum, et ad instar coemeterii benedictum.

§ 3. Etiam infantium corpuscula, quatenus commode fieri potest, speciales et separatos ab aliis loculos et sepulturas habeant.

§ 1. Each parish should have its own cemetery, unless the local Ordinary assigns a common cemetery to several parishes.

and duty of a cemetery owner to vacate it in a proper case is perfectly plain, his right to determine who may be buried in it is equally clear. Without such right, church societies might find their cemeteries interminable sources of trouble. Not only might the peace of the society be disturbed by the burial of a person objectionable to its members, but the society itself might thereby actually be disrupted. To prevent such a result religious organizations may not only establish cemeteries exclusively denominational, but may also guard and protect them by such rules and regulations as make effective the objects and purposes of their organization. These rules and regulations will enter into and become a part of every contract for a lot in such cemetery, unless the proof is clear and convincing that a contract of a different kind was properly made with the lot owner by a duly authorized agent of the organization. When a party applies for a burial plot at the office of a distinctly Roman Catholic cemetery, it is with the tacit understanding that he is either a Roman Catholic, and as such eligible to burial, or at least that he applies on behalf of those who are in communion with the Church. The entire business is transacted on that basis. It follows that the mere payment of fees and charges confers the privilege of burial only 'in the mode used and permitted by the corporation.' While, therefore, the trustees of a church society who hold a cemetery as a 'free' burial ground cannot prevent the burial of a church member beside her husband where there is space left for that purpose; a person who has separated himself from the society, or who according to its decision had ceased to be a member of it, is not entitled as a matter of right to be buried in such cemetery, though he had contributed to it while still a member. Nor may even a member of such organization bury his profligate son in such cemetery over the objection of the organization, nor be buried himself with ceremonies which are objectionable to it."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Exempt religious may have their own cemetery, distinct from the common cemetery of the faithful.

§ 3. The Ordinary of the diocese may permit other corporations and private families to have their own burial places separate from the common one and blessed like a cemetery.

CAN. 1209

§ 1. Tum in coemeteriis paroecialibus, ex licentia scripta Ordinarii loci eiusve delegati, tum in coemeterio alius personae moralis, ex licentia scripta Superioris, fideles sibi suisque exstruere possunt sepulcra particularia; quae, de consensu eiusdem Ordinarii aut Superioris, possunt quoque alienare.

§ 2. Sepulcra sacerdotum et clericorum, ubi fieri potest, a sepulcris laicorum separata sint ac decentiore loco sita; praeterea, ubi id commodum fuerit, alia pro sacerdotibus, alia pro inferioris ordinis Ecclesiae ministris parentur.

§ 1 permits lots or vaults (sepulchra particularia) to be constructed with the written consent of the local Ordinary or his delegate on the parish cemetery. The same written consent may be given by the superior, either local or major, of the corporation on whose cemetery such a private sepulchre is chosen by the faithful. These private sepulchres, or graves, or lots may, with the consent of the Ordinary or Superior, be alienated. Alienation is, of course, here to be understood of a conveyance for burial purposes.

If suspicion of simony should arise from the term alienation, it may be observed that this is only an apparent difficulty, easily removed. If a certain sum would be charged for the grave itself, by reason of its being consecrated ground, there would indeed be simony. However, here there is question only of the exclusive right of usufruct, which is reserved to a determined person or family with regard to a specified lot. The cemetery itself or any part thereof is not sold or leased. But the exclusive right to a determined and honorable place has a material value and its sale, therefore, does not imply simony.[14]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Priests and clerics should, if possible, have a special burial place, located in a more prominent part of the cemetery; the priests' lot should, if it can conveniently be done, be distinguished from that of the lower clerics.

§ 3. The burial place of infants should be separated from that of adults, as there is also a special rite for the burial of infants. Exempt religious, too, if they have plots for elective sepulture in their cemeteries, should set apart lots for the burial of children.[15]

KEEPING OF CEMETERIES

CAN. 1210

Quodlibet coemeterium sit undique apte clausum et caute custoditum.

CAN. 1211

Quodlibet coemeterium sit undique apte clausum et ad quos spectat, ne in coemeteriis epitaphia, laudationes funebres ornatusque monumentorum quidquam prae se ferant a catholica religione ac pietate absonum.

14 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 253 f.
15 S. Rit. C., Dec. 12, 1620 (n. 383).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1212

Praeter coemeterium benedictum alius, si haberi queat, sit locus, clausus item et custoditus, ubi ii humentur quibus sepultura ecclesiastica non conceditur.

Every cemetery shall be properly closed and carefully guarded.

The local Ordinaries, pastors and superiors, whom it concerns, shall take care that the inscriptions on the tombstones, eulogies, and adornments of the monuments be in keeping with Catholic faith and piety.

Besides the cemetery, or that part which is blessed, there should be a special plot, properly enclosed and guarded, to serve as burial-place for those who are denied ecclesiastical sepulture.

WAITING TIME

CAN. 1213

Nullum corpus sepeliatur, praesertim si mors repentina fuerit, nisi post congruum temporis intervallum, quod satis sit ad omnem prorsus de vero obitu dubitationem tollendam.

No body should be buried, especially in case of sudden death, until sufficient time has elapsed to disperse all doubt as to death having really set in. This admonition was originally given to missionaries,[16] probably for lack of civil provisions on the subject. For where civil laws and the coroner attend to this matter, this canon is superfluous. For the rest, the process of embalming, properly

16 S. O., April 10, 1777 (Coll. P. F., n. 321).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

performed, will obviate the danger of burying anyone alive.

EXHUMATION

CAN. 1214

§ 1. Nullum cadaver perpetuae sepulturae ecclesiasticae ubivis traditum exhumare licet, nisi de licentia Ordinarii.

§ 2. Ordinarius licentiam nunquam concedat, si cadaver ab aliis corporibus certo discerni nequeat.

§ 1. No body that has been laid to final rest by ecclesiastical burial, can be exhumed without the permission of the Ordinary.

§ 2. The Ordinary shall never grant this permission, if the corpse cannot with certainty be distinguished from other bodies.

This law is merely a corollary of the right of the Church to possess her own cemeteries. Difficulties may arise where the cemeteries belong to the municipality. Yet even there the Ordinary's permission is required, because a grave must be considered as sacred, since it has been blessed, and the Church is the quasi-custodian even of the bodies of the faithful.

In closing this chapter it may be well to note briefly what rights the civil government may claim with regard to cemeteries and the burial of Catholics.

It has the right (1) to confine cemeteries to a district lying outside of the community of the living; (2) to determine the order of the graves and their depth, and to empty the graves after a certain lapse of time; (3) to establish a certain interval between death and burial, and to postpone burial in case of sudden death or crime, so

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

as to ensure an autopsy; (4) to demand exhumation through the proper authority; (5) to ordain, through the proper authorities, that during epidemics, or the prevalence of contagious diseases, corpses be taken directly to the cemeteries.[17]

17 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 371.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

FUNERAL SERVICES AND INTERMENT

CONVEYING BODIES TO CHURCH

CAN. 1215

Nisi gravis causa obstet, cadavera fidelium, antequam tumulentur, transferenda sunt e loco in quo reperiuntur, in ecclesiam, ubi funus, idest totus ordo exsequiarum quae in probatis liturgicis libris describuntur, persolvatur.

Unless there is a weighty reason for the contrary, the bodies of the faithful must, before interment, be taken from the place where they are (place of death) to a church, where the entire funeral service prescribed by the sacred liturgy shall be held.

The clergy of Brescia, Italy, had some doubts as to the admissibility of the ecclesiastical rites when a corpse was conveyed from the house to the church and from there to the cemetery by a vehicle. But the S. Congregation decided that the manner of conveyance does not interfere with the sacred liturgy and that the clergy should accompany the funeral to the graveyard,[1] as the people desired.

The text says: nisi gravis causa obstet. Since the sacred rites involve a grievous obligation, only a real, not an imaginary, reason can dispense from their observance,

1 S. Rit. C., March 5, 1870 (n. 3212).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google though we do not wish to deny that a reasonable custom may be admitted, especially in large cities. It is more important to bring the body to church, than to accompany it to the grave-yard, provided the grave has been blessed.

PAROCHIAL RIGHTS IN REGARD TO BURIAL

CAN. 1216

§ 1. Ecclesia in quam cadaver pro funere transferri debet, ex iure ordinario est ecclesia propriae defuncti paroeciae, nisi defunctus aliam funeris ecclesiam legitime elegerit.

§ 2. Si defunctus plures habuerit paroecias proprias, ecclesia funeris est ecclesia paroeciae in cuius territorio decessit.

§ 1. By common law the corpse of a departed Catholic is to be brought to the parish church of the deceased, unless he lawfully chose another church before his death.

§ 2. If the deceased belonged to several parishes, the funeral should be held in the church of the parish within which he died.

When the claim of another church is doubtful, the right of the deceased's parish church must prevail.

The canon law formerly distinguished three reasons which entitled a priest to bury a deceased person: elective sepulture, the family grave, and the parish burial.[2] Our Code mentions but two: parish burial and elective sepulture. But can. 1218, § 3, and 1229 admit the ancestral right, although only in a subordinate way, as is evident from the very position in our canon, which vindicates the first, or at least general and ordinary right to the 2 Cfr. c. 1, x, III, 28; c. 3, 60, III, 12, where the sepulcrum maiorum occupies the first place, because, says the text, this was the custom of the patriarchs.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

parish church of which the deceased was a member during life. However, the right of choosing his own burial or last resting place is acknowledged and granted to everyone not excluded by law, as determnied by can. 1223–1226. Provided, then, that no special church was designated before death by the persons who are allowed to choose either for themselves or for others, the body must be brought to the parish church, i. e., the one to which the deceased belonged as a member when living, and of which he was a communicant.[3] This connection between church and parishioners is established by domicile or quasi-domicile, either being sufficient to render one a member of a parish. To linguistically distinguished parishes the same principle applies. The personal right of the parishioners prevails over territorial considerations.[4]

§ 2 of our canon provides for a case which may arise from the fact that one belongs to several parishes. Here a pertinent decision: A family had its domicile in the city and belonged to St. James' parish. The same family also had a summer villa in the parish of St. Mary, where the wife and mother lived every year for about eight months, and where she died, after having received the sacraments at the hands of St. Mary's pastor, and was buried by him. The S. Congregation decided that the pastor of St. Mary's was entitled to hold the funeral service and to receive the fee.[5] This decision was perfectly natural. One may have two domiciles or quasi-domiciles which suffice for contracting parish rights, and

3 Reiffenstuel (III, 28, n. 6) justly remarks: "ss. canones in ordine ad sepulturam non attendunt locum, ubi quis in extremis reficitur, sed ubi in vivis coelesti pabulo refici consuevit."

4 Pignatelli, Consultationes Canonicae, Vol. III, Cons. 48, n. 22.

5 S. C. C., March 12, 1881 (A. S. S., t. XIV, 209 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

servants, hired hands, soldiers, students, nurses, teachers, etc., may contract a quasi-domicile, although they retire to their homes several times each year, and have no intention of staying longer than necessary. If they reside anywhere continuously the greater part of the year this is sufficient to contract a quasi-domicile.[6]

CAN. 1217

In dubio de iure alius ecclesiae, ius propriae ecclesiae paroecialis semper praevalere debet.

In doubtful cases, says can. 1217, the right of one's own parish church prevails. The reason lies in the right of the pastor, which corresponds to his duty of administering the sacraments, and he should not be deprived of the honor and material advantage.[7] Therefore if either the fact or the right are doubtful, the deceased's own parish comes first. The fact is doubtful if it is uncertain where one died or was killed. The right is doubtful if membership in the one or the other parish cannot be clearly established, or the will of the deceased regarding sepulture cannot be proved.

TRANSFER TO ONE'S OWN CHURCH

CAN. 1218

§ 1. Licet mors acciderit extra propriam paroeciam, cadaver tamen in ecclesiam paroeciae propriae quae vicinior sit, ob funus transferendum est, si ad eam commode pedestri itinere asportari possit; secus in ecclesiam paroeciae in qua mors accidit.

§ 2. Ordinarii est pro suo territorio, inspectis pe-

6 A. S. S., l. c., p. 214.
7 Cfr. cc. 2, 3, 6, x, III, 12; c 2, § Verum ne, Clem. III, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

culiaribus circumstantiis, distantiam aliaque adiuncta designare, quae translationem cadaveris ad ecclesiam funeris aut locum sepulturae incommodam reddant; et si paroeciae ad diversas dioeceses pertineant, designatio attenditur Ordinarii dioecesis in qua defunctus supremum diem obiit.

§ 3. Licet translatio ad ecclesiam funeris aut ad locum sepulturae incommoda sit, semper tamen integrum est familiae, heredibus, aliisve quorum interest, cadaver illuc deferre, susceptis translationis expensis.

§ 1. Even though a person has died outside his own parish, the corpse must be brought for the funeral service to his own parish church, if it is the nearest, and the corpse can be conveniently carried there on foot (pedestri itinere); otherwise it is to be carried to the church of the parish in which the person died.

This section must be understood in the light of the old law, which exempted transportation to the parish church in case of danger.[8] Transport was by most canonists presumed to be dangerous when it took a day's journey. Others more reasonably held that the judgment regarding the existing danger must be left to the family of the deceased. In our country and day of automobiles and motor hearses this canon has little practical value. However, we believe that the term iter pedestre is here to be taken, not exclusively as the mode of conveyance, but as a conditional supposition, as if we should say: supposing or provided the funeral journey could be made on foot.[9]

§ 2 provides for a more practical mode of judging distance and inconvenience. The Ordinary may, after examining the special circumstances, determine — prefer-

8 C. 1, Extrav. Comm., III. 6.

9 In Rome the bodies of prisoners were brought on foot to the church; S. Rit. C., Jan. 15, 1667 (n. 1346).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ably at a synod and by means of diocesan statutes — when and under what conditions the transportation of the corpse to the church or place of burial is inconvenient. If the parishes belong to different dioceses, the decision lies with the bishop in whose diocese the person died. Supposing a man was accidentally killed in a parish of the Des Moines diocese, but belonged to a parish of the diocese of St. Joseph, if there were no one to defray the transportation expenses and to claim the body, we suppose the Ordinary of Des Moines would decide in favor of burial in that city — recto tramite.

§ 3 grants to the family of the deceased, his heirs, or other interested persons, the right of having the body conveyed to the church where the funeral services are to be held, or to the burial place. And this even if the transfer were quite inconvenient, provided the relatives or heirs are willing to pay the expenses.

BURIAL OF CARDINALS AND BISHOPS

CAN. 1219

§ 1. Si S. R. E. Cardinalis in Urbe decesserit, corpus transferendum est, funeris causa, in ecclesiam quam Romanus Pontifex designaverit; si extra Urbem, in ecclesiam insigniorem civitatis seu loci ubi mors accidit, nisi Cardinalis aliam elegerit.

§ 6. Defuncto Episcopo residentiali, etiam cardinalitia dignitate aucto, aut Abbate vel Praelato nullius, corpus, funeris causa, transferri debet in ecclesiam cathedralem, abbatialem vel praelatitiam, si id commode fieri possit; secus, in ecclesiam insigniorem civitatis seu loci, nisi in utroque defunctus aliam ecclesiam elegerit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. If a cardinal dies in the city (of Rome), his body is to be brought for the funeral service to the church which the Roman Pontiff may designate for that purpose; if he dies outside the city, the corpse must be carried to the more prominent church of the city or town where the cardinal died, unless he chose another.

§ 2. On the death of a residential bishop, even if he was a cardinal, or an abbot or prelate nullius, the body must be brought for the funeral service to the cathedral or abbatial or prelatial church, if this can be done conveniently; if not, to the more prominent church of the city or town, unless the prelate chose another.

FUNERAL OF BENEFICIARIES

CAN. 1220

Beneficiarii residentiales ad ecclesiam sui beneficii transferendi sunt, nisi aliam sibi elegerint ecclesiam funeris.

The bodies of resident beneficiaries must be brought to the church of their benefice, unless they have selected another church for their funeral.

The burial of cathedral and collegiate canons and other beneficiaries, provided they are really resident, is to take place from the church where they held a benefice. If they had their domicile or quasi-domicile in another parish [10] of the city or town, the stole fee must be given to the pastor of that parish.[11]

Concerning the canons of cathedral churches in Eng-

10 Resident does not imply that the canons and beneficiaries must reside at the cathedral or collegiate church, because this may not be a parish church.

11 S. C. C., May 12, 1685 (Richter, Trid., p. 462, n. 10); S. Rit. C., May 16, Dec. 18, 1756, ad 11 (n. 2441).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

land, the provincial council of Westminster (1852) decided nothing about their funeral; but since these are not really canonical prebends, as a decree of the S. C. P. F., April 21, 1852, clearly states,[12] it follows that the present canon cannot be applied to them. It has in view only beneficiaries in the strict sense.

FUNERALS OF RELIGIOUS

CAN. 1221

§ 1. Professi religiosi ac novitii, defuncti cum sint, transferendi sunt, funeris causa, ad ecclesiam vel oratorium suae domus vel saltem suae religionis, nisi novitii aliam ecclesiam ad suum funus elegerint; ius autem levandi cadaver et illud deducendi ad ecclesiam funerantem pertinet semper ad Superiorem religiosum.

§ 2. Si longe moriantur a domo, ita ut in ecclesiam suae domus vel saltem suae religionis nequeant commode asportari, funerandi sunt in ecclesia paroeciae ubi decedunt, nisi novitius aliam ecclesiam ad funus elegerit, et salvo Superioribus iure de quo in can. 1218, § 3.

§ 3. Quae de novitiis dicta §§ 1, 2, valent quoque de famulis actu servientibus et intra domus septa stabiliter commorantibus, qui tamen, si extra religiosam domum decesserint, funerandi sunt ad normam can. 1216–1218.

§ 1. The bodies of professed religious and novices must be brought for the funeral service to the church or oratory of their house, or at least to a church of their institute, unless the deceased was a novice and selected another church.

12 Coll. Lac., III, 956.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The right to remove the body and accompany it to the church belongs to the religious superior. Hence the pastor in whose parish a religious or novice died, even though the house or hospital be under the pastor's jurisdiction, is not entitled to interfere or claim compensation.[13]

Note that the Code simply says "religious," without drawing a distinction between exempt and non-exempt. Not intended are those that are not religious in the sense of the Code.[14]

§ 2. If a professed religious or novice dies in a place so far distant from his religious house that the body cannot conveniently be conveyed to a church of his own house, or order, or congregation, he must be buried where he died, unless a novice has chosen another church for the funeral service. Here again distance is mentioned without further determination. According to canonists,[15] "distance" is one day's journey. But this term must be taken in a relative sense; expenses, means of transportation, and the condition of the corpse must be duly considered. If the corpse cannot be conveniently transported, it must be buried where death occurred and religious have no right to choose the burial place.[16] Novices, however, may choose.

Our canon refers to can. 1218, § 3, which permits the family to remove the body wherever they please, provided they defray the expenses. This right is here vindicated to the superior, either local or higher. If he should choose to have the body transferred from the place of 13 Cfr. c. 16, x, V, 31; c. 5, 6°, III, 12; S. C. EE. et RR., July 21, 1848 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 563 f).

14 Can. 673; unless of course they enjoy a special privilege to that effect.

15 Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Sepultura," n. 41.

16 Formerly the choice was not denied; c. 5, 6°, III, 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google death to a church of his institute, he may do so without consulting or excusing himself to the pastor in whose parish the religious died.[17]

The pastor, even though he may have administered the last Sacraments to the deceased religious, is not entitled to any stole fees.[18]

Religious superiors are not exempt from this law, i. e., they are not allowed to choose their own burial place,[19] but are to be treated just like ordinary religious.

§ 3. What has been established concerning novices also applies to servants actually employed by religious and living permanently within the premises of a religious house (farm hands, janitors, mechanics, teachers, etc.). To enjoy the privilege here granted they must be actually serving the religious and live within the precincts of the convent or religious house.[20] If they boarded outside, the second condition would be lacking; if they worked without being hired or employed, the former condition would not be verified.[21] If they die outside the religious house the privilege ceases.

GUESTS AND STUDENTS OF RELIGIOUS

CAN. 1222

Quod attinet ad defunctos qui in domo etiam regulari vel collegio degebant ratione hospitii, educationis vel infirmitatis, et ad defunctos in hospitali, standum est canonibus 1216–1218, nisi constet de iure particu-

17 S. C. C., June 10, 1620, ad 10; Ferraris, l. c., n. 35 f.

18 S. C. EE. et RR., May 22, 1615; Ferraris, ibid.; however, compensation would not be against either the letter or the spirit of the law.

19 Cfr. can. 1224, 2°.

20 Cfr. Trid., Sess. 24, c. 11; Sess. 25, c. 11, de rég.: "subque eorum obedientia vivunt."

21 S. C. EE. et RR., July 21, 1848 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 563 ff.) Cfr. Vol. III, p. 142 f. of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lari aut privilegio; quod vero ad illos attinet qui in Seminario moriuntur, servetur praescriptum can. 1368.

Guests, students or sick persons who have lived in a religious house, even though this belong to regulars, or in a college, and die there, as well as those who die in a hospital, are to be buried like other secular persons, i. e., according to can. 1216–1218, unless a particular law or privilege exempts them from the common law.

Seminarians are to be buried by the authorities of the seminary, unless the Holy See has ruled otherwise with regard to certain seminaries.

The favor granted these persons by virtue ot can. 514 may not be extended to the funeral service, as the S. Congregations have constantly decided.[22] Of course, these persons are allowed to choose burial in the church of religious, provided this church is capable of being selected (can. 1125) and the person free to choose. But in that case the stole fees belong to the parish priest who would otherwise be entitled to perform the burial.[23]

The text admits exemption by reason of a particular law or privilege. A particular law would be one issued according to can. 464, § 2, viz.: when the Ordinary exempts a religious family from the parish organization. The Barnabites were granted a privilege permitting their guests and all those who died suddenly in their houses or colleges to be buried by these religious.[24]

Our text requires that the privilege must be certain or evident (nisi constet de privilegio). All religious, therefore, who can claim neither a particular law nor a privi-

22 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 1674; Dec. 14, 1753 (Bizzarri, l. c., pp. 271 f; 379), S. C. C., April 21, 1742 (Richter, Trid., p. 462, n. 13).

23 S. C. C., l. c.

24 Greg. XV, 1621, apud Bizzarri, l. c., p. 564.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lege, must permit the pastor in whose parish their house is situated, to perform the funeral service.[25]

SELECTION OF SEPULTURE

CAN. 1223

§ 1. Omnibus licet, nisi expresse iure prohibeantur, eligere ecclesiam sui funeris aut coemeterium sepulturae.

§ 2. Uxor et filii puberes in hac electione prorsus immunes sunt a maritali vel patria potestate.

CAN. 1224

Ecclesiam funeris aut sepulturae coemeterium eligere prohibentur:

1.° Impuberes; verum pro filio aut filia impubere, etiam post eorum mortem, hanc electionem facere possunt parentes vel tutor;

2.° Religiosi professi cuiuslibet gradus aut dignitatis, non tamen si sint Episcopi.

Canon 1223 ordains (§ 1) that all may freely choose their funeral church or burial place, unless they are expressly forbidden to do so by law. Those forbidden are boys who have not yet completed the fourteenth and girls who have not yet completed the twelfth year.[26] In their stead, even after their death, the parents or guardians may make the choice. Whether the mother alone may do so, was not quite certain hitherto, because a Constitution of Innocent X seems to debar her if there is no local custom in her favor.[27] Our text leaves no doubt that 25 S. C. C., April 21, 1742 (Richter, l. c., nn. 4, 13).

26 See can. 88, § 2.

27 "Ex injuncto," Nov. 16, 1645 (Richter, l. c., p. 461, n. 6).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mothers, too, may choose burial church and burial place for their children.

If the parents have a family lot, the children should be buried there, otherwise, if no contrary choice is made, they are to be buried from the parish church and in the parish cemetery.[28]

According to § 2, can. 1223, the wife as well as boys and girls who have completed the age of fourteen or twelve, respectively, are free to make their choice, and are not hampered in this matter by marital or parental power.[29] If this be true, we cannot see, as stated above, why the mother should be debarred from choosing, provided, of course, the father eithers consents, or is dead, or does not care. Guardians, too, are admitted.

Professed religious of whatever rank or dignity, except bishops, are deprived of the right of choosing their funeral church or burial place. The reason is that religious have no power either to "velle" or "nolle."[30] Cardinals who are religious enjoy the right here denied by virtue of can. 1219, bishops, by virtue of can. 1224. As the text speaks of bishops in general, all, resident and titular, are included.

CAN. 1225

Ut electio ecclesiae funeris valeat, cadat necesse est vel in ecclesiam paroecialem, vel in ecclesiam regularium, non tamen monialium (nisi agatur de mulieribus quae famulatus, educationis, infirmitatis aut hospitii causa intra clausuram eiusdem monasterii non precario commorabantur), vel in ecclesiam iuris pa-

28 S. C. C., Nov. 16, 1645; Feb. 22, 1646 (Richter, l. c., n. 2 f.)

29 S. C. EE. et RR., June 8, 1731 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 343); Many, l. c., p. 267 f.

30 C. 5, 6°, III, 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tronatus, si agatur de patrono, vel in aliam ecclesiam funerandi iure praeditam.

Can. 1225 determines which churches may be chosen for funeral services. They are parish churches and churches of regulars, churches of advowson in favor of the advowee, and any other church endowed with the ius funerandi.

The first class, i. e., parish churches, were the exclusive possessors of this right before the thirteenth century, except where the Popes had granted a special privilege.[31]

The Friars Preachers and the Friars Minor obtained such a privilege, and it was extended to all regulars by way of communication.[32] Now it has ceased to be a mere privilege but is common law. However, this law favors only churches of regulars to the exclusion of other religious, even though exempt.

The third class consists of churches which are subject to the ius patronatus, but only in favor of the patron or advowee.

There is a fourth class consisting of such churches as are expressly endowed with the ius funerandi.

The Code distinguishes between a church for funeral services and a cemetery for sepulture. The two are not identical. Ius funerandi, sometimes called jus sepeliendi, or tumulandi, here means strictly the right to funeral services, without the burial place. This is apparent from the fact that the church is called ecclesia funeris, i. e., the church where the funeral service takes place.

Which churches have the ius funerandi besides those mentioned in the text? Note two facts: (1) The burial right is a strictly parochial right, and (2) all eccle-

31 Cfr. c. 3, X, III, 28; c. 3, 6°, III, 12.
32 Cfr. c. 2, Clem. III, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

siastical functions may be held in all public oratories and also in semi-public oratories, unless excepted by the Ordinary.[33] The funeral service is an ecclesiastical function. Hence, unless the Ordinary forbids this function to take place in semi-public oratories, funeral services may be held there as well as in public oratories. This does not interfere with strictly parochial rights because, as will be seen under can. 1230, § 4, these rights are safeguarded by law.

Churches of nuns (monialium) may not be used to hold funeral services for outsiders. This was the traditional practice of the Roman Court.[34] However, female[35] servants, women who lived habitually within the enclosure of the convent for the sake of study, or because of sickness, or as guests, may have their funeral services performed in the nuns' church. Moniales must here be taken in the strict sense, excluding female religious with simple vows only. This distinction is clearly based on the nature of enclosure. Hence the many decisions against the permissibility of funeral services and burial in such churches. If anyone is buried in such a church, the stole fees belong to the parish church.[36]

Here may be added a decision concerning confraternities in churches of regulars. The members of these pious societies must be buried from the parish church, unless they have lawfully chosen the church of the regulars for burial.[37] Neither are tertiaries or oblates to be buried from the church of the respective religious order, but 33 Cfr. can. 462, 5°; can. 1191, § 2; can. 1193.

34 Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Sepultura," n. 137; Many, l. c., p. 301 f.

35 Male servants are to be buried from the parish church; S. C. C., Jan. 21, 1723, et pluries (Richter, Trid., p. 462, n. 14).

36 S. C. C., Nov. 28, 1711; July 28, 1731 (Richter, l. c., nn. 18 f.).

37 Innocent X, "Ex injuncto," Feb. 22, 1645 (Richter, l. c., n. 16); S. C. EE. et RR., March 13, 1744, ad 8 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 364).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google their funeral services must be held in the parish church, unless they have chosen another, i. e., the church of the regulars.[38]

CAN. 1226

§ 1. Ecclesiam funeris aut coemeterium sepulturae quis eligere potest per se vel per alium cui legitimum mandatum dederit; factamque electionem aut mandati concessionem quolibet legitimo modo probare licet.

§ 2. Si electio fiat per alium, hic suum mandatum explere potest etiam post mortem mandantis.

Can. 1226 determines the manner in which the choice of a funeral church or cemetery may be made, and how it is to be proved. One may do this personally or through another commissioned for that purpose. This choice is similar to a last will.[39] Hence § 2 states that the mandatarius may carry out the mandate either before or after the death of the mandans or person who has made the commission. Of course the mandatarius must abide by the wording of the disposition.

The second clause of § 1 says that the choice made, and the fact of commission, may be proved in legal form. Thus the form which is required for a last will, in the presence of two witnesses and a notary public, would certainly be sufficient.[40] Even two witnesses without a notary public, provided they testify under oath before the parish priest, are admissible.[41] In case the person should be speechless, signs and nods which indicate his desire shall not be rejected.[42] Even the pastor's testimony, if it is not in his own favor, is admissible. The Ordinary or

38 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 11, 1615 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 245).

39 C. 13, x, III, 26.

40 S. C. C., Feb. 13, 1666; April 24, 1723; July 4, 1722 (Richter, p. 461, n. 8).

41 S. C. C., Dec. 19, 1739 (ibid., n. 9).

42 S. C. C., Feb. 13, 1666, ad II (l. c.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the pastor may, if they wish, demand a document or proof of the choice made before burial takes place.[43] Synodal acts may more closely determine the requisites of proof, but if they contravene this canon, they have no force. Thus the S. Congregation sustained a choice made by a woman before her confessor, her father, and another witness, though the synodal law required the presence of the pastor, and the father of the woman was dead at the time of the trial.[44]

CAN. 1227

Religiosi et clerici saeculares districte vetantur ne quos ad vovendum, iurandum vel fide interposita seu aliter promittendum inducant ut apud ipsorum ecclesias funus aut apud ipsorum coemeterium sepulturam eligant, vel factam electionem non immutent; quod si contra factum fuerit, electio aut immutatio sit nulla.

Can. 1227 strictly forbids all clergymen, whether secular or religious, to induce any person to choose a particular church for funeral service or cemetery for burial, or to change his choice. If such an inducement was made, the choice is null and void. Note, however, that this influence or persuasion must be brought to bear on the person by vow or oath, by pledging his word of honor, or by simple promise. Our text is taken substantially from the Decretals and contains only one penalty, to wit, the nullity of the promise.[45] It may also be noticed that only clergymen are mentioned. This is done in order to procure the necessary liberty to laymen and to prevent jealousy and dissension among the clergy.

43 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 19, 1732, ad 2 (Bizzarri, p. 344 f.).

44 S. C. EE. et RR., Feb. 6, 1852 (ibid., p. 602 f.).

45 C. 1, 6°, III, 12; C. 3, Clem. V, 8: also interdict and excommunication.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1228

§ 1. Si electa fuerit sepultura in coemeterio diverso a coemeterio propriae defuncti paroeciae, cadaver in illo sepeliatur, dummodo nihil obstet ex parte eorum a quibus coemeterium pendet.

§ 2. Electa sepultura in coemeterio religiosorum, ut cadaver inibi sepeliri queat, requiritur et sufficit consensus Superioris religiosi, ad normam constitutionum cuiusque religionis.

Can. 1228 repeats in a somewhat different form the enactment of Boniface VIII, mentioned above, concerning the incineration or boiling of bodies.[46] The text merely says that the body must be buried in the cemetery chosen by the person, even though it be different from the cemetery of the parish to which the deceased belonged. However, the authorities of the cemetery chosen by the deceased must give their, at least negative, consent. If the cemetery thus specially selected belongs to religious, the consent of the respective superior is required and suffices. The superior is the one whom the constitution of the religious point out as competent for giving the consent. If the constitutions contain nothing to the contrary, or no enactment at all on this subject, the local superior is certainly competent.

ANCESTRAL TOMBS

CAN. 1229

§ 1. Si quis, sepulcrum maiorum in aliquo coemeterio possidens, non electa alibi sepultura, decesserit, in eodem sepeliendus est, si illuc commode asportari possit, salvo praescripto can. 1218, § 3.

46 C. 1, Extrav. Comm., III, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Pro uxore attenditur sepulcrum viri, et, si plures habuerit, sepulcrum ultimi.

§ 3. Plura si sint maiorum aut viri sepulcra, defuncti familia aut heredes sepulturae deligant.

§ 1. If a person who has an ancestral tomb or grave in some cemetery dies without having chosen a burial place somewhere else, the body, if it can be conveniently transferred, must be buried there. The same holds good if his family, heirs or friends insist upon burial in the ancestral grave, and defray the expenses.

§ 2. A wife is to be buried in the ancestral tomb of her husband; and, if she had several husbands, in the ancestral tomb of her last husband,—always provided, of course, that she had not chosen another burial place.

§ 3. If there are several ancestral tombs or family tombs, the family or heirs of the deceased may choose his burial place. In Europe there used to be different ancestral graves or tombs: strictly family plots, where only members of the family were buried; hereditary tombs, in which only heirs were buried, and mixed tombs for both members of the family and heirs.[47] Our text allows the family to choose between these different kinds of tombs where they exist. The right to be buried in the ancestral tomb also belongs to infants and children.[48] Hence can. 1209 cannot be urged in this case.

DUTIES AND RIGHTS OF PASTORS IN REGARD TO BURIALS

CAN. 1230

§ 1. Proprius defuncti parochus non solum ius sed etiam officium habet, excepto gravi necessitatis casu,

47 Many, l. c.

48 S. C. C., Oct. 21, 1613 (Richter, p. 461, n. 1).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

levandi per se vel per alium cadaver, illud comitandi ad suam ecclesiam paroecialem ibique exsequias persolvendi, firmo praescripto can. 1216, § 2.

§ 2. Quod si mors acciderit in loco alienae paroeciae, et cadaver ad ecclesiam propriae paroeciae commode asportari possit, parochi proprii est, praemonito parocho loci, illud levare, comitari ad suam ecclesiam ibique exsequias peragere.

§ 3. Si ecclesia funeris sit ecclesia regularis aliave exempta a iurisdictione parochi, parochus, sub cruce ecclesiae funerantis, cadaver levat ac deducit ad ecclesiam; sed exsequias rector ecclesiae celebrat.

§ 4. Si vero ecclesia funeris non sit exempta a iurisdictione parochi, celebratio exsequiarum, salvo peculiari privilegio, pertinet non ad rectorem ecclesiae funerantis, sed ad parochum in cuius territorio ecclesia sita est, dummodo defunctus parocho subiectus fuerit.

§ 5. Religiosas et novitias, in religiosa domo defunctas, ad clausurae limen deferant aliae religiosae; indeque, si de religiosis agatur iurisdictioni parochi non obnoxiis, ad propriam religiosae domus ecclesiam vel oratorium deducit et exsequias peragit cappellanus; si de aliis religiosis, valet praescriptum § 1; quod vero ad religiosas attinet extra domum defunctas, serventur generalia canonum praescripta.

§ 6. Defuncto S. R. E. Cardinali aut Episcopo extra Urbem in civitate episcopali, servetur praescriptum can. 397, n. 3.

§ 7. Si cadaver mittatur ad locum ubi nec defunctus propriam paroeciam habebat, nec ecclesia funeris legitime fuerat electa, ius levandi cadaver, peragendi exsequias, si peragendae sint, et cadaver ad sepulturam deducendi, pertinet ad ecclesiam cathedralem eiusdem loci; quae si desit, ad ecclesiam paroeciae in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

qua coemeterium situm est, nisi aliud ferant loci consuetudo aut dioecesana statuta.

§ 1. The pastor of a deceased Catholic is entitled and obliged, unless excused by grave necessity, to go himself or send a delegate (assistant priest, curate) to the house to receive the body (levare corpus),[49] accompany it to the parish church, and there to hold the exequies, with due regard to can. 1216, § 2. Needless to say, this is not customary in our country, where distance often renders it impossible to comply with this ruling. Therefore the law most reasonably adds: excepto gravi necessitatis casu.

§ 2. If a person has died in a strange parish, and the body can be conveniently brought to his own parish, the pastor has the right and duty to perform the ceremonies described in § 1, after previously informing the pastor of the parish where the person died. Thus, for instance, if a person dies in a hospital or asylum located in a strange parish, his or her pastor is entitled and obliged to perform the sacred rites, unless, of course, the hospital or asylum enjoys exemption from the jurisdiction of the pastor.[50]

§ 3 draws a distinction between exempt and non-exempt churches. In exempt churches the parochus proprius may take up the body and accompany it to the exempt church; but the cross behind which the funeral procession marches must be that of the exempt church, and the rector of the latter is entitled to hold the funeral service. It required a great many decisions to make this rule clear. If a church in charge of regulars was chosen for the funeral service, the regulars had to invite the pastor or chapter, and even accompany them to the [49] Levare corpus properly means to raise or take up the body (compare: levare e sacro fonte), and is used for the first funeral act performed by sprinkling the coffin with Holy Water.

[50] S. C. C., June 22, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., XV, 284 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

church. But if the pastor or chapter made the fathers wait more than an hour, they could go to the house of the deceased and conduct the funeral. The pastor or chapter were allowed to sprinkle the body, but not to intone any antiphon or psalm, etc. In fact they had to remain outside the church whilst the exequies were performed.[51] This last-mentioned ruling might reasonably be revoked.

§ 4. In non-exempt churches the celebration of the funeral service belongs to the pastor in whose parish the church selected for the funeral is located, provided the deceased was a subject of his. Therefore the rector or chaplain of the church in which the exequies are held must make way for the parochus proprius of the deceased. If the latter refuses to perform the services the rector or chaplain of the ecclesia funerans may hold them.[52] Thus, if a member of a confraternity which has a public oratory within the limits of a parish dies, the pastor of the parish is entitled to hold the funeral services in such public oratory, provided the deceased was his parishioner.[53] If the deceased was not a parishioner of the parish within the boundaries of which the ecclesia funerans is situated, the chaplain of the confraternity may perform the funeral rites.[54] If the public oratory is situated within the limits of a collegiate or cathedral parish, the pastor, and not the first dignitary of the collegiate or cathedral church, is entitled to perform the services, unless the chaplain enjoys this right.[55] This may be by 51 S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 22, 1670; Sept. 23, 1735; April, 1717 (Bizzarri, l. c., pp. 263, 346 f., 304).

52 S. Rit. C., Dec. 22, 1629 (n. 523).

53 S. Rit. C., Jan. 12, 1704, ad 20 (n. 2123).

54 S. Rit. C., July 9, 1718, ad 4; May 13, 1719, ad 7 (nn. 2251, 2263).

55 S. Rit. C., Sept. 13, 1670, ad 1 (n. 1409).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google reason of exemption, or by a special privilege which is sometimes given, especially to arch-confraternities.

§ 5 treats of the burial of female religious and their novices. If they die in their religious house, their bodies must be brought to the threshold of the enclosure, whence the chaplain conducts the funeral procession to the church or oratory, where he holds the exequies. But the chaplain is entitled to this privilege only if the religious are exempt from the jurisdiction of the pastor. If they are subject to the pastor in whose parish the religious house is located, the latter is obliged and entitled to conduct the funeral.

If sisters or novices die outside their religious house, the common law takes effect. Canons appear to have taken a particular interest in the funeral of moniales, since the decisions, the substance of which is embodied in our text, chiefly regard them. The confessor or chaplain of nuns (with solemn vows) has the exclusive right of accompanying the corpse from the threshold of the enclosure into the outer church, to hold the funeral service there, and then to accompany the body to the grave-yard. If it is a custom of long standing that canons or other priests are invited, they may continue to observe the custom, but without prejudice to the confessor or chaplain, who, on his part, should beware not to enter the papal enclosure under pretext of a funeral service.[56]

This, then, is the rule for all nuns or moniales, no matter whether they are subject immediately to the Holy See or to the bishops or prelates regular.[57] The local Ordinary, according to can. 464, § 2, may exempt certain religious communities from the pastor's jurisdiction and place

[56] S. C. EE. et RR., May 30, 1856; Sept. 17, 1858 (Bizzarri, l. c., pp. 648, 657); S. Rit. C., April 20, 1641; May 10, 1805 (nn. 751, 2559).

[57] S. C. C., Feb. 24, 1872 (A. S. S., VII, 161 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

them directly under a chaplain appointed by him.[58] However, it must be plainly understood and maintained that the mere appointment of a chaplain does not derogate from the rights of the pastor in the matter of burial. And this is true of every non-exempt religious institute of women, no matter whether approved by the Holy See or by the Ordinary only.[59] The consequence is that unless the Ordinary formally exempts a religious community of women, or of men, which belongs to the class of non-clerical congregations, the pastor's rights in the matter of burial must be sustained.

The last clause of § 5, can. 1230, states that concerning female religious who die outside their religious house the common law must be observed. What is the common law on this point? No doubt that part of the present title which affects secular persons, otherwise the text would simply have referred to can. 1221, treating of male religious. Therefore the pastor's rights are here still more evidently safeguarded. But the question may not be useless, whether such female religious are allowed to choose their burial places. This, we believe, must be denied, for the reason that they do not have their own will. But the parish church or parish cemetery as well as the ancestral tomb may safely be vindicated for them. For the rest, a religious community may claim the right granted by can. 1218, § 3.

Here it may be permitted to add a note which might have been placed under can. 1221, but also fits here. If a religious who has been pastor or teacher for years, were buried in the place of his activity, we believe it would not be reprimanded by the lawgiver, because "convenient conveyance" might suffer on account of discontent on the 58 Cfr. can. 514, § 3, 4.

59 Leo XIII, "Conditae," Dec. 8, 1900, II, n. 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google part of the people. Piety also has its claims, provided, of course, that the distance between the religious house and the deceased person's last residence amounts to a good many miles, and the superior's permission is obtained.

§ 6. When a cardinal or bishop dies outside the city of Rome, in his episcopal city, the cathedral canons shall provide an appropriate funeral service and burial.[60] Note that any cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, whether he was bishop of the city or diocese in which he lived, or not, is entitled to this honor.

§ 7. If a corpse is sent to a place where the deceased person neither had parish rights nor had chosen a burial place, the conduct of the funeral belongs to the cathedral church of that place; — supposing, of course, the body was shipped to the episcopal city; for if the corpse is sent to another city, the clergy of the parish in which the cemetery is located must attend to the funeral, unless custom or diocesan statutes decide otherwise.

BURIAL

CAN. 1231

§ 1. Expletis in ecclesia exsequiis, cadaver tumulandum est ad normam librorum liturgicorum in coemeterio ecclesiae funeris, salvis praescriptis can. 1228, 1229.

§ 2. Qui exsequias in ecclesia peregit, non solum ius, sed etiam officium habet, excepto gravi necessitatis casu, comitandi per se vel per alium sacerdotem cadaver ad locum sepulturae.

After the exequies held in church, the body must be buried in the cemetery of the church in which the service

60 Can. 397, n. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was held, unless the burial in another cemetery or the ancestral tomb was chosen by the deceased. The officiating priest or his substitute is entitled and obliged to accompany the casket to the grave-yard. The bishop cannot issue synodal acts or diocesan statutes forbidding the officiating clergy to accompany the funeral procession. Nor may the cemetery chaplain take care of all the bodies that are brought to the cemetery. The clergy should not discriminate between rich and poor, but accompany all alike, no matter what the distance,[61] provided, of course, the cemetery belongs to the parish. Exception is made in cases of grave necessity. Such a necessity would be physical indisposition of the clergyman or perhaps a long-standing tradition against accompanying funeral processions, based on the fact that they gave rise to disturbances. If the clergy does go to the grave-yard, surplice and stole, or at least the stole, should be made use of.[62]

We may add that religious who have lost their convent by suppression, but continue to officiate in their former church, have the right of performing the funeral service and conducting corpses to the grave.[63]

FUNERAL PROCESSIONS

CAN. 1232

§ 1. Sacerdos qui cadaver comitetur ad ecclesiam funeris vel ad locum sepulturae, libere transire poterit, cum stola quoque et cruce elevata, per territorium

61 S. C. C., Jan. 26, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., XV, 12 ff.).

62 S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1884, ad II (n. 3619) mentions stole and surplice, but S. Rit. C., April 23, 1895, ad II (n. 3854), only refers to the stole; the latter custom is therefore admissible.

63 S. C. EE. et RR., May 7, Sept. 17, 1880 (A. S. S., XIII, 409 ff.); S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1884 (n. 3619).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

alius paroeciae vel dioecesis, etiam sine parochi vel Ordinarii licentia.

§ 2. Si cadaver tumulandum sit in coemeterio ad quod commode asportari nequeat, parochus vel rector ecclesiae funeris nequit sibi vindicare ius illud comitandi extra fines civitatis vel loci.

§ 1. The priest who conducts a body to the funeral church or the grave-yard is entitled to pass with stole and raised cross through a strange parish or diocese, without the permission of either pastor or Ordinary. The term "cruce elevata" is chosen in order to do away with the presumption that when passing through strange territory, the cross had to be lowered, to show subordination or at least tacit acknowledgment of the jurisdiction of the pastor through whose district the procession wended its way. This right belongs also to regulars when they conduct a funeral through strange territory.[64] The pastor has the same right, even when the cathedral chapter is present. If the funeral procession has to pass through strange territory, the shortest route should be taken,[65] in order not to provoke others or "make a show."

§ 2. The right of accompanying the body outside the city or town limits cannot be claimed in case the corpse is to be buried in a cemetery to which it cannot conveniently be transported, for in that case the whole funeral procession might easily turn into a farce.

MOURNERS AND EMBLEMS

CAN. 1233

§ 1. Nequit parochus, sine iusta et gravi causa ab

64 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 24, 1713 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 301); Sept. 17, 1880 (A. S. S., XIII, 410).

65 S. Rit. C., April 23, 1895 (n. 3854).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ordinario probata, excludere clericos saeculares, religiosos ac pia sodalitia quae familia vel heredes advocare velint ad deducendum cadaver ad ecclesiam funeris et ad sepulturam, et assistendum funeri; clerici tamen ipsi ecclesiae addicti a familia vel heredibus prae aliis omnibus invitari debent.

§ 2. Nunquam admittantur societates vel insignia religioni catholicae manifeste hostilia.

§ 3. Associantes cadaver tenentur morem gerere parocho circa ductum funeris, salvis uniuscuiusque praecedentiae iuribus.

§ 4. Laici cadaver, generis aut dignitatis cuiusvis ille fuerit, clerici ne deferant.

§ 1. Except for a weighty and just reason approved by the Ordinary, the pastor has no right to prevent secular or religious clerics, or pious societies whom the family or the heirs wish to invite, from accompanying the body to the church and grave-yard and assisting at the funeral. But the clergy of the respective church should be invited above all others by the family of the deceased or his heirs.

Confraternities and regulars, in particular the Friars Minor, had often to recur to the Roman Court to defend the right enunciated in our text. The pastor must consult the Ordinary to judge whether reasons for non-compliance are just and weighty. But the Ordinary has no right to issue synodal decrees forbidding either confraternities or regulars to accompany the funeral procession, if (at least implicitly) invited by the family of the deceased.[66] Even if the cathedral chapter should not have been invited, the members of a confraternity may be 66 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 24, 1713; May 13, 1744 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 307, 363), S. Rit. C., Aug. 18, 1629; April 22, 1633; Jan. 14, 1640; Dec. 7, 1641 (nn. 516, 604, 696, 784).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

called and assist.[67] The invitation to regulars or members of a fraternity may be issued by the family or heirs without the pastor's knowledge.[68] No definite or proportionate number of regulars, seculars and confraternity members is prescribed.[69] Nor is it required that the secular clergy should be invited before the regulars.[70] When the regulars are called by the family to accompany a funeral which is to take place in the cathedral church, they are allowed to enter it.[71] These are the most important decisions rendered in this matter. A timely admonition is that of the last clause of our section to show respect to one's own clergy.

§ 2. No societies or emblems manifestly inimical to the Catholic religion are to be admitted. Concerning the emblems of Masonic lodges — for these are here chiefly intended — the Holy Office has decided as follows: Ecclesiastical sepulture may be given only to such members of a condemned sect as have received the sacraments and have not, after receiving them, demanded to be buried with or under these insignia, or have formally retracted their desire. If such emblems are placed on the coffin against the will of the deceased, they must be removed before the funeral starts (ante associationem cadaveris).[72] The same rule applies to banners or standards.

§ 3. Those who accompany the funeral must obey the orders of the pastor concerning the arrangement of the funeral cortège, with due regard, of course, to the rights

67 S. Rit. C., June 8, 1630 (n. 533).

68 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 10, 1729 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 340).

69 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 24, 1713; May 13, 1744 (Bizzarri, l. c., pp. 301, 363).

70 S. Rit. C., Nov. 22, 1643 (n. 852).

71 S. C. EE. et RR., April 13, 1723 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 313).

72 S. O., Dec. 2, 1840; July 5, 1878 (Coll. P. F., nn. 915, 1495).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of precedence. The pastor may decide in which direction or through which streets the funeral procession should march.[73] Concerning regulars and members of confraternities, it has often been decided that they should not join the funeral procession at some corner, but should meet at the church and join the rest of the clergy and march together with them.[74]

As to precedence, the general rule is that the pastor "precedes," i. e., takes the last place in the procession.[75] However, if the cathedral chapter or, where custom admits, the collegiate chapter assists in a body, it marches behind the pastor. In that case the first dignitary of the chapter should wear stole and cope, whilst the pastor wears only the stole (and surplice).[76] With regard to the rest of the clergy, secular and religious, the general rules of precedence, as laid down and explained under can. 106 and 491, must be observed.

§ 4. Clerics shall never act as pall-bearers for a defunct layman, no matter what his rank or dignity may have been. The reason is because the clerical dignity transcends every secular rank and degree.

FUNERAL FEES

CAN. 1234

§ 1. Locorum Ordinarii indicem funeralium taxarum seu eleemosynarum, si non exsistat, pro suo territorio, de consilio Capituli cathedralis, ac, si opportunum duxerint, vicariorum foraneorum dioecesis et parochorum civitatis episcopalis, conficiant, attentis legitimis consuetudinibus particularibus et omnibus

73 S. Rit. C., Dec. 19, 1671, ad 5 (n. 1440).

74 S. Rit. C., Sept. 7, 1670; April 8, 1854 (nn. 1408, 3080).

75 S. C. C., May 12, 1635; May 14, 1644 (Coll. P. F., nn. 82, 111).

76 S. Rit. C., April 23, 1895, ad III (n. 3854).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

personarum et locorum circumstantiis; in eoque pro diversis casibus iura singulorum moderate determinent, ita ut quaelibet contentionum et scandali removeatur occasio.

§ 2. Si in indice plures classes enumerentur, liberum est iis quorum interest classem eligere.

CAN. 1235

§ 1. Districte prohibetur ne quis, sepulturae vel exsequiarum seu anniversarii mortuorum causa, quidquam exigat ultra id quod in dioecesano taxarum indice statuitur.

§ 2. Pauperes gratis omnino ac decenter funerentur et sepeliantur, cum exsequiis, secundum liturgicas leges et dioecesana statuta, praescriptis.

§ 1 of can. 1234 provides that the local Ordinaries shall, each one for his own territory, draw up a list of funeral fees, if none such exists, with the advice [not consent] of the Cathedral chapter, and, if deemed advisable, with the coöperation of the rural deans and pastors of the episcopal city. In drawing up this list they shall take into account the lawful customs of the district as well as the circumstances of persons and times. The stole fees should be moderate and so determined that every occasion for quarrel and scandal is removed.

§ 2. If the list contains several classes of funeral services, arranged by degrees, those interested may choose any of these.

But, says can 1235, § 1, no clergyman may demand more than is officially allowed for burial or funeral services or anniversaries.

§ 2. The poor shall by all means be given a decent funeral and burial, inclusive of the exequies, free of charge, according to the sacred liturgy and the diocesan statutes. Alexander VII and Clement X enjoined especially on the missionaries of the East Indies, that they should bury the poor gratis, and not go about among the neighbors and relatives to beg alms for this purpose.[77]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PORTIO PAROECIALIS

CAN. 1236

§ 1. Salvo iure particulari, quoties fidelis non funeratur in ecclesia paroeciali propria, proprio defuncti parocho debetur portio paroecialis, excepto casu quo cadaver in ecclesiam propriae paroeciae commode asportari nequeat.

§ 2. Si quis habeat plures paroecias proprias ad quas cadaver commode deferri posset, et alibi funeretur, portio paroecialis dividenda est inter omnes parochos proprios.

CAN. 1237

§ 1. Detrahi debet portio paroecialis ex omnibus et solis emolumentis, quae statuta sunt pro funere et tumulatione in taxa dioecesana.

§ 2. Si quacunque de causa primum sollemne officium funebre non statim, sed intra mensem completum a die tumulationis fiat, licet hoc die non defuerint minora publica officia, portio tamen paroecialis ex huius etiam funeris emolumentis debetur.

§ 3. Quantitas portionis paroecialis determinetur in taxa dioecesana; et si ecclesia paroecialis et ecclesia funerans ad diversas dioeceses pertineant, quantitas

77 Alexander VII, "Sacrosancti," Jan. 18, 1658, § 2, n. 19; Clement IX, "In excelso," Sept. 13, 1669, n. 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

portionis paroecialis attenditur secundum taxam ecclesiae funerantis.

§ 1. The quarta funeris, or pastor's portion, must be given to the deceased's pastor if the funeral is not held in the parish church. There is no exception to this rule unless a particular law provides otherwise or unless the body cannot conveniently be brought to the deceased's own parish church.

§ 2. If the deceased had several parish churches, to which his body might be carried, yet is buried elsewhere, the pastor's portion must be divided among the different pastors.

Our Code calls the portion due to the pastor portio paroecialis. Formerly it went by the name of portio canonica,[78] because established by the canons, or quarta funeris,[79] because one-fourth of all funeral offerings, either in alms or candles, belonged to the parochus proprius. It was justly considered meet that he who nurtured the deceased whilst living, should also receive his due on the occasion of his funeral.[80] The pastor's portion, therefore, is nothing but a material token of gratitude and respect.

The text says, quoties, i. e., whenever a deceased parishioner is buried in or from a church other than his own parish church, no matter whether he himself made the choice or the family had him buried in the ancestral chapel or tomb.[81] Even the canons of cathedrals and collegiate churches owe the portio canonica to their own church within the boundaries of which they had their domicile or quasi-domicile, though they may be buried in 78 C. 4, x, III, 28; c. 2, 6°, III, 12.

79 Trid. Sess. 25, c. 13, de ref.

80 Cfr. cc. 1, X, III, 28; c. 2, Clem., III, 7.

81 C. 1, X, III, 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

their own cemeteries.[82] But no pastor's portion is to be paid by male religious or nuns whose superior or confessor performs the funeral service.[83] Nor does it appear proper that female religious should pay the quarta, even though their members die outside the religious house. Yet the law would seem to permit the pastor to demand it, because can. 1230, § 5, provides no exception for them.

§ 2 says that if one had several parishes, all the pastors concerned are entitled to an equal share of the portio paroecialis. If vagi are buried, the quarta need not be paid.[84]

Can 1237, § 1, determines the offerings, and the quantity of the same, from which the pastor's portion is to be deducted. All the fees established by synodal decree for funerals and burials are to be rated for subtracting the pastor's portion. The question is reduced to simple terms where the funeral fees are clearly fixed. Note the term for funeral and burial (pro funere et tumulatione). We generally include both in the name funeral service, to wit, the service in church and at the grave. No doubt this is the intention of the lawgiver. Hence it is not customary to make an itemized statement for the use of candles, torches, utensils, etc. Neither is the pastor's share to be deducted from the celebration of the third or seventh day, or the "month's mind."[85] Nor is any free offering which the family may make to the priest who accompanies the body to the grave, to be taxed or shared by the pastor.[86] Nor are pastors to demand a larger share if the burial

82 S. C. C., Sept. 12, 1699; 1 and 22 March, 1766.

83 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 322.

84 C. 2, 6°, III, 12; S. C. C., Nov. 29, 1851; Many, l. c., p. 324.

85 S. Rit. C., July 24, 1638 (n. 649).

86 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 17, 1880 (A. S. S., XIII, 421).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

takes place in or from a church of regulars, than when it is held from a church in charge of secular clergy.[87]

§ 2. If, for any reason, the solemn funeral service is held, not immediately, but within a month from the date of the burial, the pastor's share must be paid from the fees received for that solemn, though belated, service. Suppose a man dies on Sept. 1, and his body is taken either to the door of the church, or directly to the cemetery, where the grave is blessed by the priest because the civil authority for some reason or other would not permit the corpse to be taken into the church. On Oct. 1, the exequies are held, with Mass and absolutio ad tumbam. Now, if these exequies are held in a church which was not the deceased's parish church, and by a priest who was not his pastor, and the regular stole fee is paid, the pastor would be entitled to his share.[88] But the stole fee was supposed to have been offered only for the solemn function, which means not a sung Mass, but the funeral service, with either low or high Mass, and the absolution or Libera. For minor services, such as accompanying the body to the grave and blessing it, or even a private Mass, are not liable to the portio paroecialis. The meaning of the text, therefore, is that the pastor is entitled to his share of the fees even if the full funeral service is held a month from the date of burial.

§ 4. The quantity of the pastor's portion should be determined by the synodal tax. If the parish church and the funeral church are different and belong to different dioceses, the portio poroecialis must be refunded according to the tax established in the funeral church.

It may not be amiss to add here a decision which is 87 S. C. C., April 3, 1745 (Richter, l. c., 463, n. 27).

88 S. C. C., July 29, 1905; Feb. 23, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., XII, 330; XV, 58 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

very appropriate, and we dare say, very reasonable. It is to the effect that where there is an immemorable custom between parish churches of not demanding the quarta funeris, it should be observed.[89] This permits us to say that the Code is not against such a custom, as is evident from the clause placed in § 1, can. 1236: "salvo iure particulari," and we believe it would be conducive to peace and charity if this quarta funeris would be relaxed, especially with regard to religious, because they, too, work for the benefit of the diocese and religion in general and help the secular clergy.

RECORDING OF DEATHS

CAN. 1238

Expleta tumulatione, minister in libro defunctorum describat nomen et aetatem defuncti, nomen parentum vel coniugis, tempus mortis, quis et quae Sacramenta ministraverit, locum et tempus tumulationis.

After the funeral services the minister shall enter in the book of the dead the name and age of the deceased, the name of the parents or consort, the date of death, who administered the Sacraments, what Sacraments, and the place and date of the funeral.[90]

89 S. C. C., Feb. 9, 1732 (Richter, l. c., p. 463, n. 28).

90 The formula in the Rituale Rom., tit. X, c. 2, n. 7.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

ECCLESIASTICAL BURIAL, TO WHOM GRANTED OR DENIED

TO WHOM GRANTED

CAN. 1239

§ 1. Ad sepulturam ecclesiasticam non sunt admittendi qui sine baptismo decesserint.

§ 2. Catechumeni qui nulla sua culpa sine baptismo moriantur, baptizatis accensendi sunt.

§ 3. Omnes baptizati sepultura ecclesiastica donandi sunt, nisi eadem a iure expresse priventur.

§ 1. Baptism, being the Sacrament of initiation and sign of communion with the Church and membership in the same, is the fundamental condition of receiving a Catholic burial. Baptism may be received by desire — baptismus flaminis — and this is generally supposed in those who had received instructions in the faith (catechumens). Hence our canon in its first section states that no person who has died without Baptism may be admitted to ecclesiastical burial. This includes even unbaptized infants, though it is generally admitted that a child not yet born may be buried together with the mother in consecrated ground.[1] Besides, it appears, at least to many, very awkward and offensive if this law should be applied to burial in the ancestral grave. Yet, unless non-compli-

[1] Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 353.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ance must be tolerated in order to avoid greater evils, the law should be enforced.[2]

§ 2. Catechumens, or such as are preparing to embrace the Catholic faith, may be given ecclesiastical burial, if they have died without baptism through no fault of their own. For they are to be compared to baptized persons.[3] Thus if a would-be convert would die suddenly, with no priest at hand, as may happen in places which missionaries seldom visit, he could receive ecclesiastical burial.

§ 3 says that, although one may be baptized, he must be deprived of ecclesiastical burial if he has been expressly declared worthy of that penalty in law. For ecclesiastical burial is a sign of honor and respect given by the Church to her dead children, and a consolation and favor to the living. Denial of that favor must be looked upon as a post mortem penalty for the dead, and a warning to the living.

However, being a penalty, the denial of ecclesiastical burial must be strictly interpreted, and not extended beyond the cases stated in the law. These now follow.

TO WHOM ECCLESIASTICAL BURIAL MUST BE DENIED

CAN. 1240

§ 1. Ecclesiastica sepultura privantur, nisi ante mortem aliqua dederint poenitentiae signa:

1.° Notorii apostatae a christiana fide, aut sectae haereticae vel schismaticae aut sectae massonicae aliisve eiusdem generis societatibus notorie addicti;

2 S. O., Jan. 4, 1888, where n. 389 of Conc. Balt. II is explained as mere tolerance ad praecavenda maiora mala; S. O., March 30, 1859 (Coll. P. F., n. 1173).

3 Cfr. c. 2, x, III, 43.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Excommunicati vel interdicti post sententiam condemnatoriam vel declaratoriam;

3.° Qui se ipsi occiderint deliberato consilio;

4.° Mortui in duello aut ex vulnere inde relato;

5.° Qui mandaverint suum corpus cremationi tradi;

6.° Alii peccatores publici et manifesti.

§ 2. Occurrente praedictis in casibus aliquo dubio, consulatur, si tempus sinat, Ordinarius; permanente dubio, cadaver sepulturae ecclesiasticae tradatur, ita tamen ut removeatur scandalum.

§ 1. Unless they have given signs of repentance before death, the following are deprived of ecclesiastical burial:

1.° Notorious apostates from the Christian faith and persons who notoriously belonged to a heretical or schismatical sect, or to the Masonic sect, or to other societies of the same kind.

The term apostates evidently includes pagans and Jews as well as infidels or unbelievers who have fallen away from the Christian faith and whose defection is notorious. A Catholic who was an unbeliever, but not known as such to others, because he kept his unbelief to himself, or expressed himself only to the one or other friend, who kept the secret, could be buried ecclesiastically. For notoriety implies public knowledge, or such as could not be concealed by any artifice.[4]

Heretics and schismatics are those who have pertinaciously forsaken the Catholic faith or abjured obedience to the Pope.[5] Heresy and schism, too, must be notorious to have the effect here under consideration. What was said of apostates applies also to heretics and schismatics.

4 Can. 2197, 30; Cfr. c. 12, x, III, 28.
5 Can. 1325, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Thus a non-Catholic may be taken for a Catholic, because he acts like one, although he is not convinced of the truth of every Catholic dogma. Such a one might be given ecclesiastical burial, provided, of course, that his heresy was not notorious and he desired such a burial. The reason lies in the fact that by Baptism he belonged to the body of the Church, and in his mind may even have belonged to the soul of the Church.

The next class is that of members of Masonic sects. The adjective "damnatae" being omitted, it appears that all Masonic rites are included. Eiusdem generis means all societies whose principal purpose is to promote cremation,[6] or which have tendencies similar to those of Freemasonry.

What is to be done if the relatives or friends of such a person insist upon his receiving ecclesiastical burial? If the priest was called and found the patient unconscious or speechless, the relatives or friends must tell the priest that the sick man had desired to see a priest and gave signs of repentance.[7] Besides, the body of the deceased must not be carried into the Masonic hall or temple. If this was desired by the deceased himself, ecclesiastical burial must be denied, but if the Masons carry the coffin against the will of the defunct, ecclesiastical burial may be granted.[8]

2.° Persons excommunicated and interdicted after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence. The text requires that a sentence of excommunication or interdict has been pronounced. Whether this sentence be one declaring that the person had de facto incurred excommunication, or one directly inflicted by the ecclesiastical judge, is of no

6 S. O., Dec. 15, 1886 (Coll. P. F., n. 1665).

7 S. O., Sept. 19, 1877 (ibid., n. 1483).

8 S. O., Aug. 1, 1855 (ibid., n. 1116).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

importance. It is also immaterial whether the excommunicatus be vitandus or only tolerandus. Stress, however, is laid on the sentence.[9] The interdict is here to be understood of the personal interdict, which requires a declaratory or condemnatory sentence and is generally accompanied by a personal sentence.[10]

3.° Those who have deliberately killed themselves. As a rule, says the Holy Office,[11] those who commit suicide from despair or in wrath (desperatione vel iracundia) cannot be given ecclesiastical burial. But when insanity has been proved, or was evident, and attested by the verdict of a conscientious physician, ecclesiastical sepulture is permitted with all its ceremonies. When there is a doubt as to the suicide's mental state, ecclesiastical burial may be granted, but all pomp and solemn exequies must be avoided. This would mean that the funeral service may be held from the church, but that the Requiem Mass should be omitted, as well as preaching, for this is certainly a species of "pomp." A private Mass may be said.

4.° Those who died in a duel or from a wound received in a duel. The term duel (duellum, monomachia) signifies a contest with deadly weapons which takes place by agreement between two persons on account of some private quarrel.[12] Hence our prize-fights, in which no deadly weapons are used, and bull-fights, cannot be styled duels. It is otherwise with the so-called "Mensuren" of students and officers, as practiced chiefly in Austria and Germany.[13] This "detestable custom," as it

9 "Ad evitanda," of Martin V, 1418, cannot be interpreted, as Many does (l. c., p. 354), so as to admit tolerandi; see can. 2259 f.

10 C. 1, Clem. III, 7.

11 S. O., May 16, 1866 (Coll. P. F., n. 1290).

12 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., V, 184 ff.

13 S. C. C., Aug. 9, 1890 (Coll. P. F., n. 1739).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is called by the Council of Trent and Benedict XIV,[14] was and still is wide-spread, especially in Teutonic countries, where it also had its origin in pagan times. The Church tried to eradicate this savage custom and inflicted severe penalties on the perpetrators.[15] One of these is precisely the denial of ecclesiastical burial.

Our text says that only those who died in the act of duelling, or from a wound received in a duel, are to be deprived of ecclesiastical burial. Benedict XIV, in a well-known Constitution, uses a similar expression: "a decedente quoque extra conflictus locum ex vulnere ibidem accepto." Therefore a connection between cause and effect must be maintained. In other words, the wound received in a duel must be the cause of death. And it seems that a direct cause is required, for it may be that a wound received in a duel causes some other disease, after a time, and in this case we hardly believe that the penalty could be sustained.

5.° Those who ordered their body to be cremated. Of this enough has been said under can. 1203, § 2. Such persons must have retracted their order before death, otherwise they cannot receive ecclesiastical burial.

6.° Other public and manifest sinners. This phrase is rather wide, but may be contracted to a few categories in the light of former legislation. By sin must here be understood a delictum publicum, or crime, which is such intrinsically as well as in the eyes of sensible persons. To this class belong: (a) manifest and public usurers and robbers, unless they have made restitution;[16] public profiteers and bank or train robbers; (b) those who ac-

14 Sess. 25, c. 19, de ref.; Bened. XIV, "Detestabilem," Nov. 10, 1752.

15 Cfr. cc. 1, 2, x, V, 13; Gregory XIII "Ad tollendum," Dec. 5, 1582; Clement VIII, "Illius vices," Aug. 17, 1592.

16 Cfr. cc. 3, 5, x, V, 19; c. 2, x, V, 17; c. 2, 6°, V, 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tually live a sinful and scandalous life, e. g., in public concubinage, or conduct a notoriously meretricious trade, or panderage;[17] (c) those who have habitually violated the precepts of annual confession and communion. As to the last-named class of persons the Roman Ritual[18] says that their fault must be evident, which means that they must have omitted their Easter duty for several years and be known to the faithful as having been guilty of serious neglect.[19]

Note that all the persons mentioned under n. 1–6 are deprived of ecclesiastical burial only if they have given no signs of repentance. If they have given such signs, they may be buried like faithful Catholics, because it is the desire of the Church that all should return to God's grace by contrition and be restored to communion with the mystic body of Christ.[20]

Signs of repentance would be kissing the crucifix, acts of devotion, oral prayers, etc. But these signs, especially in case of public sinners, must be known and divulged to the bystanders and the faithful. If this has been done, ecclesiastical burial may be given; but if possible, pomp and solemn exequies should be omitted.[21]

Benedict XIV excluded duellists from ecclesiastical burial, even when they had given certain signs of penance.[22] This too rigorous clause has been softened in our code, as is manifest from the position of the phrase, "nisi ante mortem aliqua dederint signa poenitentiae."

§ 2. It may be in the six cases mentioned that the pastor has a doubt, for instance, concerning a suicide, or a wound received in a duel, whether it was the direct cause

17 Cfr. Many, l. c., p. 361.
18 Tit. II, c. 2, n. 6; c. 12, x, V, 38.
19 Many, l. c., p. 360.
20 S. O., Aug. 1, 1855 (Coll. P. F. n. 1116).
21 S. O., July 6, 1898 (ibid., n. 2007).
22 "Detestabilem," § 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of death. If time permits, he should inform the Ordinary and abide by his decision.[23] If the doubt remains even after the pastor has been advised by the Ordinary, ecclesiastical burial may be granted, provided no scandal is given. Scandal may be removed by divulging the fact that the deceased gave public signs of repentance, or that, for instance, the suicide was committed in a moment of mental aberration according to the physician's verdict.

CAN. 1241

Excluso ab ecclesiastica sepultura deneganda quoque sunt tum quaelibet Missa exsequialis, etiam anniversaria, tum alia publica officia funebria.

For those who have been deprived of ecclesiastical burial no [public] Requiem Mass, no anniversary, or other public funeral service may be held.

We enclose the word "public" within brackets, but it no doubt expresses the intention of the legislator. For private Masses may be said for any of the persons mentioned under n. 1–6, provided there be no communicatio in sacris. Thus it has been decided that a private Mass may be said for one who ordered his body to be cremated.[24] In cases of doubt the Ordinary, who has to be consulted in the matter, may grant permission to have solemn funeral services if he deems it expedient.[25]

23 S. O., July 6, 1898 (l. c.); Sept. 19, 1877 (l. c., n. 1483).

24 S. O., July 27, 1892 ad II (Coll. P. F., n. 1808).

25 S. O., Sept. 19, 1877; Dec. 15, 1886; July 6, 1898 (ibid, nn. 1483, 1665, 2007).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXHUMATION OF CORPSES

CAN. 1242

Si fieri sine gravi incommodo queat, cadaver excommunicati vitandi qui, contra canonum statuta, sepulturam in loco sacro obtinuit, exhumandum est, servato praescripto can. 1214, § 1, et in loco profano de quo in can. 1212, reponendum.

If it can be done without great inconvenience, the body of an excommunicatus vitandus, who obtained burial in sacred ground against the law, should be exhumed, with the permission of the bishop,[26] and be buried in a lot especially assigned for that purpose.[27]

26 Can. 1214, § 1.
27 Can. 1212; see c. 12, x, III, 28.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

SECTION II

HOLY SEASONS

CAN. 1243

Tempora sacra sunt dies festi; iisque accensentur dies abstinentiae et ieiunii.

Holy seasons are feastdays; to them must be added days of abstinence and fast.

Already in remote antiquity civilized people found a call to the worship of God in the changing seasons. Sacred times and places are common to all religions. The change of seasons, bringing with it changes in nature, made a religious impression upon mankind. Man sanctified certain seasons and dedicated them to God. The days thus consecrated to God were known as festivals. They were marked by two features: rest from labor or worldly affairs, and consecration to the worship of God. The first was expressed in the ancient Roman term feria. Both ideas are contained in the Hebrew word sabbath, which means a day of rest and sanctification. The Church did not at first change the Sabbath of the Jewish calendar, at least we have no evidence thereof. But gradually the prima sabbati or first day of the Jewish week commenced to be held in honor as the day of the resurrection of Christ and was called the Lord's Day[1] (dies dominica). . Besides these weekly recurring festivals there were others to commemorate the chief events

1 Cfr. Apoc. 1, 10.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the life of the Lord. Among these in the order of time, Easter holds the first place. Gradually were developed all the feasts as we have them now, forming that rich and carefully thought out system of feasts which is proper to the Catholic Church.[2] The old Canon Law contains two lists of festivals, the one presenting the state of things in the twelfth,[3] the other that in the thirteenth century.[4] In the course of centuries the number of feasts increased, so much so, in fact that their multitude led to a reaction on the part not only of civil governments but also of bishops. Pope Urban VIII revised the list.[5] The present arrangement was made by Pius X.[6]

As to days of fast and abstinence it must be said that the fast before Easter seems to be the most ancient of all. But its duration varied according to localities. Some fasted one day, others two, and yet others many days, whilst some simply observed a fast of forty hours. The forty days' fast became the rule at Rome in the seventh century, and was soon adopted throughout the West, except at Milan. In the eighth and ninth centuries an increase took place in the number of fasting vigils, nearly all the feasts, especially those of the Apostles,[7] obtaining the dignity of a vigil. The embertides were said to be of Apostolic origin by Leo the Great, but there is no document testifying to the feriae observed as embertides earlier than the Liber Pontificalis.[8] There were originally three. In St. Leo's day four embertides were observed. The present arrangement was made by Gregory VII and is distinctly Roman.[9]

2 See Kellner, Heortology (Eng. tr.) 1918, Introduction.
3 C. 1, Dist. 3 de cons.
4 C. 5, X, II, 9 de feriis.
5 "Universa," Sept. 13, 1642.
6 Motu proprio "Supremi disciplinae," July 2, 1911.
7 Funk, Manual of Church History, 1913, Vol. I, pp. 74, 296 f.; II, 164.
8 Liber Pontificalis, ed. Duchesne, I, 141.
9 Kellner, l. c., p. 183 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1244

§ 1. Dies festos itemque dies abstinentiae et ieiunii, universae Ecclesiae communes, constituere, transferre, abolere, unius est supremae ecclesiasticae auctoritatis.

§ 2. Ordinarii locorum peculiares suis diœcesibus seu locis dies festos aut dies abstinentiae et ieiunii possunt, per modum tantum actus, indicere.

The supreme authority of the Church alone can establish, transfer, or abolish holydays as well as days of abstinence and fasting. This rule, as may be seen from the historical note, was impressed upon the Christian people ever since the Council of Trent.[10] Hence not even a chapter, be it cathedral or collegiate, can impose a holyday of obligation not observed by the Roman Church, whereas the feastdays appointed by the latter oblige everywhere,[11] unless, of course, otherwise provided. Nor can a synod or conciliabulum transfer movable feasts to a Sunday.[12]

But the local Ordinaries may, per modum tantum actus (i. e., for a transient reason and for the time being, but not forever or habitually), prescribe the observance of a feastday or of a day of fast and abstinence. Thus, for instance, the Ordinary is not entitled to establish the feast of the patron saint of the main or episcopal city as a holyday of obligation for the whole diocese.[13] Nor can the Ordinary make a feastday which is ex voto obligatory for an exempt religious community, de praecepto for them if the feast is not found in the list of feasts of obli-

10 Urban VIII, "Universa," Sept. 13, 1642, § 3 (Dec. Auth., n. 812).

11 S. Rit. C., June 8, 1630 (n. 535).

12 Prop. 74 damn. per "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794 (Denzinger, n. 1437).

13 S. Rit. C., Aug. 18, 1725 (n. 2277).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gation prescribed for the universal Church. Feasts which have been introduced by exempt religious by reason of a vow oblige only the persons bound by the latter.[14] Of course, since the vow of a community lasts as long as the community itself who made the vow, these feasts must be observed that long; as to later generations see can. 1310.

It may not be superfluous to add that our text mentions local Ordinaries, which term does not include religious superiors. The latter are, therefore, not entitled to impose a feastday upon their communities. The vow mentioned in the last paragraph concerns the community as such.

DISPENSATIONS

CAN. 1245

§ 1. Non solum Ordinarii locorum, sed etiam parochi, in casibus singularibus iustaque de causa, possunt subjectos sibi singulos fideles singulasve familias, etiam extra territorium, atque in suo territorio etiam peregrinos, a lege communi de observantia festorum itemque de observantia abstinentiae et ieiunii vel etiam utriusque dispensare.

§ 2. Ordinarii, ex causa peculiari magni populi concursus aut publicae valetudinis, possunt totam quoque dioecesim seu locum a ieiunio et ab abstinentia vel etiam ab utraque simul lege dispensare.

§ 3. In religione clericali exempta eandem dispensandi potestatem habent Superiores ad modum parochi, quod attinet ad personas, de quibus in can, 514, § 1.

§ 1. Not only the local Ordinaries, but also pastors, may in individual cases and for a just cause dispense their

14 S. Rit. C., June 23, 1703 (n. 2113).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

subjects from the common law of keeping feasts and from the observance of abstinence and fast, or from both fast and abstinence at the same time. Ordinaries could always dispense in certain circumstances and cases by law,[15] but the right of the pastor to dispense rested on custom [16] rather than on written law. Now it has become part of the general law. But in order to act licitly, they must observe the conditions laid down in this canon, which is partly a repetition of the old law.

a) They can dispense only in individual cases as they occur. Hence Ordinaries cannot issue synodal acts dispensing persons and families from the common law, or grant a habitual dispensation. Each case stands for itself and none can establish a precedent;[17] each must be examined like a physician makes his diagnosis.

b) They may dispense only single individuals and single families subject to their jurisdiction by reason either of domicile or quasi-domicile, or by actual residence in the territory over which their jurisdiction extends. Subjects by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile may make use of such a dispensation also outside of the territory of the grantor. But peregrini or transient residents are benefited by the dispensation only as long as they reside in the district of the grantor.

c) Finally there must be a just reason for dispensing, since every dispensation involves a violation of the common law. Such a cause would be sickness [18] and impossibility of obtaining abstinence food, although the higher cost of such was not deemed a sufficient reason by Benedict XIV.[19] The climate, the nature of one's work, and 15 Urban VIII, "Universa," § 3.

16 Cfr. Putzer, Comment. in Facult. Apost., p. 36, n. 24.

17 Reg. Iuris 28 in 6°. This is called "toties quoties opus fuerit concedenda" by Bened. XIV, "Non ambigimus," May 30, 1741, § 3.

18 C. 2, X, III, 46.

19 "Libentissime," June 10, 1745, § 18.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

physical debility must be taken into consideration. The grantor himself is the judge of the sufficiency of the reasons advanced.[20]

§ 2. The Ordinaries may, because of a great concourse of people, or for reasons of public health, also dispense the whole diocese or any place therein from the law of fasting and abstinence, or from both combined. This liberal concession renders special faculties (not particular indults; see can. 1253) superfluous. What is meant by a great concourse of people has been authentically explained by the Holy Office.[21] It is not necessary that people from other towns or cities are present, but a multitude of inhabitants of the same city or town assembled for an occasion suffices. Of course, the occasion should be Catholic and religious, for instance, a centenary, a pilgrimage, a large meeting of Catholic societies, etc. As our county and State fairs offer a serious occasion for violating the law of fast and abstinence, such a one would constitute a sufficient reason for dispensing the participants. Our Code is not against this authentic interpretation, for it simply says: a great concourse of people. The danger of violating the law must be general, which is often the case on great festivals.

We may add that another decision of the Holy Office[22] requires for a dispensation from the law of abstinence on a holyday proper, that the abstinence be anticipated. The Code is silent about anticipation, and therefore this rule may be considered as abolished. It was, in fact, already abrogated by decree of the S. C. C., which directed the Ordinaries to make ample use of dispensation for the 20 S. C. P. F., Aug. 2, 1781 (Coll., n. 548).

21 S. O., March 28, 1896 (Coll., P. F., n. 1922).

22 S. O., Dec. 5, 1894 (ibid., n. 1884), where nundinae (fairs), are especially mentioned.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

holydays suppressed by Pius X, without mentioning anticipation at all.[23]

The other reason mentioned in § 2 of can. 1245 is the public health. An example which recalls the influenza is given by Benedict XIV in his Constitution "Libentissime." The disease, to justify a dispensation, must affect the people or territory, not merely a few individuals, in other words, it must be epidemic, as is explained in the same Constitution. Benedict XIV requires the testimony of physicians to verify the existence of an epidemic. The local or State Board of Health would be the proper adviser in our country.[24]

Note that these are the only two general cases in which the Ordinaries may grant a general dispensation: a great concourse of people and reasons of public health. Beyond those they should not stretch the power now granted to them by the common law, which was formerly given only in the form of a "faculty" with the significant clause: "non tamen per generale indultum, sed in casibus particularibus."[25] The Code has removed this restriction, but, as stated above, only for two general reasons, which cannot be extended at random.

It may be asked: How far does the power of dispensing in individual as well as in general cases extend? Benedict XIV, in three Constitutions,[26] drew certain limits, to wit, (a) that only one full meal of flesh meat could be taken a day; (b) that no mixing of meat and fish was permitted; (c) that the meal hours be not inverted, e. g., dinner substituted for supper or lunch and 23 May 3, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 341).

24 June 10, 1745, § 23; inflammatio pectoris, which was raging in 1730, 1733, 1740.

25 S. O., March 17, 1883 (Coll. P. F., n. 1594); Facult. I, art. 27 (Putzer, l. c., p. 292, n. 169).

26 "Non ambigimus," May 30, 1741; "In suprema," Aug. 22, 1741; "Libentissime," June 10, 1745.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vice versa. Restrictions (b) and (c) are certainly removed by can. 1251, § 2. But how about the unica comestio, upon which Benedict XIV insisted so emphatically? The difficulty may be solved, not by recourse to special faculties, which have ceased in foro externo since the decree of April 25, 1918, but by interpretation. The Code grants the ordinaries power to dispense from both fasting and abstinence. Hence the petitioner must clearly state the extent of his demand, and if the grantor fulfils his wishes to their full extent, there can be no doubt that the petitioner may eat fleshmeat more than once a day. Everything, therefore, depends upon the tenor of the dispensation. The grantor can restrict the use of flesh meat to one meal a day; see can. 1251.

§ 3. Religious superiors of exempt clerical institutes enjoy the same powers as pastors with regard to all the persons mentioned in can. 514, §1. A difficulty may perhaps arise from can. 1253, which says that by these canons nothing is changed in the constitutions and rules of the various religious organizations. Elsewhere [27] we have stated that exempt superiors may dispense the whole community from fasting and abstinence. This statement must be restricted to the days prescribed by the rule or constitutions, since the religious superior of exempt institutes can dispense only ad modum parochi, i. e., like a pastor, and a pastor can dispense only single individuals and families. Hence the superior cannot dispense the whole community as such from the duty of fasting or abstinence as prescribed by the common law. However, provided no vow is involved, we believe that the exempt superiors may, in urgent cases, unless the constitutions expressly forbid it, dispense the whole community by virtue of § 2, can. 1245, for reasons of public health. For the text simply says "ordinaries," and this term includes the exempt religious superiors. The diocesan Ordinary could not grant that dispensation to exempt religious by reason of exemption, and why exempt religious should be worse off in such extraordinary circumstances than other people is not easily intelligible. Religious who are employed in the missions, even as prefects apostolic, and are entitled to dispense their subjects from the law of fasting and abstinence, must apply to their superiors for a dispensation.[28] However, this applies only to exempt religious; for non-exempt religious, as well as exempt religious belonging to lay institutes, the competent superior is the local Ordinary. Besides, it is evident that exempt religious who are vicars apostolic or bishops, are not bound to apply to their religious superiors for dispensation. To do so would contravene can. 627, § 2, and be unworthy of their rank. But the rule applies to exempt religious who are pastors or assistants (curates), who, therefore, must have recourse to their superiors, either local or higher, according to the constitutions, in order to obtain a dispensation from fasting and abstinence which they themselves need, though, as pastors, they may by law dispense single individuals or families without having recourse to their superiors.

27 Vol. III, p. 300, of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RECKONING OF FEASTS AND FAST DAYS

CAN. 1246

Supputatio diei festi, itemque diei abstinentiae et ieiunii, facienda est a media nocte usque ad mediam noctem, salvo praescripto can. 923.

28 S. O., April 12, 1742 (Coll. P. F., n. 337).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Feastdays as well as the days of fasting and abstinence run from midnight to midnight, i. e., twenty-four hours, counting from midnight to twelve o'clock of the following night, according to the time in vogue at the time of celebration. If the new time has been adopted, this is to be followed; if the old time was retained, it may be taken as standard. The time for gaining indulgences is regulated in can. 923.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XIII

HOLY-DAYS

CAN. 1247

§ 1. Dies festi sub praecepto in universa Ecclesia sunt tantum: Omnes et singuli dies dominici, festa Nativitatis, Circumcisionis, Epiphaniae, Ascensionis et sanctissimi Corporis Christi, Immaculatae Conceptionis et Assumptionis Almae Genitricis Dei Mariae, sancti Ioseph eius sponsi, Beatorum Petri et Pauli Apostolorum, Omnium denique Sanctorum.

§ 2. Ecclesiastico praecepto dies festi Patronorum non subiacent; locorum autem Ordinarii possunt sollemnitatem exteriorem transferre ad dominicam proxime sequentem.

§ 3. Sicubi aliquod festum ex enumeratis legitime sit abolitum vel translatum, nihil inconsulta Sede Apostolica innovetur.

§ 1. Feastdays of obligation for the universal Church are: All Sundays; Christmas (Dec. 25th); the Circumcision of our Lord (New Year's Day, Jan. 1st); Epiphany (Jan. 6th); the Ascension of Our Lord; Corpus Christi (Thursday after Trinity Sunday); the Immaculate Conception of the B. V. M. (Dec. 8th); the Assumption of the B. V. M. (Aug. 15th); St. Joseph's day (March 19th); the festival of SS. Peter and Paul (June 29th), and All Saints' Day (Nov. 1st).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The holy-days of obligation for the universal Church, therefore, are ten in number, and no Ordinary or religious community may introduce others with equal obligation for all the faithful.

Hence § 2 provides that the patron feast of a diocese, or city, or town does not oblige by ecclesiastical precept, though the Ordinaries may transfer the external celebration of the same to the following Sunday.

The custom of calling a church after a saint, or dedicating it to his honor, grew out of the old martyria. The faithful were wont to observe the feast of a prominent martyr as a general festival, whether it fell on a weekday or on a Sunday. In the ninth century diocesan statutes command this celebration. But the obligation of celebrating the festivals of patron saints was not imposed by the decretal of Gregory IX. Urban VIII, in his Constitution "Universa," of Sept. 13, 1642, directed that the feast of the principal patron of every kingdom, province, city or town be observed as a holyday of obligation. The people at large were not pleased with the sweeping innovation caused by the French revolution, and consoled themselves by transferring the abrogated holydays to the following Sunday.[1] This transfer is permitted by the Code as far as the external celebration is concerned; the officium chori must be celebrated on the proper or occurring day, but the officium fori, or the celebration with solemn Mass and ceremonies, decoration of the Saint's picture, etc., may be transferred to a Sunday.

§ 3. If any of the above named (ten) holydays (of obligation) has been anywhere abolished or transferred, nothing shall be changed without the advice of the Apostolic See.

1 See Kellner, Heortology, p. 194 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In the United States, under a decree of the S. C. Propaganda Fide of Nov. 25, 1885, there are six holydays of obligation, namely, the feast of the Immaculate Conception, Christmas, New Year's Day (the Circumcision), the Ascension, the Assumption of the B. V. M., and All Saints' Day.[2]

In Canada the provincial council of Quebec (1854) asked for an arrangement of feasts similar to that made for the United States. The S. Congregation answered affirmatively, but commanded to retain the feast of the Epiphany and to omit the Assumption.[3] Hence they, too, have six holydays of obligation; but instead of the Assumption they observe Epiphany.

On the islands of Trinidad and Dominica (dioceses of Port of Spain and Roseau, or Charlottetown) the feasts of the Assumption and of SS. Peter and Paul are transferred to the following Sunday, but the office and ceremonies must be held on the day proper.[4]

These examples may suffice to interpret the meaning of § 3, can. 1247.

OBLIGATIONS CONNECTED WITH HOLYDAYS

CAN. 1248

Festis de praecepto diebus Missa audienda est; et abstinendum ab operibus servilibus, actibus forensibus, itemque, nisi aliud ferant legitimae consuetudines aut peculiaria indulta, publico mercatu, nundinis, aliisque emptionibus et venditionibus.

2 Cfr. Acta et Decreta Conc. Balt. III, 1886, p. CV f.

3 S. C. P. F., May 25, 1855 (Coll. Lac., III, 614, 664).

4 S. C. P. F., March 1, 1868 (Coll. Lac., III, 1112, 1116). Regarding other English-speaking countries, Great Britain, Ireland, etc., we could find nothing special.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As stated in the historical note, every holyday of obligation is a day of rest and worship. Hence on these days Mass must be heard. This obligation obliges all the faithful of the Latin Church and the inhabitants of China and other missionary countries under the S. C. P. F.[5] The obligation is grievous, binding under mortal sin. One does not comply with this precept by hearing two or even four parts of Masses said simultaneously by different priests.[6] It may not be amiss to set forth here what the S. C. P. F. answered the Vicar Apostolic of Ueskub in Servia; for it has a general bearing. Not only distance, but also the condition of roads, as well as age, sex, and mental attitude of the faithful must be taken into consideration where there is question of excusing them from the obligation of attending Mass on holydays of obligation. If going to church would cause a great inconvenience, one may be freed from the duty; but if the distance is not great, or the fatigue would be but small, the obligation does not cease.[7] The decision refers to the theories of the moralists, who may therefore be consulted.[8]

The second obligation is to abstain from servile work, including all kinds of forensic acts (unless lawful custom or a particular indult permits them), the holding of public markets, fairs, sales, etc. Servile works are such as are performed by the bodily faculties and destined chiefly for the use and support of the body. Some think that the element of slavery or drudgery might have been added.[9] But now-a-days there is no reason why this ele-

5 S. O., March 23, 1656 ad 1; Nov. 13, 1669; S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1645 (Coll., nn. 126, 189, 114).

6 S. O., propp. 52, 53 damn., March 4, 1679 (Denzinger, n. 1069 f.).

7 S. C. P. F., Sept. 26, 1840, dub. 16 (Coll., n. 914).

8 See Sabetti-Barrett, Theol. Moralis, ed. 27a, 1919, p. 240, n. 240 ff.

9 Thus most moralists (see Sabetti-Barrett, l. c., n. 252, p. 248). The ancient Roman idea that such menial labors were performed only by slaves had its influence upon theologians.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ment should be introduced into the definition of servile work. Farm work, such as ploughing, planting, harvesting, is certainly servile; but a farmer would object to being called a slave or mercenary. The same is true of professional labors.

Forensic acts are all trials held in civil as well as criminal (even ecclesiastical) courts and the routine business of administration conducted therein. Extraordinary and urgent acts of administration may be excepted. The term forensic, at least in ecclesiastical language, also includes military operations.[10] This does not mean that the cleaning of barracks and polishing of arms or an hour of gymnastic exercise could not be permitted or at least tolerated. Public markets and fairs or sales, for instance, of stock or produce, are not allowed by the civil law in our country, and a check issued on a Sunday is invalid. Benedict XIV had to deal chiefly with Italians, who were and still are wont to hold fairs (fiere) on holydays. These fairs were more leniently dealt with than public markets, which the Pope forbade.[11] Hence the clause: "unless lawful custom and special indults permit." There is nothing in the text which would forbid baseball or athletic games or sports. Neither can the Constitution of Benedict XIV be invoked against them,[12] for it forbids such games and plays — our "movie" shows would perhaps deserve a severer censure[13] for the reason of indecency and lasciviousness. Athletic games, if properly conducted, i. e., with due regard to Christian modesty, belong rather to the liberal arts and cannot be condemned. The S. Congregation has instructed missionaries to be

10 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 14, 1674 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 272): "militaribus praesidiis aliisque forensibus."

11 "Paternae charitatis," Aug. 24, 1744; "Ab eo tempore," Nov. 5, 1745.

12 "Nihil profecto," Aug. 12, 1742.

13 See Koch-Preuss, Moral Theology, Vol. III, St. Louis, 1919, pp. 52 sqq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more lenient towards servants and bakers who have to work on holydays and therefore can not assist at Mass.[14] Equal leniency is admissible for workingmen engaged in the service of public utilities, such as railroads, fire departments, light, power, and heat plants, etc.[15]

WHERE MASS MAY BE HEARD

CAN. 1249

Legi de audiendo Sacro satisfacit qui Missae adest quocunque catholico ritu celebretur sub dio aut in quacunque ecclesia vel oratorio publico aut semi-publico et in privatis coemeteriorum aediculis de quibus in can. 1190, non vero in aliis oratoriis privatis, nisi hoc privilegium a Sede Apostolica concessum fuerit.

The law of hearing Mass may be complied with by attending a Mass said in any Catholic rite (Latin, Greek, Syriac, Coptic, or Armenian). Hence Ordinaries or priests are not allowed to forbid the faithful to frequent a church of another rite, although they may exhort them to come to their own church, especially on holydays.[16] One restriction, or rather natural condition, must, however, be added. The law requires that Mass be heard. If a Catholic of the Latin rite would enter a Greek Church, not knowing what kind of celebration or function he was attending, he certainly could not be said to hear Mass, although we readily admit that external attention only is required.

The second clause of our canon states that one may 14 There is a great deal of servile work connected with running machines which require constant attention. There is, from this point of view, more excuse for a decent theatre than for the psychologically, physiologically and morally objectionable "movies."

15 S. C. P. F., Sept. 26, 1840, ad dub. 15 (Coll., n. 914).

16 S. C. P. F., April 30, 1862, ad 1 (Coll., n. 1228).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

hear Mass in the open air, or in a church or a public or semi-public oratory. In such oratories, according to our Code,[17] all ecclesiastical functions may be held. One may also hear Mass and fulfill the obligation in a private cemetery chapel, as described in can. 1190.

Domestic or private chapels erected with an indult of the Apostolic See are only for the benefit of the grantee and those mentioned in the indult, as explained under can. 1195, and hence others do not comply with the law by hearing Mass in them.

As to chapels on ships or vessels, the S. Congregation has decided that these must have a fixed or permanent place, i. e., they must be dedicated for the purpose of divine worship, and form, as it were, a special and separate compartment for that sole purpose, as long as the vessel lasts. If this is the case, the chapel is to be considered a public oratory, and all who assist at Mass therein, even while the ship is in port, comply with the precept of hearing Mass. If the chapel has no permanent place, it is to be regarded as a portable altar.[18]

17 See can. 1191, § 2; can. 1193.

18 S. Rit. C., March 4, 1901; May 10, 1901 (n. 4069); Many, l. c., p. 132.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XIV

ABSTINENCE AND FASTING

THE LAW OF ABSTINENCE

CAN. 1250

Abstinentiae lex vetat carne iureque ex carne vesci, non autem ovis, lacticiniis et quibuslibet condimentis etiam ex adipe animalium.

The law of abstinence forbids the eating of flesh meat and broth or soup made of meat; but it does not forbid eggs, lacticinia, and seasoning with fat of animals. The new law here is milder than the old, for lacticinia were not always permitted by the Church, as may be seen from some Constitutions of Benedict XIV.[1] The term lacticinia includes everything that is produced from milk, as well as the milk itself,— cheese, butter, margarine, etc. These, therefore, may be used even on days of abstinence.[2] Fat of animals was defined as the fat, grease, or lard of any animal, not only of hogs.[3]

THE LAW OF FASTING

CAN. 1251

§ 1. Lex ieiunii praescribit ut nonnisi unica per diem comestio fiat; sed non vetat aliquid cibi mane et

1 "Non ambigimus"; "In suprema"; "Libentissme." Cooking with oil only was permitted.

2 S. O., May 13, 1896; Sept. 1899 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1928, 2067).

3 S. O., May 1, 1889 (ibid., n. 1704).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vespere sumere, servata tamen circa ciborum quantitatem probata locorum consuetudine.

§ 2. Nec vetitum est carnes ac pisces in eadem refectione permiscere; nec serotinam refectionem cum prandio permutare.

The law of fasting permits only one full meal a day, but it does not forbid the taking of some food for breakfast and supper.

The quantity and quality of this repast is left to local custom. Care must be taken that one does not take "something" between meals too often on days of fast, as this might eventually constitute a considerable quantity or amount almost to a full meal.[4]

Those who are not obliged to fast on the days prescribed, and have received either a general or a particular indult to eat meat, may eat flesh meat every time they take a meal.[5] Thus aged or sickly persons or laborers, who are dispensed from observing the fast, may eat flesh meat three times or oftener a day. This, too, is a modification of former papal constitutions.[6] Besides, the S. Penitentiary has decided that if the head of the family (pater familias) is dispensed from the law of abstinence, all members of the family subject to him (quae sunt in potestate patris familias) may also eat flesh meat. However, those who are bound to fast may use flesh meat only once a day, at the principal or full meal.[7] If a son or daughter, or other member of the family is lawfully dispensed from abstinence on account of sickness, the head of the family may extend that favor to the other members, under the same condition as stated above, viz., 4 S. O., prop. 29 damn. March 18, 1666 (Denzinger, n. 1000).

5 S. Poenit., Feb. 24, 1819; March 16, 1882 (Coll. P. F., nn. 734, 1569).

6 Especially of those of Benedict XIV, quoted above.

7 S. Poenit., Jan. 10, Jan. 16, 1834 (Coll. P. F., n. 832).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that flesh meat may be used only once a day by those who are otherwise obliged to fast.[8]

Another mitigation of the law of fasting is here generalized: Flesh meat and fish may be taken at the same meal, and dinner and supper may be interchanged. Thus, for instance, if one, because of his studies, or for any other reason, should prefer to take lunch at about 10 or 11 o'clock, and dinner at 5, there could be no reasonable objection.[9] Note also canon 1252.

DAYS OF ABSTINENCE AND FASTING

CAN. 1252

§ 1. Lex solius abstinentiae servanda est singulis sextis feriis.

§ 2. Lex abstinentiae simul et ieiunii servanda est feria quarta Cinerum, feriis sextis et sabbatis Quadragesimae et feriis Quatuor Temporum, pervigiliis Pentecostes, Deiparae in caelum assumptae, Omnium Sanctorum et Nativitatis Domini.

§ 3. Lex solius ieiunii servanda est reliquis omnibus Quadragesimae diebus.

§ 4. Diebus dominicis vel festis de praecepto lex abstinentiae, vel abstinentiae et ieiunii, vel ieiunii tantum cessat, nec pervigilia anticipantur; item cessat Sabbato Sancto post meridiem.

§ 1. The law of abstinence only must be observed on all Fridays.

§ 2. The law of abstinence and fasting must be observed on Ash Wednesday, on the Fridays and Saturdays

8 Ibid.; the reason why this favor may be used is not the indult, but the physical inability of the filii familias to procure other food.

9 S. O., July 29, 1859; Sept. 17, 1862 (Coll. P. F., un. 1146, 1230); cfr. Eccl. Review, 1920, Vol. 62, p. 309 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of Lent, on the emberdays, on the vigils of Pentecost, the Assumption, All Saints' Day, and Christmas.

§ 3. The law of fasting only must be observed on all other days of Lent.

§ 4. On Sundays and holydays of obligation (except holydays in Lent) the laws of fasting and abstinence do not bind; nor must vigils of holydays of obligation, which fall on a Sunday, be observed on the preceding day. Thus if the feast of the Assumption or All Saints or Christmas should fall on a Monday, the vigil need not be observed on the preceding Saturday or Sunday. Not on Saturday, because, as the text says, "nec pervigilia anticipantur"; not on Sunday, because there is no fast. Only holydays of obligation are thus favored.

The Lenten fast and abstinence cease at noon on Holy Saturday, that is to say, at 12 o'clock.

PARTICULAR LAWS

CAN. 1253

His canonibus nihil immutatur de indultis particularibus, de votis cuiuslibet personae physicae vel moralis, de constitutionibus ac regulis cuiusvis religionis vel instituti approbati sive virorum sive mulierum in communi viventium etiam sine votis.

These canons leave unchanged particular indults, the vows relating to fasting and abstinence made by individuals or corporations, and the constitutions and rules of approved orders or congregations of religious, male as well as female, and of those who live in common without vows.

I. As regards particular indults of the Apostolic See, it must first of all be observed that the decree of the S. C. Consistorialis of April 25, 1918, cannot simply be applied to particular indults, because it refers to habitual faculties of Ordinaries granted for the external forum. Indults are not identical with faculties, as the latter comprehend various kinds of concessions or favors, whilst indults are given for specific purposes, generally designated very minutely, and to individual persons. It must, however, be admitted that these two terms are frequently employed synonymously. But there is a more stringent reason: it would be absurd to hold that the S. Congregation would nullify a canon without as much as specifying it in its decree. Canon 1253 distinctly maintains and upholds particular indults. The adjective particular must be explained according to the significance of a particular law, which implies local or provincial legislation, or such as differs from universal legislation. Hence a particular indult may affect a diocese or province, or even a nation, in contradistinction to the whole Church. These considerations premised, the following indults may concern the United States.[10]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The indult of July 25, 1858, which permits the eating of flesh meat on Saturdays when the law of fasting does not oblige. This indult is out of date,[11] for these Saturdays are now abolished by general law, and unless a vow is in the way, they need not be observed.

2. The indult granting the use of flesh meat on Wednesdays of Advent, given Sept. 2, 1837, is partly out of date,[12] for the law of abstinence no longer obliges in Advent, except on Wednesday of embertide. However, since the S. C. P. F. granted permission to use flesh meat on all Wednesdays of Advent, including the Wednesday

10 Concerning Great Britain we were unable to find any particular indults.

11 Coll. Lac., III, 17; it ceases also for the province of St. Louis (ibid., III, 319, 321).

12 Coll. Lac., III, 61.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the emberdays, we believe that this part of the indult still holds. But as this day is not included in the indult of Aug. 3, 1887, given by the Holy Office [13] and ratified by Leo XIII, it would seem to follow that the latter must be considered binding, especially since Saturday was accepted as exempt from abstinence.

3. The indult of Aug. 3, 1887, granted by the Holy Office reads: (a) The use of flesh meat, eggs, and lacticinia is allowed on every Sunday of Lent, at every meal, and on every Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday of Lent at the principal meal, except on the Saturdays of Ember week and Holy Week. There is added a clause forbidding the promiscuous use of meat and fish; this clause is now abolished by can. 1251, § 2. (b) Lacticinia and eggs are permitted on every day of Lent on which no flesh meat is allowed at the main meal and lunch (supper). (c) Some bread may be taken, together with coffee, tea or chocolate. (d) Where the principal meal cannot be taken at noon, the order of lunch and dinner may be inverted. For this no indult is now needed. (e) Lard or fat may be used for cooking. No indult required. (f) Those exempt from the law of fasting may eat flesh meat, eggs, and lacticinia several times a day on all days on which their use is permitted to all the faithful (as on the Sundays of Lent).

This indult was given for ten years, and express mention of it must be made each year in the Lenten regulations. We suppose it has been renewed, and thus remains in force. Of practical value are only points (a) and (f), and the latter only ad quietem conscientiae. Under this indult in Lent the Wednesdays are observed instead of the Saturdays, with the exception of Ember week and 13 Cfr. Putzer, Comment. in Fac. Ap., p. 295.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Holy Week, when Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday must be observed as days of abstinence.

One more remark: the indult of Aug. 3, 1887, in the very beginning mentions the fact that the favors it grants are intended for Lent only. What then of the other Ember days? Must all three days of the other three Ember weeks be kept? Custom, we are told,[14] has extended this favor to all the other fast days. But certainly not by virtue of the indult; for although we are allowed to interpret favors broadly, we have no right to extend a favor beyond the tenor of the indult by which it is granted.[15] We do not deny the force of custom in the matter, nor are we obstinately bent on enforcing the "magro." Since even the last Plenary Council of Baltimore (n. 1112) had to confess that uniformity in the discipline of fasting was impossible, we fear that the conditions of custom are verified. Recourse to the Holy See would certainly be safer.

4. The indult granted by Pius IX to our soldiers and sailors is still in force. In virtue of this indult they are obliged to abstain from flesh meat only on six days of the year: Ash Wednesday, the three last days of Holy Week (or now rather only Good Friday and Holy Saturday to twelve o'clock), on the vigils of the Assumption and of Christmas. This favor is granted to all who are in active service, but not when they are on leave of absence. The families who eat with these soldiers at the same table, enjoy the same favor. The special faculties granted to our army bishop were given only for the time of war.

II. Vows are not affected by these canons. The Minims have a special vow of perpetual abstinence. A municipality or government may vow to observe the fast 14 Putzer, l. c., p. 297, according to Konings and Kenrick.

15 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or abstinence on a certain day, for instance, on account of an epidemic or earthquake.[16]

III. The constitutions and rules of religious institutes may prescribe days of fasting and abstinence besides those appointed in the Code. If nothing specific is determined on this head, the members are allowed to observe the days mentioned in can. 1252. Besides, the superiors may grant dispensations, as far as can. 1245, § 3, permits, and provided the constitutions do not forbid. A declaration of the S. C. Rel., of Sept. 1, 1912, says: The mitigations and dispensations of fasting and abstinence prescribed by the general law of the Church also benefit religious, but fasts and abstinence prescribed by their rule and constitutions are not mitigated by a general indult or law, unless such indult or law expressly includes religious. Our Code emphatically states that the approved rules and constitutions of religious institutes are not changed by the general law. Those religious, therefore, who do not observe their peculiar laws concerning fasting and abstinence transgress their rule, but not the law of the Church, and therefore are liable to punishment only in so far as their constitutions declare them guilty and punishable.[17] Most constitutions do not bind under pain of sin.

WHO IS OBLIGED TO FAST AND ABSTAIN

CAN. 1254

§ 1. Abstinentiae lege tenentur omnes qui septimum aetatis annum expleverint.

§ 2. Lege ieiunii adstringuntur omnes ab expleto vicesimo primo aetatis anno ad inceptum sexagesimum.

16 See can. 1310.

17 A. Ap. S., IV, 626 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The law of abstinence binds all who have completed the seventh year of age. This law obliges even on the vigils of suppressed feasts if these vigils were observed by reason of a particular precept or vow.[18]

The law of fasting obliges all Catholics from the twenty-first year of age, completed, until the beginning of the sixtieth year. The general tenor of this law, from which no one in the Latin Church is exempt, was explained above.[19] Here two condemned propositions may be mentioned: (1) All officials employed by the State in physical labor are excused from the law of fasting, nor is it necessary to be morally certainly whether fasting and work are compatible. (2) All those riding on horseback, whether the journey be necessary or not, even if it lasts only one day, are absolutely excused from fasting.[20]

Concerning working men, professional men, builders, servants, etc., employed by non-Catholics or lax Catholics, the Holy Office has decreed that they may eat meat on forbidden days, provided it is not purposely served to spite the Catholic Church, and provided also they can find no other employment.[21] For the rest the moralists should be consulted.

18 S. C. C., Sept. 18, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 480); see can. 1310.

19 See S. O., March 23, 1656; S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1645 (Coll., nn. 126, 114).

20 Propp. 30, 31 damn. March 18, 1666 (Denzinger, n. 1001 f.).

21 S. O., May 27, 1671; Dec. 14, 1482 (Coll. P. F., nn. 195, 960).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART III

DIVINE WORSHIP

Divine worship is an essential feature of the Church, originating in the relation of the creature to the Creator. Foremost, of course, in this worship is God himself. But as the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity is, as it were, more closely connected with the Church, in whose temples He dwells, the Blessed Eucharist and all that is related to it deserves closer consideration. Around the Divinity there clusters a crown of Saints, to whom men pay homage. Hence a special section of the Code is devoted to the worship of the Saints. The worship of God being the outcome of the virtue of religion, may show itself in external acts, and the same is true of the veneration of the saints. Hence mention is made of processions. Lastly, man may bind himself more immediately to the worship of God by vows and the solemn invocation of the Divine Name.

The Code deals with Divine Worship logically after treating of sacred places and seasons, because these latter form the setting or frame of the interior picture, or, as we might say, the continens of the contentum. We must again remind the reader that dogmatic exposition is not the purpose of these canons, although they offer matter for lengthy elucidation.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1255

§ 1. Sanctissimae Trinitati, singulis eiusdem Personis, Christo Domino, etiam sub speciebus sacramentalibus, debetur cultus latriae; Beatae Mariae Virgini cultus hyperduliae; aliis cum Christo in caelo regnantibus cultus duliae.

§ 2. Sacris quoque reliquiis atque imaginibus veneratio et cultus debetur relativus personae ad quam reliquiae imaginesque referuntur.

§ 1. To the Blessed Trinity as well as to each of the three Persons, to Christ our Lord, also under the sacramental species, is due the cult of latria; to the Blessed Virgin Mary, the cult of hyperdulia; to the other Saints reigning with Christ in heaven, the cult of dulia.

Latria, from the Greek word λατρεύω, means service, worship; dulia, from δουλεία, also signifies service. From this it may be seen that the original etymology hardly indicates an essential distinction between the two terms. It was the theologians who introduced this well-known distinction.

The difference between dulia (including hyperdulia) and latria is as vast as the gulf that separates the creature from its Creator. The relation between dulia and latria, like that between creature and Creator, is purely analogical. Their formal objects are separate and distinct. The formal object of latria is the virtus religionis, or virtue of religion, which is based upon justice; that of dulia the virtus observantiae, as St. Thomas says.[1] This distinction is sufficient to disprove the odious charge, sometimes made against Catholics, that they adore the Virgin Mary and the Saints. Of its very nature the 1 Summa Theol., II–II, q. 102 sq.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

worship we give to the Saints has nothing in common with idolatry.[2]

§ 2. To the sacred relics and images a relative veneration and worship are due, in as far as these relics and images refer to persons. The dulia which we exhibit to the person of a Saint is absolute, in contradistinction to the merely relative worship which we give to relics and images. Another essential difference is that relics and images, being inanimate objects, may be venerated but not invoked. "Honor or reverence," says St. Thomas, "is due solely to rational creatures; those devoid of reason can be honored or reverenced only with respect to some rational nature."[3] Thus it would not be impious or unlawful to venerate the image of God the Father seated on a throne, which may be placed in a Christian temple.[4] For the veneration or worship is exhibited not to the image as such — this would be sheer idolatry or fetichism — but to the Sacred Person of God the Father.

Here a few rules may be given concerning the veneration of the Holy Cross and other instruments of the Passion and death of our Lord. If a relic of the true Cross is exposed publicly and in a visible or perceptible way, a genuflection on one knee is made in accessu et recessu, as often as the faithful or clergy pass by the middle of the altar. The priest who incenses the sacred relics also makes the genuflection on one knee, but incenses it standing. If the sacred relic is hidden in a tabernacle or custody, the head is bowed.[5] Sacred thorns receive the same signs of veneration as relics of the Holy Cross.[6]

2 Pohle-Preuss, Mariology, 1914, p. 140.

3 Summa Theol., III, q. 25, art. 4; Pohle-Preuss, l. c., p. 141.

4 Prop. 25 damn., Dec. 7, 1690 (Denzinger, n. 1182).

5 S. Rit. C., May 7, 1846; March 29, 1869; May 23, 1835 (nn. 2391, 3201, 2722).

6 S. Rit. C., Sept. 7, 1897 (n. 3966).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Before the Crucifix (without relics of the Holy Cross) a bow is sufficient (inclinatio profunda), but from the adoratio crucis on Good Friday to the None of Holy Saturday, inclusively, a genuflection on one knee is made.[7] To sacred linens miraculously soaked with the species of the sacred blood, the same signs of veneration are paid as to the relics of the true Cross, and to the same extent.[8] The image of the Infant Jesus (Bambin' Gesu), exposed on the main altar during Christmas time, is incensed like the Cross.[9]

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE WORSHIP

CAN. 1256

Cultus, si deferatur nomine Ecclesiae a personis legitime ad hoc deputatis et per actus ex Ecclesiae institutione Deo, Sanctis ac Beatis tantum exhibendos, dicitur publicus; sin minus, privatus.

Worship exhibited to God, the Saints, and the Blessed Virgin in the name of the Church, by ministers lawfully appointed for that purpose and through acts established by the Church, is called public; otherwise it is private.

Note here three requisites for public worship: it must be offered (1) in the name of the Church, (2) by her ministers (3) by acts established by her. For instance, veneration may be paid to a person who died in the odor of sanctity by pious persons, but it cannot be called a public cult before the person has been declared a Saint or Blessed;[10] such a cult would be purely private and of very doubtful merit. Again prayers may be publicly re-

7 S. Rit. C., May 9, 1857 (n. 3049).

8 S. Rit. C., June 27, 1868 (n. 3176).

9 S. Rit. C., Feb. 15, 1873 (n. 3288).

10 Cfr. Bened. XIV, "Quamvis justo," April 30, 1749, § 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cited, but if they are not approved by the Church, they have a private character.

APPROBATION OF THE LITURGY

CAN. 1257

Unius Apostolicae Sedis est tum sacram ordinare liturgiam, tum liturgicos approbare libros.

The Apostolic See alone has the right to prescribe the sacred liturgy and to approve liturgical books.

Hence neither patriarchal nor cathedral nor collegiate chapters may change or add anything to the liturgical books.[11] Neither archbishops nor bishops — still less, of course, inferior prelates — may act as judges in answering doubts concerning sacred rites and ceremonies.[12] This, of course, must be understood of authentic answers. If one has consulted the rubrics and looked up the authentic decrees of the S. Congregation of Rites, he may state what in his opinion has been authentically decided. A bishop cannot extend to the whole diocese the office of a Saint who is venerated in the cathedral church.[13]

Concerning the liturgical books, the following general decree [14] serves as a guide.

1. The liturgical books, as far as they require official approbation, are: the Roman Breviary, the Missal, the Ritual, the Pontifical and excerpts from them, as well as the Roman martyrology. Then, the Caeremoniale Episcoporum, the propria of the Breviary and the Missal of a diocese, a religious order or a congregation, the Memo-

11 S. Rit. C., May 2, 1612 (n. 297).

12 S. Rit. C., June 11, 1605 ad 1 (n. 179).

13 S. Rit. C., Jan. 16, 1607 (n. 225).

14 S. Rit. C., May 17, 1911 (n. 4266).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

riale of Benedict XIII for smaller churches, the Instructio Clementina for Forty Hours' Devotion, the Collectio Decretorum S. Rit. C.

2. The editions of these books are either typicae or iuxta typicas. The typical editions may be printed only by the Vatican Press or by publishers who have obtained that privilege from the S. Congregation of Rites. The same Congregation revises every single sheet of the typical edition, and every typical edition must contain the decree of the S. Rit. C., certifying that this edition is a typical one and that editors must conform their editions to it.

Editors, after issuing a typical edition, must send two copies thereof to the S. Rit. C., in whose archives they are preserved.

3. Any publisher may, with the consent and approval of the Ordinary, print editions called iuxta typicas, provided they agree perfectly with the typical edition. To make sure of this the Ordinaries shall appoint a revisor or censor, who shall carefully compare each edition with the typica and grant the imprimatur only after it is found a faithful copy thereof.

4. If there is no typical edition of the propria Missarum or Officiorum of a diocese, the local Ordinary in whose diocese they are printed, shall declare them conformable to the original and give the imprimatur. As to the propria of a strange diocese, and those of religious orders and congregations, the local Ordinaries to whose jurisdiction the editors (typographi) belong, shall give the imprimatur, after the Ordinary of the strange diocese or the religious superior to whom the propria pertain, shall have deciared that the edition is conformable to the original.

The rules for publishers of typical editions as well as

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reprints of liturgical books are laid down in the Constitutions of Pius V, Clement VIII, and Urban VIII, which are contained in the preface to every Roman Breviary. These rules must be accurately followed even as to punctuation, grammatical rules, position and sequence of hymns, chapters, and so forth.[15]

Manuals of sisterhoods which are used for the investiture of novices and for making the religious profession must be approved by the Holy See, or at least by the Ordinary.[16] The formula of profession must be contained in the Constitutions.

COMMUNICATIO IN SACRIS

CAN. 1258

§ 1. Haud licitum est fidelibus quovis modo active assistere seu partem habere in sacris acatholicorum.

§ 2. Tolerari potest praesentia passiva seu materialis, civilis officii vel honoris causa, ob gravem rationem ab Episcopo in casu dubii probandam, in acatholicorum funeribus, nuptiis similibusque sollemniis, dummodo perversionis et scandali periculum absit.

It is unlawful for Catholics to assist actively in any way at, or to take part in, the religious services of non-Catholics. A passive or merely material presence may be tolerated, for reasons of civil duty or honor, at funerals, weddings, and similar celebrations, provided no danger of perversion or scandal arises from this assistance. In doubtful cases the reason for assisting must be grave, and recognized as such by the bishop.

15 S. Rit. C., April 26, 1834; March 11, 1871 (nn. 2716, 3241).

16 S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1857, ad XVI (n. 3059) — which proves the necessity of uniformity; the Sisters changed Ps. 19: Exaudiat te Dominus in die professionis," instead of tribulationis; in the Libera they sang: "Tremens facta sum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This is the so-called communicatio in sacris activa cum acatholicis. The reason why the Church has always forbidden such participation in the religious services of non-Catholics is the intimate conviction that she herself is the only true Church of Christ. Secondary reasons for this prohibition are: the quasi-approbation of non-Catholic worship which lies in a Catholic's participation therein and which at the same time is an external profession of faith. The other reason is scandal, which may be given to Catholics who see the mixture of worship and the deference paid to non-Catholic ministers and functions. Finally there is the danger of perversion, or of gradually increasing religious indifference when the faithful freely and indiscriminately participate in heretical religious services. Even the simulation of false religion is incompatible with the purity of the Catholic faith.[17] Hence:

(a) The Sacrament of Baptism can never be lawfully received from a non-Catholic minister; nor is it allowed to offer a child for baptism to such a minister, even if the child was first baptized by a Catholic minister and the heretical ceremony is admitted in order to avoid a fine.[18] Neither are Catholics allowed to assist as sponsors, either personally or by proxy, at a baptism conferred by a non-Catholic minister.[19]

(b) Confirmation may not be administered to such as are compelled by a non-Catholic parent to assist at heretical services.[20]

(c) The Holy Eucharist may not be received at the hands or in the temples of non-Catholics, nor are Catholics allowed to assist at the Mass of schismatics; if they 17 S. O., Aug. 28, 1780; S. C. P. F., 1729 (Coll., nn. 546, 311).

18 S. O., Sept. 26, 1668; Nov. 29, 1672 (ibid., nn. 169, 205).

19 S. O., May 10, 1770; Jan. 3, 1871 (nn. 478, 1362).

20 S. O., Aug. 28, 1780 (ibid., n. 546).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

have no church of their own, they are not bound to hear Mass on the days prescribed.[21] Concerning the visiting of churches of non-Catholics, the Holy Office has decided as follows: Catholics may enter non-Catholic temples merely from curiosity, without participating in the services and provided they have no evil intention. An evil intention would exist if a Catholic would visit a Protestant church for the purpose of assisting at a religious function, or of participating in sacris, or if the government had commanded such visits as a sign of religious indifference, or if the public would regard such a visit as a sign of an interior conviction that there is no distinction between Catholics and non-Catholics.[22] To the point is another decision of the same Holy Office regarding former conditions in schismatical Russia, where officials compelled pupils to assist at schismatical functions. Their assistance was declared an unlawful participatio in sacris, which teachers of religion cannot tolerate in silence. Therefore they must warn the children and parents of the wrong, and only in case of their being in good faith may they omit a second warning, and grant them absolution, provided always that there is no scandal.[23]

(d) Confession may be made to a heretical or schismatic minister only when there is danger of death, provided that no scandal be given, that no other priest be present, that there be no danger of perversion, and that the non-Catholic administer the sacrament in valid form, i. e., secundum ritus Ecclesiae.[24]

(e) Under no conditions is it permitted to receive holy orders from a non-Catholic minister.[25]

21 S. O., Dec. 5, 1668 (n. 171).

22 S. O., Jan. 13, 1818 (ib., n. 727, ad 2).

23 S. O., April 26, 1894 (ib., n. 1868).

24 S. O., July 7, 1864, ad 6 (n. 1257).

25 S. O., Nov. 21, 1709 (n. 278): "Alias sunt irregulares et suspensi"; suspension is stated in can.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(f) Concerning marriage enough has been said under can. 1063.

(g) An oath imposed by the government may be administered by a non-Catholic minister and be taken by Catholics if said minister acts merely as an official and wears no stole or insignia of his creed.[26]

(h) Here an instruction[27] of practical value, not so much in our country, as in countries where the government compels officials and also bishops to assist at religious ceremonies conducted by non-Catholics, or to hold services in Catholic churches. It is never allowed for any bishop to go to a schismatical church to take part in the sacred functions or to chant the doxology. Government officials are not to be disturbed if they go to these churches, provided no Mass is said, and they take no part in the doxology. Catholic bishops if invited by the governor to have a celebration in the Catholic churches shall content themselves with singing the "Te Deum" and holding benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. This may be done with the intention of praying for the spiritual and temporal welfare of people and ruler. But the bishops shall abstain from Pontificals or singing Mass, lest the non-Catholic civil authorities should assist and incense and the "pax" should have to be offered them, which is by no means allowed.

§ 2 permits a passive or merely material assist-

2372, and irregularity follows suspension if can. 985, n. 7 is verified.

26 S. O., April 1, 1857 (n. 1133). In the province of Quebec (Canada) Protestant bibles were used in administering oaths; only the clergy were permitted to give oath by holding the hand to the breast. The Holy Office declared that the faithful should not be disturbed; Feb. 23, 1820. On another occasion (for British India) the S. C. P. F. asked that the ecclesiastical authorities should demand freedom to swear on the Catholic Bible, but as long as this could not be obtained, they should keep silent; Sept. 8, 1869 (Coll., nn. 739, 1346); somewhat different Sabetti-Barrett, Theol. Moral., ed. 27a, pp. 226 f.

27 S. O., May 12, 1841 (n. 921).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ance at funerals, weddings and similar festivals. What does that assistance involve or admit? Concerning funerals the decisions are quite distinct. No religious act or ritual participation is permitted. Hence Catholics are not supposed to recite public prayers or carry torches or candles, etc., for the souls of deceased non-Catholics.[28] At weddings there is hardly more than a mere passive assistance, even for witnesses.[29] In Japan and other pagan countries, where at funerals the pagan priests are first called in to perform their rites, the faithful must abstain from any participation in these ceremonies, but may bury their dead according to their own ritual.[30]

Civilis officii vel honoris causa means civil duty or respect due to the dead or to the person who is the object of the ceremony at a wedding or similar festivity, for instance, the birthday of a ruler's son or a thanksgiving celebration. When a non-Catholic ruler dies, the clergy may assist in a body, outside the church, at the funeral procession, but without sacred vestments, i. e., without stole and surplice, although in cassock, when no scandal is given or when it may be removed.[31] At the coronation of King Edward VII his Catholic subjects were allowed to enter Westminster Abbey because of the personal presence of the King, but in India Catholics were not permitted to enter the temples of non-Catholics because the King was not present. Besides, Catholics were permitted to sing the Te Deum, but not the solemn Mass,[32] in their own churches. If a non-Catholic relative or a good friend of a Catholic pastor dies, is the latter allowed to assist at the funeral? He may do so, but is not allowed 28 S. O., Jan. 13, 1818; June 30, July 7, 1864 (Coll. P. F., nn. 727; 1257 ad 1).

29 S. O., June 22, 1859 (n. 1176).

30 S. O., March 11, 1868 (n. 1328).

31 S. O., Aug. 1, 1900 (n. 2089).

32 S. C. P. F., April 25, 1902 (n. 2136).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to wear the insignia, i. e., surplice and stole, and must take no active part in the ceremonies of the non-Catholic rite.[33]

Difficulties may arise concerning coöperation in the divine services of Catholics who are employed by non-Catholics as singers or organists. Although we could find no specific decision with regard to Catholic singers at non-Catholic services, it is evident that the Church cannot tolerate such a formal coöperation, for to that it would certainly amount. Besides, if it is forbidden for a Catholic to play the organ at non-Catholic services — which has been formally decided[34] — it naturally follows that Catholics may not sing at such functions. The Church has been more lenient lately with regard to admitting non-Catholics as singers and organists at Catholic services. Thus, in 1889, the Holy Office wished the abuse to be eliminated as soon as possible, in 1906 it made a concession for Bulgaria, in favor of sisterhoods whose non-Catholic pupils were admitted to sing in their chapels.[35]

The present canon only forbids active assistance at, or participation in, the religious services of non-Catholics. Therefore those who contribute to the building of non-Catholic churches or help to erect them as architects, contractors, or workingmen are not concerned here. The Holy Office[36] has indeed declared that no such contributions are allowed, but at the same time urged that those who build synagogues and heretical temples are not to be 33 S. O., May 8, 1889 (n. 1705).

34 S. C. P. F., July 8, 1889 (n. 1713): "Cum ibi falsum cultum exercent." Exception might be made for school exercises or purely civil celebrations held in non-Catholic churches, provided they have no religious feature attached; for in that case there would be no "exercise of false worship."

35 S. O., May 1, 1889; Jan. 24, 1906 (Coll. P. F., n. 1703, 2227).

36 S. O., June 30, July 7, 1864, ad 8–10 (ib., n. 1257). Stricter is the instruction of the Card. Vic. Urbis, of July 12, 1878; but this concerns Rome only and cannot be generalized, because conditions are different elsewhere.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

disquieted, provided such edifices are not erected to spite or provoke Catholics. But, as stated, even contributions are not excluded by our canon. Besides it would be almost impossible, in our country at least, to carry such a prohibition into effect. Business men especially cannot be expected to ignore or offend their non-Catholic patrons.

APPROBATION OF DEVOTIONS AND LITANIES

CAN. 1259

§ 1. Orationes et pietatis exercitia ne permittantur in ecclesiis vel oratoriis sine revisione et expressa Ordinarii loci licentia, qui in casibus difficilioribus rem totam Sedi Apostolicae subiiciat.

§ 2. Loci Ordinarius nequit novas litanias approbare publice recitandas.

Prayers and devotions are not to be permitted in churches and oratories without previous revision by, and express permission of, the local Ordinary, who shall report more difficult cases to the Apostolic See. The local Ordinaries cannot approve new litanies which are to be publicly recited. A bishop must and may revise all kinds of devotions, and if there is doubt whether the prayers or invocations comply with the dogmatic and traditional requirements, he shall refer the matter to the Holy Office,[37] which, if merely ritual doubts exist, shall report to the S. Congregation of Rites. Concerning litanies, first and above all, no new ones are allowed. Only those may be recited publicly which are contained in the Breviary or in the new edition of the Roman Ritual, approved by the Holy See.[38]

37 The veneration of the Holy Face of our Saviour is given to the traditional representation, and no special pictures are preferred; S. O., May 4, 1892 (n. 1792).

38 S. Rit. C., March 6, 1894 (Dec.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

To these approved litanies no additions can lawfully be made. Thus neither new "Saints," even though they be titular or patron saints, nor versicles or other prayers not contained in said additions are to be added.[39] Religious are allowed to add the name of the founder or patriarch, but the name of no other Saint of their order or congregation.[40] Nor is the addition of special invocations allowed in the litany of the Blessed Virgin.[41] Neither is the name of any saint or invocation, as contained in the approved editions to be omitted in the recitation.[42] Even quasi-invocations recited in the form of a Litany are forbidden.[43]

§ 2 of our canon says: publice recitandas, to be recited publicly. This term was, especially after the decree of March 6, 1894, made the object of doubts, which were dispersed by the S. Congregation. Thus it would be a public recitation if several of the faithful would gather in a church or public oratory to recite together a litany, although the minister of the Church would assist only as a private person, not as a minister. Thus to recite a non-approved litany is, therefore, forbidden.[44] Neither are Sisters or nuns allowed to recite such litanies in common in their choir, even though this be separated from the church by a grate.[45] Single religious may recite or chant

Auth., n. 3820); no litany of St. Anthony, or of the Holy Family, or of La Salette has so far been approved; S. Rit. C., Jan. 29, 1656; Feb. 11, 1898; May 12, 1877 (ibid., nn. 995, 3980, 3419).

39 S. Rit. C., March 8, 1631; May 31, 1821, ad 7 (nn. 562, 2613).

40 S. Rit. C., June 16, 1674; Feb. 11, 1702; Aug. 2, 1631 (nn. 1518, 2093, 576).

41 S. Rit. C., Aug. 2, 1631 (n. 576); additions approved are: auxilium christianorum (S. Rit. C., Sept. 15, 1815); Regina SSmi Rosarii (Dec. 10, 1883, nn. 2566, 3598); Regina pacis (May 5, 1917).

42 S. Rit. C., Sept. 11, 1847 n. 1 (n. 2956).

43 S. Rit. C., Aug. 24, 1880 (n. 3523).

44 S. Rit. C., June 1, 1896 (n. 3916).

45 S. Rit. C., June 20, 1896 (n. 3917).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

such litanies for their private devotion, but not in common.[46]

The approved litanies are: the Litany of All Saints, according to the general tenor and the formula for the Forty Hours' Devotion; the Litany of the Holy Name of Jesus[47]; the Litany of the Sacred Heart, approved April 2, 1899; the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary, known as that of Loreto; the Litany of St. Joseph, and the Litany for the Dying (in ordine commendationis animae).

INDEPENDENCE FROM SECULAR INTERFERENCE

CAN. 1260

Ecclesiae ministri in cultu exercendo unice a Superioribus ecclesiasticis dependere debent.

This canon is a well deserved rebuke of the arrogant bearing of the regalists, as well as of the modern oppressors of ecclesiastical liberty in matters of divine worship. Benedict XIV, although prone to make concessions, admonished the hierarchy of his time never to allow the lay power to command public prayers to be said for them, either as a thanksgiving or in case of necessity. And he exhorted the bishops to speak like Hosius of Corduba to the emperor Constantius: "Do not interfere in things ecclesiastical, nor command in that kind; but rather learn from us. God gave you the reins of government, but to us He has entrusted what pertains to the Church."[48] The government may ask, but not command. Neither are pastors allowed simply to comply with the

46 S. Rit. C., Feb. 11, 1898 (n. 3981).

47 With the addition: "Per SSmae Eucharistiae institutionem tuam libera nos, Jesu," after "Per ascensionem tuam"; S. Rit. C., Feb. 8, 1905 (n. 4153).

48 "Quemadmodum," March 23, 1743.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

arrogant edicts of an ignorant board of health, or city council, or mayor, or governor, or even president. Everything must be done through the proper channels. The hierarchy shall comply with the reasonable wishes of the public or civil authorities. Authority to decide whether and what kind of prayers are to be said, belongs to those who are ordained in the things that appertain to God, to offer gifts and sacrifices.[49] Pius X had to complain of Portugal, the so-called republic, which severed the tie that connected it with the Church. How iniquitous was the law concerning the "associations of cult" is evident, for it entrusted the whole care of divine worship to associations of laymen, from which clergymen were rigidly excluded.[50] There are two societies, the spiritual and the temporal, with entirely different spheres, rights, and claims. What is purely spiritual, as divine worship, appertains solely to the society set up for religious purposes.

DUTY OF THE ORDINARY

CAN. 1261

§ 1. Locorum Ordinarii advigilent ut sacrorum canonum praescripta de divino cultu sedulo observentur, et praesertim ne in cultum divinum sive publicum sive privatum aut in quotidianam fidelium vitam superstitiosa ulla praxis inducatur, aut quidquam admittatur a fide alienum vel ab ecclesiastica traditione absonum vel turpis quaestus speciem praeseferens.

§ 2. Si loci Ordinarius leges pro suo territorio hac in re tulerit, etiam religiosi omnes, exempti quoque, obligatione tenentur easdem servandi; et Ordinarius pot-

49 Heb. 5, 1.
50 "Iamdudum," May 24, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 219).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

est eorundem ecclesias vel publica oratoria in hunc finem visitare.

The local Ordinaries should carefully see to it (1) that the regulations laid down in the sacred canons on divine worship are properly observed; especially (2) that no superstitious practices be introduced into the public or private divine worship or into the daily life of the faithful; (3) that nothing be admitted which is contrary to faith or ecclesiastical tradition, or which savors of shameful money-making.

The remark concerning superstitious practices is intended especially for missionary countries, as is manifest from the fact that most of the papal Constitutions [51] as well as the decisions of the Roman Congregations adduced here have in view the aforesaid countries. "Superstition," says St. Thomas,[52] "is a vice opposed to religion by excess, not as if it would offer more worship to God, but because it offers worship to those to whom it is not due, or in an unlawful manner." This is the case with ancestor worship [53] in China and other superstitious practices mentioned in the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Omnium sollicitudinum," Sept. 12, 1744. There is always danger that missionaries will connive at such practices in order to swell the number of converts. The essence of all these practices is formal and willful coöperation in idolatry. The faithful may be present when the pagans perform their rites for the dead, provided they take no active part in them and protest as much as they can.[54] They may eat of the food prepared for idols if it is dished up with other foods, and the banquet takes place

51 Cfr. Coll. P. F., nn. 347, 349.

52 Summa Theol., II–II, q. 92, art. 1.

53 S. C. P. F., Jan. 14, 1753 (n. 386).

54 S. O., March 23, 1656 (ibid., n. 126).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

far away from any pagan place of worship.[55] But they are not allowed to assist at the meals of gentiles prepared in commemoration of the dead.[56] Catholics may sell chickens, eggs, plots for cemeteries, etc., provided the sale is not strictly and knowingly made for superstitious purposes or with superstitious rites.[57] But they are not allowed to contribute to, or aid in, the building of pagan temples, even though they protest against compulsion and comply in order to avoid persecution.[58]

But pagan countries are not the only ones which are in danger of superstitious practices. There are so-called pious superstitions even in Christian communities. Thus it is irreverent, to say the least, and unbecoming, to throw relics of the true Cross, or other relics, even if included in a reliquary, into the river, or to moisten them, in order to obtain rain.[59] New and non-approved devotions are the cult of the heart of St. Joseph and the veneration of the B. V. Mary under the title of the Cross.[60]

Omitting other silly practices,[61] which abound among Southern people more than in the sober North, we must mention Spiritism. It would be disastrous to regard this serious menace as a joke. Newspapers, magazines, and books are now making a regular propaganda for the dangerous new sect. Hence the Holy Office has justly forbidden Catholics to assist at spiritistic séances, whether with or without a medium or the use of hypnotism, even though the sittings have an honest purpose or bear the semblance of piety, no matter whether the souls or spirits

55 S. O., Dec. 15, 1768 (n. 470).
56 S. C. P. F., Jan. 14, 1753 (n. 386).
57 S. C. P. F., Jan. 21, 1778; April 5, 1785 (nn. 526, 575).
58 S. O., Sept. 5, 1736 (n. 320).
59 S. Rit. C., Jan. 16, 1619; Sept. 12, 1769 (Dec. Auth., nn. 369, 2486).
60 S. Rit. C., June 14, 1873; Feb. 23, 1894 (ibid., nn. 3304, 3818).
61 S. O., Aug. 3, 1903 (Coll. P. F., n. 2173): to dissolve paper pictures of the B. V. Mary in water or form them into pills to obtain health.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the dead are invoked or whether the answers are simply heard, or even if the parties simply look on and protest either tacitly or explicitly that they will have nothing to do with evil spirits.[62] Fortune telling and clairvoyance are also strictly forbidden.

§ 2 obliges religious, no matter how exempt they may be, to abide by the laws which the local Ordinary makes for his territory. The same Ordinary is entitled to visit their churches and public oratories for the purpose of this canon. We have here an old law, enforced by the Council of Trent,[63] and no appeal is permissible.[64]

SEPARATE SEATS FOR MEN AND WOMEN IN CHURCH

CAN. 1262

§ 1. Optandum ut, congruenter antiquae disciplinae, mulieres in ecclesia separatae sint a viris.

§ 2. Viri in ecclesia vel extra ecclesiam, dum sacris ritibus assistunt, nudo capite sint, nisi aliud ferant probati populorum mores aut peculiaria rerum adiuncta; mulieres autem, capite cooperto et modeste vestitae, maxime quum ad mensam Dominicam accedunt.

§ 1. Conformable to ancient discipline, it is desirable that the women should be separated from the men in church. The very division of the ancient basilica singled out the vestibule for the penitents; the catechumens were usually admitted to the rear of the nave; the faithful occupied the side aisles, the men on the right side of the entrance, the women on the left. Those who were held in 62 S. O., April 24, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 268); for further literature see Raupert, The New Black Magic, 1919; Liljencrants, Spiritism and Religion, 1918.

63 Sess. 21, c. 8 de ref.; sess. 22 de observ. et evit.

64 Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

special honor by the congregation, as widows and virgins, and those who, on account of age or social position, were entitled to peculiar regard, had their place in the forward end of the aisles or in the transept. The different orders of the clergy were in turn distinguished, the bishop had his seat in the middle of the apsidal circle, while the presbyters were seated on either side of him, but at a lower level, the deacons stood near the altar and the inferior clergy had their place with the choir in the nave.[65] In this country it will, we fear, be difficult to carry out this "desire" of the Church, on account of our custom of family pews.

§ 2. The men should assist at sacred functions, either in or outside of the church, with their heads uncovered, unless a reasonable national custom or special circumstances justify a departure from this rule. The women, on the other hand, should cover their heads and be dressed modestly, especially when they approach the Lord's table.

Those especially who, like our trustees, carry the canopy over the Blessed Sacrament, or reliquaries, or sacred statues, should walk bareheaded.[66]

In China the wearing of a cap or hat is a sign of respect and honor, and therefore the Church does not insist upon this disciplinary rule there.[67] An old-fashioned blizzard on the prairies may constitute a "special circumstance," justifying the wearing of a warm cap in church. The rule that women should cover their heads is doubtless taken from St. Paul's Epistle.[68] It applies whenever they attend sacred functions, even from a window which separates them from the place of worship.[69] Concerning 65 Lowrie, Monuments of the Early Church, 1901, p. 105 f.

66 S. Rit. C., Sept. 25, 1688; June 18, 1689; Sept. 2, 1690 (nn. 1800, 1810, 1841).

67 S. C. P. F., Oct. 18, 1883, nn. XV f. (Coll., n. 1606).

68 1 Cor. 11, 4 ff.

69 S. Rit. C., July 7, 1876, ad IV.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google decency of dress nothing need be said, since the general rules of Christian modesty suffice.

DISTINGUISHED SEATS IN CHURCH

CAN. 1263

§ 1. Potest magistratibus, pro eorum dignitate et gradu, locus in ecclesia esse distinctus, ad normam legum liturgicarum.

§ 2. Sine expresso Ordinarii loci consensu nemo fidelis locum habeat in ecclesia sibi suisque reservatum; Ordinarius autem consensum ne praebeat, nisi ceterorum fidelium commoditati sit sufficienter consultum.

§ 3. Ea semper factis in concessionibus inest tacita conditio, ut Ordinarius possit, ex iusta causa, concessionem revocare, non obstante quolibet temporis decursu.

§ 1. A distinguished place or seat in the church may be reserved for the civil magistrates, according to their dignity and rank. However, the liturgical laws must never be disregarded. These laws are summed up in the Cæremoniale Episcoporum.[70] There we read that the seats reserved for nobles and illustrious laymen, magistrates and princes, no matter whether of the highest or the lowest rank, should be placed outside the sanctuary or presbytery. Some princes and governors were very arrogant in this matter, and some bishops too lenient. The S. Congregation of Rites has always referred to the Cæremoniale. Princes, magistrates, etc., may have a predella or kneeling bench and a special seat covered with a tapestry or upholstered, but always outside the choir or sanctuary, and no canopy is allowed.[71] They may also, in their proper place, be given the "pax cum instrumento" and two swings of the censer, but these must not be offered by the minister of the Holy Sacrifice, but by a chaplain dressed in surplice.[72] If the magistrates wish to have a seat and kneeling bench in the choir, they must obtain a special papal indult.[73] A concordat not ratified by the Holy See can not confer this privilege.[74] It is an intolerable abuse for laymen to occupy the choir stalls of the canons during divine service.[75] All these laws must be observed also by exempt religious, and should they dare to violate them, the bishop may proceed against them by censures.[76]

70 Lib. 1, c. XIII, n. 13 (ed. Pustet, 1886, p. 58).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. No Catholic may, without the express consent of the diocesan Ordinary, have a seat reserved for himself and his family in church, and the Ordinary shall not give his consent unless he is certain that the rest of the faithful can be conveniently seated. This, of course, does not mean that the renting of pews is forbidden. For the source whence this law is taken, speaks of a citizen who occupies two, or three, or more pews (scamna), while others have to stand. This decision gives the bishop the right to see to it that such unqualified disregard for the rights of others is prevented.[77] From this it is clear that pastors need not worry about the lawfulness of pew-rent, which is common in our country, but they should see to it that all the faithful are conveniently seated.

§ 3. All these concessions contain the tacit condition

71 S. Rit. C., May 23, 1639; Dec. 15, 1640 (Dec. Auth., nn. 680, 726).

72 S. Rit. C., Jan. 15, 1661 (n. 1187).

73 S. Rit. C., July 8 and 18, 1654 (n. 959 f.).

74 S. Rit. C., March 12, 1689 (n. 1808).

75 S. Rit. C., Feb. 21, 1604 (n. 157).

76 S. Rit. C., March 13, 1688; April 22, 1690 (nn. 1792, 1831).

77 S. Rit. C., Dec. 11, 1604 (n. 174).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that the Ordinary may revoke them for a just cause and that no prescription confers a permanent right. For laymen, even by paying pew-rent for a number of years, acquire no personal right to pews or seats.[78]

Conformable to this canon are most statute laws of this country. Pew rights are all "a matter of bargain, and entirely conventional between the trustees and those individuals who wish to become hearers or members of the society and to have seats in the church."[79] The pew-holder's rights are not absolute, but subordinate to, and limited by, the superior rights of the owner of the building, and may even be affected by by-laws passed after he has acquired his right. It follows that the civil courts cannot decide otherwise than according to the church law.

CHURCH MUSIC

CAN. 1264

§ 1. Musicae in quibus sive organo aliisve instrumentis sive cantu lascivum aut impurum aliquid misceatur, ab ecclesiis omnino arceantur; et leges liturgicae circa musicam sacram serventur.

§ 2. Religiosae mulieres, si eisdem liceat, ad normam suarum constitutionum vel legum liturgicarum ac de venia Ordinarii loci, in propria ecclesia aut oratorio publico canere, tali e loco canant, ubi a populo conspici nequeant.

§ 1. All kinds of lascivious or impure music, whether accompanied by the organ or other instruments, or rendered vocally, must be entirely eliminated from the

78 S. Rit. C., Nov. 22, 1642 (n. 816).

79 Cfr. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 414 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google churches; and the liturgical laws concerning sacred music must be observed.

This is a repetition of an enactment of the Council of Trent [80] as well as of later papal constitutions. It is not within the sphere of a canonist to dwell upon the development of Church music, much less upon the finer "nuances" between the different kinds of music, Gregorian [81] or Plain Chant and polyphonic renderings. Suffice it to say that the Church has never condemned Polyphony, which began to come into being in the fourteenth century, when the Plain Chant commenced to decline.[82]

What is menat by lascivious and impure music? According to a decree of Alexander VII, of April 23, 1657, it signifies music which suggests the dance or profane rather than ecclesiastical ideas.[83] Benedict XIV complains that what is lawfully permitted to be sung is often treated theatrically and operatically, like a stage play.[84] The same Constitution permits the following musical instruments: violoncello and double bass, bassoon, viola and violins; but excludes drums, hunting horns, trumpets, oboes,[85] flutes and picolos, piano, mandolins and such like, which savor of the theatre. Instruments are allowed only to strengthen the voice parts, so as to lead the mind more forcibly to the contemplation of divine things and the love of God. Finally, the sensuous and improper qualities of church music are negatively described in the well known "Motu proprio" of Pius X, Nov. 22, 1903. There the 80 Sess. 22, de observ. et evit.

81 We leave the question open as to whether St. Gregory the Great may fully claim the title of "Father of the Plain Chant"; — adhuc sub iudice lis est.

82 Cfr. R. R. Terry, Catholic Church Music, London, 1907, p. 55.

83 Terry, l. c., p. 21.

84 "Annus qui," Feb. 19, 1749, § 2 ff.

85 However, oboes and clarinettes are moderately permitted; S. Rit. C., Nov. 13, 1908 (Dec. Auth., n. 4226); not allowed are chimes or peals together with the organ for liturgical service; S. Rit. C., May 18, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 352).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

great restorer of Christian ideals says: "Nothing, therefore, should have place in the temple that is calculated to disturb, or even merely to diminish, the piety and devotion of the faithful; nothing that may give reasonable cause for disgust or scandal; nothing, above all, which directly offends the decorum and the sanctity of the sacred functions, and is thus unworthy of the House of Prayer and the Majesty of God." [86]

Church music must be sacred music, and therefore exclude all profanity, not only in itself, but in the manner in which it is presented.[87] The whole instruction is noteworthy. We cull from it one more sentence (n. 22): "It is not lawful to keep the priest at the altar waiting on account of the chant or the music for a length of time not allowed by the liturgy."

The typical Vatican edition of the Graduale was approved Aug. 7, 1907, and all editors have to conform to that edition.[88] This edition must be used in the churches exclusively, even to the exclusion of the Medicæa.[89] Various other decrees were issued to give weight to the Motu proprio of Pius X. The quintessence of these is that the Vatican edition of the Graduale Romanum is the typical one, with which all others must agree, since the rhythmic signs (signa rythmica) are fully contained in said edition.[90] Other editions which, though accurately presenting the melodies of the Vaticana, have special rhythmic signs appended by private authority, may be used as subsidiary aids by the singers, and for these the 86 Dec. Auth., n. 4121; Terry, l. c., p. 9.

87 Terry, l. c., p. 12.

88 Dec. Auth., n. 4203, see also nn. 4166, 4168, 4229.

89 S. Rit. C., April 8, 1908 (n. 4217).

90 S. Rit. C., Jan. 25, 1911 (n. 4259): the Vatican edition represents the signs, although not especially printed, by the distance of the neums, and thus indicates what is called the mora vocis.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Ordinaries may give their imprimatur, provided the other rules laid down in the decrees referring to Plain Chant are complied with.[91] In 1912 was approved the Antiphonale Diurnum Sacrosanctae Ecclesiae Romanae and edited by the Vatican Press the same year. To this also the liturgical rules and decrees referring to the Gradual must be applied.[92]

§ 2. Religious women, if their Constitutions or the liturgical laws and the local Ordinary permit them to do so, may sing in their own church or public oratory, but only in a place where they cannot be seen by the public.

It is hardly probable that nuns will again sing together with canons and monks, as was the case at the time of Innocent II, who complained [93] of this abuse, but certain regulations have been made concerning women singers in church choirs, which must be applied with discretion. Thus congregational singing by all the people, who thus take, as it were, the place of the choir (schola cantorum), does not exclude women and girls, provided they occupy a place distinct from that of the men, as far as possible.[94] Sisters or nuns are not supposed to mix with the congregation, but if they sing with the children entrusted to their care, there can be no reasonable objection to the practice. However, since mixed choirs, i. e., choirs composed of men and women, have not found favor with the S. Congregation,[95] it is perhaps not too much to say that Sisters should not take part in such choir singing.

Besides, according to the Instruction of Nov. 22, 1903,

91 S. Rit. C., April 11, 1911 (n. 4263); June 23, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 396 f.). These private editions are generally printed in modern notation.

92 S. Rit. C., Dec. 8, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 727).

93 Cfr. c. 25, § 1, C. 18, q. 2.

94 S. Rit. C., Jan. 17, 1908, ad II (n. 4216).

95 S. Rit. C., Dec. 18, 1908 (n. 4231). We notice that Card. Gasparri has not quoted the two decisions just mentioned. Is it perhaps because they are impossible of execution?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

n. 12–13, since the singers in church take the place of the ecclesiastical choir, women cannot be admitted to form part of the choir or of the musical chapel. Their place should be taken by boys, provided of course this regulation can be carried into effect. It takes time to train men and boys and to fill up the gaps caused by the dismissal of women. Some of our country churches would be as silent as a grave without the voices of women singers.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XV

RESERVATION AND WORSHIP OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT

CAN. 1265

§ 1. Sanctissima Eucharistia, dummodo adsit qui eius curam habeat et regulariter sacerdos semel saltem in hebdomada Missam in sacro loco celebret:

1.° Custodiri debet in ecclesia cathedrali, in ecclesia principe Abbatiae vel Praelaturae nullius, Vicariatus et Praefecturae Apostolicae, in qualibet ecclesia paroeciali vel quasi-paroeciali et in ecclesia adnexa domui religiosorum exemptorum sive virorum sive mulierum;

2.° Custodiri potest, de licentia Ordinarii loci, in ecclesia collegiata et in oratorio principali sive publico sive semi-publico tum domus piae aut religiosae, tum collegii ecclesiastici quod a clericis saecularibus vel a religiosis regatur.

§ 2. Ut in aliis ecclesiis seu oratoriis custodiri possit, necessarium est indultum apostolicum; loci Ordinarius hanc licentiam concedere potest tantummodo ecclesiae aut oratorio publico ex iusta causa et per modum actus.

§ 3. Nemini licet sanctissimam Eucharistiam apud se retinere aut secum in itinere deferre.

Provided there is a guard, and provided a priest says Mass regularly at least once a week in the sacred place:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° The Holy Eucharist must be kept in the cathedral church, the main church of an abbatial or prelatical territory nullius, of a Vicariate and Prefecture apostolic, in every parish and quasi-parish church, and in the church adjoining the house of exempt religious, either male or female.

2.° The Holy Eucharist may be kept, with the permission of the local Ordinary, in collegiate churches, in the principal public or semi-public oratories of charitable or religious houses, as well as in those of ecclesiastical colleges, in charge of either the secular or religious clergy.

In the earliest centuries, as ancient documents testify, the Holy Eucharist was kept by private persons and in private houses. But this custom ceased when the churches were no longer exposed to persecution and communities of faithful gathered around the cathedral as well as parish churches. The foremost reason for keeping the Blessed Sacrament is the necessity of administering it as viaticum to the sick. But the living also are entitled, especially now-a-days, to the privilege of receiving the Holy Eucharist. Lastly, the Real Presence naturally implies adoration.[1] The present legislation mitigates the former rigid laws or at least decisions,[2] which required papal indults.

A distinction is made between obligation and permission. The first paragraph of § 1 says: debet, the second, potest. The reason for this distinction is clear from the purpose of reservation, as stated above. Among the churches which must keep the Blessed Eucharist are those of exempt religious of both sexes, because they are parish churches for the members. However, it should be noted that canonical erection is required before a church

1 Cfr. Gasparri, De SSmo Euch., n. 972.

2 S. C. C., quoted by Gasparri, l. c. n. 980.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is allowed to keep the Blessed Sacrament.[3] Note, also, that the cathedral church is mentioned in general terms. This means that every cathedral church, even though it is not a parish church, must keep the Blessed Sacrament. Hence it may no longer be looked upon as a privilege,[4] but as an obligation. This is, to say the least, becoming because the cathedral church is, as it were, the parish church of the whole diocese.

Among the churches in which the Blessed Sacrament may be kept without special papal indult, and with the sole consent, either written or oral, explicit or tacit, of the local Ordinary, are the principal oratories of religious and charitable institutions. In each religious institution or house, therefore, one chapel, i. e., the main public or semi-public oratory, may keep the Holy Eucharist. Infirmary chapels or private oratories, even of prelates inferior to bishops, cannot preserve the Holy Eucharist without a special papal indult. Nor are religious allowed to keep the Blessed Sacrament in their rural chapels without an indult.[5]

Charitable institutions in whose principal chapels the Blessed Sacrament may be kept are, of course, those which are under ecclesiastical government.[6]

Observe the term local Ordinary. Hence the permission must be obtained, not from the prelate regular under whose jurisdiction or direction a sisterhood or brotherhood is placed, but from the diocesan Ordinary, by which name also the Vicar General may be understood.

The canon mentions two preliminary conditions: a guard and a priest who says Mass at least once a week, as a rule. It is not required that the one who keeps

3 Cfr. can. 496 f. and our Commentary, Vol. III, 82 ff.; S. Rit. C., April 16, 1644 (n. 860).

4 As formerly, see Gasparri, l. c.

5 S. C. C., Sept. 3, 1703; Gasparri, l. c., n. 978.

6 Cfr. can. 1489.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

watch at the church or chapel be a priest. He may be a layman,[7] and in religious communities no special guards are required because the community itself is the guard. But it is always required that a priest say Mass once a week, unless he is prevented by an accident. This rule was made in order to provide for the renewal of the sacred species and to safeguard the observation of the rubrics. Where the church is not adapted for the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament, either for lack of doors or windows, or want of safety, the S. C. has decided that the Blessed Sacrament should, on account of the sick, be kept in the parish residence or in the house of another priest.[8]

§ 2. To keep the Holy Eucharist in any other church or oratory besides those mentioned requires a papal indult. The local Ordinary may grant this permission only for churches and public oratories, for a just cause, and per modum actus.

Petitions asking for this privilege must be sent to the S. C. of Sacraments. Religious may address the S. C. of Religious, though the grant is always made by the former Congregation.

Which are the "other churches" mentioned in the text? They are, negatively, all churches not of the classes mentioned in § 1, 1°, and the collegiate churches named in § 1, n. 2. The term therefore comprises the churches of confraternities which are not erected in parish churches or in churches of exempt religious orders or which do not serve a charitable purpose, v. g., hospital or school work.[9]

The "other oratories" are all private oratories, with

7 S. Rit. C., Feb. 17, 1881 (n. 3517).

8 S. C. P. F., Aug. 23, 1852, ad 2 (Coll., n. 1079).

9 S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1626; June 14, 1646; Jan. 12, 1704 n. 26 (nn. 420, 895, 2123).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the exception of course of those located in the residences of cardinals or bishops, all semi-public oratories which do not serve as main chapel of a religious community or charitable institute, and all public oratories which belong to confraternities or sodalities; not, however, the oratories of pious associations, because these may reasonably claim the favor of § 1, n. 2.

The papal indult generally contains the clause: "provided that the chapel be decently furnished, that the Blessed Sacrament be safely kept, that a light be always kept burning before it, and that a priest says Mass there at least once a week.[10]

The Ordinary may grant this permission only to churches and public oratories, not to semi-public or private oratories. Besides he must demand a just reason, and can give the permission only per modum actus (see can. 1195). Such a reason for, and transient manner of, granting this permission would be repair work on the main church, or deficient seating capacity of the parish church, or some temporary physical impediment, like a flood, a fire, or an epidemic.

§ 3. No one is allowed to keep the Blessed Sacrament in his home or to carry it with him when travelling. If one would keep the Blessed Sacrament in his home for sinister purposes, such as magic, he would be open to the suspicion of heresy and liable to be denounced to the Holy Office.[11]

The custom of carrying the sacred host when travelling has long been given up, and the practice declared unlawful, even for missionaries.[12]

10 S. Rit. C., May 23, 1593 (n. 31) 1. Sometimes has been added the clause: "absque parochi, intra cuius parochiae fines existit, praeiudicio." May 14, 1889 (n. 3706).

11 S. C. P. F., Feb. 25, 1859 (Coll., n. 1171).

12 Gasparri, l. c., n. 971.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

OPEN CHURCHES

CAN. 1266

Ecclesiae in quibus sanctissima Eucharistia asservatur, praesertim paroeciales, quotidie per aliquot saltem horas fidelibus pateant.

Churches in which the Blessed Sacrament is kept, especially parish churches, should be open a few hours daily to the faithful. For one purpose of reservation is adoration of the Eucharistic Christ.

CAN. 1267

Revocato quolibet contrario privilegio, in ipsa religiosa vel pia domo sanctissima Eucharistia custodiri nequit, nisi vel in ecclesia vel in principali oratorio; nec apud moniales intra chorum vel septa monasterii.

In religious houses or charitable institutions the Holy Eucharist may be kept only in the church or principal oratory, and nowhere else; nuns are not allowed to keep it within the choir or convent enclosure. Every privilege to the contrary is hereby revoked.

THE BLESSED SACRAMENT ALTAR

CAN. 1268

§ 1. Sanctissima Eucharistia continuo seu habitualiter custodiri nequit, nisi in uno tantum eiusdem ecclesiae altari.

§ 2. Custodiatur in praecellentissimo ac nobilissimo ecclesiae loco ac proinde regulariter in altari maiore, nisi aliud venerationi et cultui tanti sacramenti commodius et decentius videatur, servato praescripto le-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gum liturgicarum quod ad ultimos dies hebdomadae maioris attinet.

§ 3. Sed in ecclesiis cathedralibus, collegiatis aut conventualibus in quibus ad altare maius chorales functiones persolvendae sunt, ne ecclesiasticis officiis impedimentum afferatur, opportunum est ut sanctissima Eucharistia regulariter non custodiatur in altari maiore, sed in alio sacello seu altari.

§ 4. Curent ecclesiarum rectores ut altare in quo sanctissimum Sacramentum asservatur sit prae omnibus aliis ornatum, ita ut suo ipso apparatu magis moveat fidelium pietatem ac devotionem.

§ 1. The Blessed Sacrament cannot be kept habitually on more than one altar of the same church.

This altar should be designated by the Ordinary,[13] and the rule laid down in this canon also binds regulars.[14] But an exception is made in favor of churches of perpetual adoration, which must have another tabernacle on another altar, where holy Communion may be distributed to the faithful.[15] Note the word habitually. During the Forty Hours' Devotion the Blessed Sacrament must also be kept on another, for instance, a side altar for the distribution of holy Communion. On this altar must be placed a movable tabernacle, and if no railing surrounds the altar, benches may be placed round about it to mark it off.[16] Of course, where there is no other altar, this expedient will not work, and the best thing to do is to have the other kind of Forty Hours' which permits of reposition every day, or else to construct a temporary altar with a movable tabernacle. The term habitually 13 S. Rit. C., July 21, 1696 (Dec. Auth., n. 1946).

14 S. Rit. C., March 14, 1861 (n. 3104).

15 S. Rit. C., May 18, 1878 (n. 3449).

16 S. Rit. C., Nov. 23, 1880 (n. 3525).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google admits of another departure from the general rule. Thus it is permitted to transfer the Blessed Sacrament from the usual to another altar during a triduum or novena, and in the months of May and June, and, we suppose, also in October, for the distribution of Holy Communion and Benediction.[17]

§ 2. The Blessed Sacrament should be kept in the most prominent place of honor, and therefore generally on the main altar, unless there is one more conveniently located and better suited for the veneration and cult of this holy Sacrament. But the rules regarding the last three days of Holy Week must be observed. The Blessed Sacrament may not be kept continually on the altar in the choir (altare chori), but it may be kept on side altars or in side chapels.[18]

The liturgical laws referred to are the rubrics and certain decrees concerning the triduum of Holy Week. One of these says that no sacred particles may be placed in the repository together with the Host to be used for the Missa Praesanctificatorum on Good Friday.[19] For the rest we must refer the student to the general rubrics.

§ 3. In cathedral, collegiate, and conventual churches in which the choir functions are held at the main altar, the Blessed Sacrament may as a rule be kept in another chapel or on another than the high altar, in order not to interfere with the services. The text says "opportunum," which per se does not imply a strict law. However, the S. Congregation, in one instance at least, refused to allow the Blessed Sacrament to be kept on the high altar of the cathedral church.[20] The Cæremoniale Epis-

17 S. Rit. C., June 2, 1883 (n. 3576).

18 S. Rit. C., April 26, 1901 (n. 4071).

19 S. Rit. C., Dec. 9, 1899, ad IV (n. 4049).

20 S. Rit. C., Feb. 6, 1875 (n. 3335).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

coporum prescribes removal of the Blessed Sacrament from the altar on which the bishop solemnly pontificates.[21]

§ 4. The rectors of churches shall take care that the altar on which the Blessed Sacrament is kept, be more elaborately decorated than the other altars, so that its very appearance may move the faithful to devotion.

We know of no special rules for the decoration of the sacramental altar, except that a light should burn before it[22] and the tabernacle be curtained. The Cæremoniale Episcoporum (l. I, c. 12, n. 8, 12) has in view pontifical functions. It certainly is becoming that the sacramental altar should be more elaborately decorated than the others. More candlesticks, more steps, flowers (when permitted), an antipendium, and similar ornaments permitted by the rubrics will help to draw the attention of the faithful to their Eucharistic Lord. The sacramental altar should be clearly distinguished from the altar of the Blessed Virgin, for the Hidden God must not stand back before even His noblest creature.

THE TABERNACLE

CAN. 1269

§ 1. Sanctissima Eucharistia servari debet in tabernaculo inamovibili in media parte altaris posito.

§ 2. Tabernaculum sit affabre exstructum, undequaque solide clausum, decenter ornatum ad normam legum liturgicarum, ab omni alia re vacuum, ac tam

21 Tit. 1, c. 12, n. 8. The reason for this rule lies in the ceremonies to be performed before the Pontiff. But if a cathedral church serves as parish church, it certainly is more convenient for the people that the Bl. Sacrament be kept on the main altar, neither is the law against this practice, because it is "opportune."

22 A canopy or curtain should be over the tabernacle; Rit. Rom., tit. IV, c. 1, n. 6. But it may frankly be stated that an artistic tabernacle often suffers from a cover.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sedulo custodiatur ut periculum cuiusvis sacrilegae profanationis arceatur.

§ 3. Gravi aliqua suadente causa ab Ordinario loci probata, non est vetitum sanctissimam Eucharistiam nocturno tempore extra altare, super corporali tamen, in loco tutiore et decenti, asservari, servato praescripto can. 1271.

§ 4. Clavis tabernaculi, in quo sanctissimum Sacramentum asservatur, diligentissime custodiri debet, onerata graviter conscientia sacerdotis qui ecclesiae vel oratorii curam habet.

§ 1. The Blessed Sacrament must be kept in an immovable tabernacle in the middle of the altar.

§ 2. The tabernacle must be skilfully constructed and safely locked, appropriately decorated according to the liturgical rules, be empty, and so carefully guarded that there is no danger of sacrilegious profanation.

Concerning the material of which the tabernacle is to be made, there are no rigid rules.[23] But the more precious the metal or stone, the more becoming it will be. Inside the tabernacle may be draped with white cloth, or simply gilded. On the outside [24] it must be covered with a veil or curtain. No veil is required on the inside, though this custom may be tolerated.[25] The material of the outside cover or veil may be silk, cotton, wool, hemp, etc. The color of the veil (called conopaeum, because it is supposed to be thrown over the whole tabernacle) has not been determined. The S. Congregation has admitted two opinions: the one which holds that the color must always be white, the other (Gavante) that it must change

23 The Capuchins may have a wooden tabernacle without any special painting outside; S. Rit. C., Dec. 7, 1888, ad XIII (n. 3697).

24 S. Rit. C., Aug. 7, 1871; June 5, 1889 (nn. 3254, 3709).

25 S. Rit. C., April 28, 1866 (n. 3150).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

according to the office and the seasons. This latter opinion was favored by the S. Congregation,[26] but no strict rule can be deduced from its answer. Hence a white veil is certainly admissible. However, since at funeral masses, exequies and on All Souls' Day, the antipendium and the drapery are of black, the veil of the tabernacle should also be, not black, but purple.[27]

§ 3. For any weighty reason which the Ordinary deems sufficient, it is permitted to keep the Blessed Sacrament at night away from the altar, in a more secure and decent place, but always on a corporal and with due regard to can. 1271. This would undoubtedly be permitted in case of churches[28] used by Catholics and Protestants alternately, and also in case a missionary lives far away from the church, especially for administering the Viaticum.[29]

§ 4. The key of the tabernacle, in which the Blessed Sacrament is kept, must be carefully guarded; the responsibility for carrying out this law rests with the priest who has charge of the church or oratory.

In order to prevent sacrilegious theft or irreverence, the priest, i. e., the pastor, or rector, or canon sacristan, should keep the key in his pocket or put it with other keys in a cupboard or drawer, so that strangers cannot discover and abuse it.[30] It is especially forbidden to hand the key of the sepulchre on Holy Thursday to a layman, or to a confraternity or sodality; and no custom to the contrary is tolerated.[31] How serious this obligation is may be

26 S. Rit. C., July 21, 1855 (n. 3035).

27 S. Rit. C., Dec. 1, 1882 (n. 3562).

28 S. C. P. F., March 7, 1805 (Coll., n. 681): "in aedibus parochi."

29 S. Rit., C., Feb. 10, 1871, ad V, 1 (n. 3234).

30 S. C. EE. et RR., Feb. 9, 1751 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 31 f.).

31 S. Rit. C., Dec. 6, 1631; Dec. 7, 1737; May 22, 1841 (nn. 579, 2335, 2833).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

judged from the penalties threatened in the decretals and in one letter of the S. Congregation: Imprisonment, privation of the active and passive vote, and suspension. The bishop together with the superior may proceed thus against exempt religious.[32]

THE PYX

CAN. 1270

Particulae consecratae, eo numero qui infirmorum et aliorum fidelium communioni satis esse possit, perpetuo conserventur in pyxide ex solida decentique materia, eaque munda et suo operculo bene clausa, cooperta albo velo serico et, quantum res feret, ornato.

A number of consecrated particles, sufficient for the communion of the sick and other faithful, must always be kept in a pyx or ciborium made of some solid and suitable material, kept neat and well closed, covered with a veil of silk, which may be artistically ornamented as far as the rubrics allow.

This text is taken almost verbally from the Roman Ritual, and is also intended for the Orientals, who should, like the Latins, preserve the particles in a pyx, not in a dried or unbecoming form, as if they were mere bread.[33] The pyx should be made of metal, not of glass or some similar substance, even though there be danger that it be stolen.[34] Copper is admissible,[35] if gilded.

The particles may never be kept on the corporal, even though there be danger of theft.[36] They must be pre-

32 S. C. EE. et RR., l. c.

33 Rit. Rom., tit. IV, c. 1, n. 5; Bened. XIV, "Praeclaris," March 18, 1746 (Coll. P. F., n. 356).

34 S. Rit. C., Jan. 30, 1880 (Dec. Auth., n. 3511).

35 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1867, ad VI (n. 3162).

36 S. Rit. C., Feb. 17, 1881 (n. 3527).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

served perpetuo, i. e., always, even during the Corpus Christi procession.[37]

The veil or cover of the ciborium may be embroidered or bear some suitable emblems having reference to the Holy Eucharist; but it must not be overloaded or so heavy that it is difficult to open the lid.

The ciborium itself must be kept clean, especially from rust and verdigris.

THE TABERNACLE LIGHT

CAN. 1271

Coram tabernaculo, in quo sanctissimum Sacramentum asservatur, una saltem lampas diu noctuque continenter luceat, nutrienda oleo olivarum vel cera apum; ubi vero oleum olivarum haberi nequeat, Ordinarii loci prudentiae permittitur ut aliis oleis commutetur, quantum fieri potest, vegetabilibus.

At least one lamp must burn day and night before the tabernacle in which the Blessed Sacrament is kept. For this lamp olive oil or beeswax should be used; if no olive oil is available, other oils may be used, according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, but they should be vegetable oils, if possible.

This is a grave obligation, as may be seen from the constant insistence with which it was forced upon the rectors of churches. The sanctuary lamp must be reserved for the sole purpose for which it is prescribed, and not serve other purposes, for instance, illumining a dormitory.[38] The lamp may be attached to the side wall, like a bracket or cornucopia, provided that the light burns

37 S. Rit. C., Aug. 13, 1667, ad 2 (n. 1357).

38 S. Rit. C., Aug. 22, 1669 (n. 2033).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

towards and before the altar (infra et ante altare).[39]

Olive oil best serves the mystic significance of the sanctuary lamp, as expressed in the liturgy of Palm Sunday.[40] However, beeswax, the significance of which is pointed out on Candlemas Day, is also permitted. So, too, is a mixture of olive oil and beeswax.[41] Vegetable oils (linseed, sesame, etc.) may be used where olive oil is unavailable. Note well that the text does not admit the use of electric light for the sanctuary lamp, as a decree of the S. Rit. C. permitted about four years ago, "on account of war conditions."[42] On the other hand it is safe to say that this decree seems to pave the way for the use of electric or gaslight as an aid to reading and for ornamental purposes, even on the altar. Hence the former rigorous decisions[43] may be taken with a goodly dose of discretion.

ALTAR BREADS

CAN. 1272

Hostiae consecratae, sive propter fidelium communionem, sive propter expositionem sanctissimi Sacramenti, et recentes sint et frequenter renoventur, veteribus rite consumptis, ita ut nullum sit periculum corruptionis, sedulo servatis instructionibus quas Ordinarius loci hac de re dederit.

The consecrated hosts reserved for the communion of the faithful or for the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament must be fresh and should be frequently renewed, the 39 S. Rit. C., June 2, 1883 ad IV (n. 3578).

40 S. Rit. C., July 9, 1864 (n. 3121).

41 S. Rit. C., Nov. 8, 1907 (n. 4205).

42 S. Rit. C., Nov. 22, 1907 (n. 4206); Nov. 23, 1916 (A. Ap. S., VIII, 72 f.).

43 S. Rit. C., Nov. 29, 1901; May 16, 1902; Nov. 22, 1907 (nn. 4086, 4097, 4206).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

old ones having been duly consumed, so that there is no danger of corruption. Upon this matter the instructions given by the local Ordinaries should be scrupulously observed. See can. 815. Attention may be drawn to the decisions of the S. Congregation of Rites, which insist upon weekly renewal of the sacred species according to the Cæremoniale Episcoporum.[44]

FREQUENT ASSISTANCE AT MASS AND VISITS TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT

CAN. 1273

Qui in religiosam fidelium institutionem incumbunt, nihil omittant ut pietatem erga sanctissimam Eucharistiam in eorum animis excitent, eosque praesertim hortentur ut, non modo diebus dominicis et festis de praecepto, sed etiam diebus ferialibus intra hebdomadam, frequenter, quantum fieri potest, Missae sacrificio assistant et sanctissimum Sacramentum visitent.

Those who have charge of the religious instruction of the faithful, should endeavor to foster in their hearts devotion to the Holy Eucharist, and exhort them to assist at Mass not only on Sundays and holydays of obligation, but also as often as possible on weekdays, and to visit the Blessed Sacrament.

EXPOSITION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT

CAN. 1274

§ 1. In ecclesiis aut oratoriis quibus datum est asservare sanctissimam Eucharistiam, fieri potest expositio privata seu cum pyxide ex qualibet iusta causa sine Ordinarii licentia; expositio vero publica seu cum 44 Lib. I, c. VI, n. 2; S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1884, n. II (n. 3624).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ostensorio die festo Corporis Christi et intra octavam fieri potest in omnibus ecclesiis inter Missarum sollemnia et ad Vesperas; aliis vero temporibus nonnisi ex iusta et gravi causa praesertim publica et de Ordinarii loci licentia, licet ecclesia ad religionem exemptam pertineat.

§ 2. Minister expositionis et repositionis sanctissimi Sacramenti est sacerdos vel diaconus; minister vero benedictionis Eucharisticae est solus sacerdos, nec eam impertire diaconus potest, nisi in casu quo, ad normam can. 845, § 2, Viaticum ad infirmum detulerit.

§ 1. Private exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, i. e., with the ciborium, may be held for any reasonable cause without the permission of the Ordinary in churches and oratories in which the Blessed Sacrament is lawfully kept. This sounds partly like a definition and is no doubt intended as such, to distinguish private from public exposition, which is mentioned in the next clause. But the definition is not complete and should be supplemented by a decision of the S. Congregation of Rites.[45] Private exposition (ex causa privata) takes place if the Blessed Sacrament is not taken out of the tabernacle, but remains hidden, so that the Host cannot be seen. Hence the tabernacle is opened and the ciborium is placed near the opening.[46] Private exposition excludes placing the ciborium or pyx, as it is called in the decisions,[47] upon a throne or movable tabernacle. Benediction with the ciborium is not forbidden where there is a long-standing custom authorizing it.[48] In fact, says Cardinal Gasparri,[49] if this less 45 May 31, 1642 (n. 800).

46 Bened. XIV, Instit., 30, n. XVI; Gasparri, De SSmo Euch., n. 1022.

47 S. Rit. C., May 23, 1835; April 28, 1902 (nn. 2725, 4096).

48 S. Rit. C., Sept. 11, 1847; March 16, 1876 (nn. 2957, 3394).

49 L. c., n. 1034; Bened. XIV, Instit., 30, n. VI f., where the pros

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

solemn benediction can be imparted pro causa tum publica tum privata, the Ordinary should not permit solemn and visible benediction with the ostensorium except for a causa publica. This appears to us a very reasonable rule. Thus during the month of October this private benediction, we believe, would be amply justified and sufficient on weekdays.

What is a causa privata? A case of sickness or the mere desire of pious persons or of a religious community would be a private cause sufficient to justify private exposition.[50]

The mode of holding this kind of exposition and imparting the benediction is as follows: The priest wears stole and surplice, also, if he wishes, a cope. At least six candles must be lighted, but the incensation is omitted, since this is not in keeping with the Roman practice.[51] Praying and singing are allowed, and the Tantum ergo with versicle and oration may be said or sung. After the blessing is given the tabernacle should again be closed.[52]

Such an exposition requires no permission from the Ordinary, and is permitted in all churches and oratories which are entitled, either by law or by an indult, to keep the Blessed Sacrament, according to can. 1265.

Public exposition, i. e., with the ostensorium or monstrance, may be held in all churches on the feast of Corpus Christi and every day within its octave, at Mass and Vespers, but not on other occasions except for a just and weighty reason, especially of a public character, and with the permission of the diocesan Ordinary, which is required also for churches which belong to exempt religious.

and cons of frequent exposition are set forth.

50 Bened. XIV, l. c., n. XVI.

51 S. Rit. C., Sept. 11, 1847 (n. 2957).

52 Gasparri, l. c., n. 1027.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The difference between private and public exposition lies in the manner of exhibiting the Blessed Sacrament as well as in the reason for which it is permitted. The prescribed vessel here is the ostensorium with the lunula.[53] This is generally placed under a canopy on a throne, on which is spread a palla or corporal. It is becoming that twenty candles, or at least twelve,[54] be burning on the altar during the exposition. The color of the antipendium as well as of the canopy and the vestments worn by the ministers is white. However, if the exposition is connected with the office of the day, for instance, Pentecost, the antipendium and the vestments worn by the ministers must be of the color of the day, i. e., red in the case supposed, whilst the canopy may be white. But this is required only if the priest does not leave the altar before the exposition. If he goes to the sacristy after Mass or Vespers are said, he may vest in white. White is also the color of the velum or humerale thrown over the shoulders.[55] Black is not allowed under any circumstance at the altar or in the chapel of exposition, even though the rest of the church still bears signs of mourning.[56] All relics must be removed from the altar of exposition.[57]

The Mass of exposition should as a rule be at least a missa cantata or solemnis, although the term inter Missarum sollemnia does not strictly require a sung Mass.[58] When the Blessed Sacrament is exposed after Communion

53 A so-called custodia is not necessary for the lunula. The material for the ostensorium and lunula is not determined by law, but should be the same as for the ciborium; Gasparri, l. c., n. 1030 f.

54 S. Rit. C., Feb. 8, 1879 (n. 3480); in this case the churches were poor.

55 Gasparri, l. c., n. 1040.

56 S. Rit. C., March 13, 1804 (n. 2558); not even if a ruler dies.

57 S. Rit. C., Sept. 2, 1741, ad 1 (n. 2365).

58 S. Rit. C., Sept. 25, 1882 (n. 3558) has permitted the custom of exposing the Bl. Sacr. with a low Mass early in the morning.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

at Mass, the ostensorium should not be covered with a velum.[59]

The genuflections are to be made by bending both knees at private as well as public expositions.[60]

Public exposition is permitted on the feast of Corpus Christi and within its Octave, but only in churches, which term includes public oratories. But what about semi-public oratories which, according to can. 1265, § 1, n. 2, are allowed to keep the Blessed Sacrament habitually? The text of our canon would seem to exclude them. Cardinal Gasparri simply says: It is evident that exposition can only be held in a church which is entitled to keep the Blessed Sacrament. This would apply also to semi-public oratories, and we believe that the term in ecclesiis here should not be taken too strictly, provided, of course, the functions can be carried out according to the rubrics. At any rate, it would only require a permission from the Ordinary to authorize public exposition in pious institutions.[61]

The last clause of § 1, can. 1274, mentions "other times" at which public exposition may be held for a just and reasonable, especially a public cause. What is a causa publica? It is one that concerns the whole commonwealth, or municipality, or parish, or diocese, or country. But it may also be a reason of less extent, according to approved authors.[62] Such a reason would be the eradication of vice and fostering of virtue, public peace and tranquillity, impending disasters, etc., or any other reason which in one way or another, according to the judgment of the Ordinary, affects a community, or at least the larger part thereof. Other times are all those days which do not fall within the Octave of Corpus Christi. On no other

59 Gasparri, l. c., n. 1036.
60 Ibid., n. 1023.
61 Gasparri, l. c., n. 1038.
62 Ibid., n. 1034.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

day of the year, except, of course, the last three days of Holy Week, is public exposition forbidden, although Benedict XIV refused to permit it on the feastdays of Saints, when these are celebrated with more or less worldly pomp.[63] But custom may admit also those days.[64] Note that a weighty and public reason is required and, besides, the express permission of the Ordinary must be obtained. From this rule the S. Congregation would dispense neither in favor of exempt religious, no matter how many privileges they may claim, nor in favor of confraternities.[65] The latter may have an exposition, provided episcopal permission was given, without asking or notifying the pastor.[66] Hence the faculty of keeping the Blessed Sacrament does not include that of having an exposition of it outside the feast and octave of Corpus Christi.[67]

§ 2. The minister of exposition is the priest or deacon; but a priest may give the benediction, whereas a deacon may only impart the blessing according to can. 845, § 2, viz., when administering the viaticum.

Note that no mechanism is allowed for exposing the Blessed Sacrament, but the minister must expose it with his hands.[68] The rather quaint manner of exposition mentioned in one decision, where the ostensorium was placed on the right arm of the statue of a Saint, was forbidden.[69]

63 Instit., 30, n. XIV.

64 S. Rit. C., Sept. 27, 1864, ad 5 (n. 3124).

65 This is the tenor of all the decisions quoted by Card. Gasparri in his edition; cfr. Bened. XIV, Inst., 30, n. IX f.

66 S. Rit. C., March 18, 1679 (n. 1622).

67 S. Rit. C., Jan. 12, 1704 ad 27 (n. 2123).

68 S. Rit. C., April 3, 1873 (Gasparri, l. c., n. 1041); not contained in Dec. Auth.

69 S. Rit. C., Aug. 2, 1884 (n. 3615).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE FORTY HOURS' DEVOTION

CAN. 1275

Supplicatio Quadraginta Horarum in omnibus ecclesiis paroecialibus aliisque, in quibus sanctissimum Sacramentum habitualiter asservatur, statutis de consensu Ordinarii loci diebus, maiore qua fieri potest sollemnitate quotannis habeatur; et sicubi ob peculiaria rerum adiuncta nequeat sine gravi incommodo et cum reverentia tanto sacramento debita fieri, curet loci Ordinarius ut saltem per aliquot continuas horas, statis diebus, sanctissimum Sacramentum sollemniore ritu exponatur.

The Forty Hours' Devotion should be held every year, on the days established, with the consent of the local Ordinary, in all parochial and other churches in which the Blessed Sacrament is habitually kept, and with the greatest possible solemnity. When special circumstances permit the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament only with great inconvenience or danger of irreverence, the local Ordinary shall see to it that it be exposed solemnly at least for a number of consecutive hours on stated days.

The consent of the Ordinary may be given once for all, especially when definite churches are assigned for holding the devotion on certain days. This consent is required also for churches of regulars and confraternities,[70] nor may the pastor or first dignitary of the cathedral church prescribe the devotion without the permission of the bishop.[71] During Holy Week, i. e., from the morning of Holy 70 S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1642 (n. 814).

71 S. Rit. C., June 4, 1644 (n. 869).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Thursday until early on Holy Saturday, the devotion must be stopped.[72]

The Forty Hours' Devotion began in the sixteenth century. It was at first held on the days preceding Lent, which custom was approved by the Roman Pontiffs.[73] Clement VIII ordered the Forty Hours' Devotion as we know it. Clement XI not only approved it, but prescribed perpetual exposition on the same occasion and issued the so-called Clementina. The privileges and favors granted by this document are attached only to perpetual exposition, unless a special indult is obtained.[74]

72 S. Rit. C., March 12, 1661 (n. 1190).

73 Bened. XIV, Jan. 1, 1748.

74 Instructio, 21, 1705; S. Rit. C., May 27, 1911, ad III (n. 4268).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XVI

WORSHIP OF THE SAINTS, SACRED IMAGES, AND RELICS

CAN. 1276

Bonum atque utile est Dei Servos, una cum Christo regnantes, suppliciter invocare eorumque reliquias atque imagines venerari; sed prae ceteris filiali devotione Beatissimam Virginem Mariam fideles universi prosequantur.

This canon, taken substantially from the dogmatic canons of the Council of Trent,[1] embodies the time-honored practice of the Catholic Church and voices a rebuke against ancient and modern image-breakers. It lays it down as a good and useful practice to invoke the intercession of the servants of God who reign with Christ, above all the Blessed Virgin Mary, and to venerate their relics and images. The hyperdulia paid to the Mother of God is not in vain,[2] although she is a creature. Nor is it imposture, as the so-called reformers maintained, to say Mass in honor of the Saints and to obtain their intercession with God.[3] It would be rash and pernicious to reprove the faithful for showing particular veneration and attributing special titles of honor to miraculous images of the Saints, especially those of the Blessed Virgin Mary.[4]

1 Sess. 25, de invoc.

2 Prop. 26 damn. a S. O., Dec. 7, 1690 (Denzinger, n. 1183).

3 Trid., Sess. 22, can. 5, de Sacrif. Missae.

4 Propp. 70, 71 damn. per "Auc-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There is not the slightest danger that, in venerating the Saints and their images, we shall fail to adore God in spirit and in truth, or that the memory of the Saints will dislodge God from the hearts of the faithful.[5] For the rest, the reasonableness of the veneration of the Saints is a matter for theologians.

PUBLIC WORSHIP OF THE SAINTS

CAN. 1277

§ 1. Cultu publico eos tantum Dei Servos venerari licet, qui auctoritate Ecclesiae inter Sanctos vel Beatos relati sint.

§ 2. In album Sanctorum canonice relatis cultus duliae debetur; Sancti coli possunt ubique et quovis actu eius generis cultus; Beati vero non possunt, nisi loco et modo quo Romanus Pontifex concesserit.

§ 1. Only those servants of God may be publicly worshiped who are counted among the Saints and Blessed by the authority of the Church.

The history of beatification and canonization may be studied in the classic work of Benedict XIV.[6] Since the XIIth century this function is reserved to the Holy See as a causa maior. (See P. II, Book IV.)

Urban VIII, in his Constitution "Caelestis Hierusalem," of July 25, 1634, ruled that no images or votive tablets should be permitted in churches and oratories of persons who had not yet been declared Saints or Blessed by the Apostolic See, except such as had been venerated torem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794 (Denzinger, n. 1433 f.).

[5] Propp. 18, 35, 36 damn. Nov. 20, 1687 (ibid., nn. 1105, 1122 f.).

[6] De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Canonizatione, ed. Prati, 1839, Vols. 7. We may also refer to Part II, Book IV of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

either "by common consent of the Church, or by immemorable custom or in the writings of the Holy Fathers and holy men." From this ruling it was but natural to conclude that there was a casus exceptus from the general rule of beatification and canonization, viz., the cult attributed to a distinguished servant of God and proved by means described in the Constitution of Urban VIII, quoted above.

Pending the Causa, or after the Commission for the trial has been assigned, it is strictly forbidden to call a servant of God "Venerable" and to hold any service of thanksgiving for the introductio causae or to deliver any panegyrics.

A person may be called "Venerable" only after a formal decree to this effect has been published.[7] Besides it must be understood that, although Saints or Blessed were venerated publicly with Office and Mass, it is required that their worship be approved and ratified by the Church before a Mass or a proper office in their honor is permitted. For the general rule is that such propria and Mass are accorded only to such Saints and Blessed who are mentioned in the Roman Martyrology or have enjoyed a public cult which has been either formally decreed or ratified by the Holy See.[8] Sometimes Saints and Blessed are inserted in diocesan calendars (ordo) who are neither found in the Martyrology nor endowed with a decree of the Holy See. This insertion in diocesan calendars or propria of a diocese or order can never produce the effect or create the presumption of a formal or aequipollens beatification, but leaves both title and cult in statu quo ante.[9]

7 S. Rit. C., Aug. 26, 1913 (A. Ap. S., V, 436 ff.).

8 S. Rit. C., July 13, 1896 (n. 3926).

9 S. Rit. C., April 28, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 235 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Above a prohibition of exhibiting the images or statues of Saints or Blessed not approved as such by the Holy See, was mentioned. This prohibition includes any public veneration either outside or inside of the church or altar.[10] But it is not forbidden to paint the pictures and events from the life of pious servants of God upon the walls of a church, or on the stained windows, provided these representations contain no nimbus or halo that would indicate canonization, beatification or a cult.[11]

§ 2. To those who have been canonically inserted in the catalogue of Saints is due the worship called dulia. Saints may be worshipped everywhere and by any act of dulia, but the Blessed may be worshipped only in the places and manner expressly granted by the Roman Pontiff.

A canonical insertion is made either by a formal or by an equivalent (aequipollens) decree issued by the Church, ratifying the cult offered to a Saint or Blessed person either by a long-standing tradition, or the common consent of the Church, or the writings of Holy Fathers and saintly men. These Saints, then, may receive the worship of dulia, as explained in can. 1255.

There is a difference between Saints in the strict sense and Blessed, although the distinction of cult is hardly perceptible. Benedict XIV [12] states three characteristics which distinguish Saints from Blessed:

(1) Beatification permits, canonization prescribes worship; at least this is the rule, though the Pontiff admits exceptions.

(2) The worship of a Blessed is confined to a certain

10 S. Rit. C., Sept. 28, 1658 (n. 1097).

11 S. Rit. C., Aug. 27, 1894 (n. 3835).

12 De Servorum Dei Beat. etc., l. I, c. 39, nn. 12 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

province, diocese, city, or religious institute, whereas the Saints may, though they need not, be worshipped everywhere throughout the whole Church.

(3) Canonization is the definitive and ultimate sentence of the Sovereign Pontiff, by which the worship of a Saint is prescribed for the whole Church, whilst beatification is a less definitive pronouncement.[13] This latter feature, according to Benedict XIV, marks the real difference between Saints and Blessed.

The general rules which must be observed concerning the worship of the Blessed are the following:

1. Mass and Office must be especially granted by the Roman Pontiff in honor of the Blessed. This indult is not included in the grant of erecting an altar in honor of the Blessed, nor is the public recitation of the Office permitted by the act which permits worship. Devotions, however, or festa devotionis, may be celebrated in honor of the Blessed, but not regular holydays with Mass and office, unless there be a special indult to this effect.[14]

If a Mass and office have been granted by special indult, the priests who celebrate Mass in chapels or churches for which the indult was given may and must conform to the rubrics, i. e., they should say the Mass of the Blessed, if prescribed according to the approved calendar.[15]

2. As to images, votive tablets, statues, and pictures of the Blessed, these may be publicly exhibited for veneration in churches and oratories if the indult for Mass and office has been given, because this indult includes permission to exhibit said objects. Otherwise the images, 13 Hence theologians are unanimous in stating the infallibility of the Pope with regard to canonization, whilst they are more or less divided concerning beatification; cfr. Mazzella, De Rel. & Eccl. n. 813.

14 S. Rit. C., Sept. 27, 1659; April 17, 1660; July 24, 1915 (Dec. Auth., nn. 1136, 1156; A. Ap. S., VII, 389).

15 See the decree of Dec. 9, 1895 of the S. Rit. C.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google etc., may only be placed on the walls of the church or chapel, but never on the altar; and the local Ordinary is entitled to have them removed.

3. The names of the Blessed may not be inserted in the general calendar, but only in the one used for the particular place or institute; nor may it be recited in the suffragium Sanctorum, or in other prayers, except those approved by the Holy See.

4. If the worship of a Blessed has been granted for a certain place, it cannot be extended to another without a papal indult.

5. These rules must also be observed by exempt religious, no matter what their name or privileges may be or have been.

PATRON SAINTS

CAN. 1278

Laudabiliter quoque, servatis servandis, Sancti nationum, dioecesium, provinciarum, confraternitatum, familiarum religiosarum aliorumque locorum et moralium personarum eliguntur et, accedente confirmatione Sedis Apostolicae, constituuntur Patroni; Beati non item, sine peculiari eiusdem Sedis Apostolicae indulto.

It is praiseworthy that nations, dioceses, provinces, confraternities, religious institutes, places and corporations should choose patron saints with the approval of the Apostolic See. But the Blessed can be chosen patrons only with a special indult of the same Holy See.

The approval of the Apostolic See is also required when a new patron Saint is chosen instead of an old one.[16] Thus it may happen that a revolution sweeps away religious communities and the new occupants of a church

[16] S. Rit. C., March 23, 1630 (n. 526).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

choose another patron saint. Such a change may be made with the consent of the S. Rit. C.[17] The patron-saint of a place or community may differ from the one in whose name a church is dedicated. In a large city, for instance, there may be many patron or titular saints of different churches, but only one patron of the city, or diocese, or province.[18]

PICTURES OF SAINTS

CAN. 1279

§ 1. Nemini liceat in ecclesiis, etiam exemptis, aliisve locis sacris ullam insolitam ponere vel ponendam curare imaginem, nisi ab Ordinario loci sit approbata.

§ 2. Ordinarius autem sacras imagines publice ad fidelium venerationem exponendas ne approbet, quae cum probato Ecclesiae usu non congruant.

§ 3. Nunquam sinat Ordinarius in ecclesiis aliisve locis sacris exhiberi falsi dogmatis imagines vel quae debitam decentiam et honestatem non praeseferant, aut rudibus periculosi erroris occasionem praebeant.

§ 4. Si imagines, publicae venerationi expositae, sollemniter benedicantur, haec benedictio Ordinario reservatur, qui tamen potest eam cuilibet sacerdoti committere.

§ 1 repeats almost verbally the strict prohibition of the Council of Trent[19] against exhibiting unusual images, in churches or sacred places, even of exempt religious, unless the approval of the local Ordinary has first been obtained.

§ 2. The Ordinaries shall never allow any sacred im-

17 S. Rit. C., June 1, 1876, ad VI (n. 3400).

18 S. Rit. C., May 1, 1857 (n. 3048).

19 Sess. 25, de invocat.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ages to be publicly exhibited to the veneration of the faithful, unless these images are in keeping with the approved usage of the Church.

From this paragraph may be negatively deduced what an unusual image (insolita imago) is, namely, an image that represents persons or events in a manner which has no justification in either Holy Scripture or tradition. Thus to represent the Holy Ghost in the form of a young man has never been sanctioned, but rather reprobated, by the Church. The Blessed Trinity may not be represented in the shape of a man with three heads, or of one man with two heads with a dove between them.[20] A statue or painting similarly representing the Sorrowful Mother dressed in black and holding a crucifix in the left hand would be an unusual picture.[21] Pictures of the Sacred Heart of Jesus representing the Heart alone, without the rest of the body, are not allowed to be exhibited publicly on altars, but may be used for private devotion.[22] The title "Cor Jesu Eucharisticum" is neither canonical nor liturgical, and hence no pictures of it may be exhibited to the veneration of the faithful.[23] Chinese Christians sometimes depict our Saviour with a Chinese beard and shoes. This custom is not strictly forbidden, but should be discouraged.

Note that the term images comprises all kinds of representations: statues, pictures, medals, etc.

§ 3. The Ordinary shall never permit the exhibition, in churches or sacred places, of images which offend against dogma or lack decency and propriety, or are apt to lead 20 Bened. XIV, "Sollicitudini," Oct. 1, 1745, §§ 10 ff.

21 S. Rit. C., Feb. 23, 1894 (n. 3818).

22 S. O., Aug. 26, 1891 (Coll. P. F., n. 1767). The S. Heart of Mary is to be represented according to the decree of April 26, 1875; Nov. 29, 1878 (n. 3470).

23 S. Rit. C., March 28, July 15, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 146, 382 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the ignorant into error. Undogmatic are the above-mentioned representations of the Holy Ghost and the Blessed Trinity. Decency is also required in the garb or dress given to statues, which only too often offend against good taste.[24] Danger might arise from the veneration of images if ignorant persons would be permitted to worship one who has never been declared or acknowledged as a saint,[25] or if fetichism were attached to their devotion.

§ 4. The solemn blessing of images which are to be exhibited for public veneration is reserved to the Ordinary, who may, however, delegate this function to any priest. There is no rule or law prescribing the blessing of images.

RESTORATION OF STATUES AND PAINTINGS

CAN. 1280

Imagines pretiosae, idest vetustate, arte, aut cultu praestantes, in ecclesiis vel oratoriis publicis fidelium venerationi expositae, si quando reparatione indigeant, nunquam restaurentur sine dato scriptis consensu ab Ordinario; qui, antequam licentiam concedat, prudentes ac peritos viros consulat.

Images which possess great value by reason of their antiquity, artistic finish or the veneration given to them, and which have been exhibited to the worship of the faithful in churches and public oratories, if in need of repairs, must not be restored without the written consent of the Ordinary, who shall seek advice from wise and experienced men before he grants such a permission. This is a very timely law which should have been enforced in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries when ecclesiastical

24 S. Rit. C., March 15, 1888 (n. 3690).

25 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1889 (n. 3715).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dignitaries often "restored" fine romanesque churches of Gothic or Moorish architecture and converted them into whitewashed Barocco edifices.[26]

We may also be permitted to add that some modern statues savor very much of the "salon." Take, for example, a good many representations of St. Francis of Assisi and St. Antony, which are anything but dignified in their fancy costumes. Ecclesiastical statuaries should be inspected before they are ecclesiastically approved.

ALIENATION OF RELICS AND IMAGES

CAN. 1281

§ 1. Insignes reliquiae aut imagines pretiosae itemque aliae reliquiae aut imagines quae in aliqua ecclesia magna populi veneratione honorentur, nequeunt valide alienari neque in aliam ecclesiam perpetuo transferri sine Apostolicae Sedis permissu.

§ 2. Insignes Sanctorum vel Beatorum reliquiae sunt corpus, caput, brachium, antibrachium, cor, lingua, manus, crus aut illa pars corporis in qua passus est martyr, dummodo sit integra et non parva.

§ 1 prohibits the alienation of important relics or images of great value, as well as of such relics and images as are held in great honor by the people in some church. To alienate such without an apostolic indul is void of effect in the ecclesiastical external forum as well as in the court of conscience. Nor may such relics or images be permanently transferred to another church without permission from Rome.

In the eighth and ninth centuries, after many relics had [26] Example: the cathedral of Amalfi in Italy.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

been transferred from the catacombs to the churches of Rome, a regular traffic in relics began which soon became a public scandal. A synod of Mayence, in 813, forbade the transfer of bodies of saints without the permission of the secular ruler, or bishop, or synod.[27] The fourth Lateran Council prohibited the exhibition of relics for sale as detrimental to religion and also commanded that all ancient relics should be enclosed in reliquaries and neither exposed nor sold without authority from the Sovereign Pontiff. Minor prelates in whose churches relics were venerated, were urged not to permit fraud by exhibiting false documents to allure the faithful — as, adds the council, had happened in several places, for the sake of gain.[28] Transfer from one altar to another of the same church may be permitted by the bishop.[29]

Temporary transfer is permissible because the Code uses the term perpetuo. Hence if repairs or other reasons would render a temporary transfer necessary, no recourse to the Holy See would be required, provided, of course, the relics or images are replaced.

§ 2 defines what an important relic (insignis reliquia) is. It is the entire body, head, arm, forearm, heart, tongue, hand, leg of a saint or blessed person, or that part of his body in which the martyr suffered death, provided it be entire and not a small part. This paragraph is verbally taken from a decree of the S. C. of Rites, which however, added: "duly approved by the Ordinary."[30] This clause is omitted in our text, probably on account of the following canon. There is a special reason for mentioning the different parts, namely, because on the 27 Can. 51, c. 37, Dist. 1 de cons.; Hefele, Concil-Gesch., III, 711.

28 C. 2, X, III, 45.

29 S. C. Indulg., Nov. 17, 1676 (Prinzivalli, l. c., n. 13).

30 S. Rit. C., April 8, 1628 (n. 460).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Feast of Relics the Credo is to be recited in churches where an important relic is preserved.

After the publication or the decree of 1628 doubts arose as to what parts of the body of a Saint were meant. Most of the answers given in reply to questions were negative. Thus, the tibia or shinbone, or femoris ossa or thighbone, or smaller parts of the same, or the foot with some toes on it, were not acknowledged to be an insignis reliquia, nor even part of the head.[31] On the other hand, the forearm and the upper arm, from the elbow to the shoulder, were acknowledged as insignia.[32]

Integra or entire is that part of the body in which the martyr suffered, provided it be unmutilated; if it is mutilated, for instance, the cranium crushed, it could be gathered up and the parts reassembled so as to make one whole.[33] Besides, it must be a considerable part, not a mere splinter (non parva).

CAN. 1282

§ 1. Insignes Sanctorum vel Beatorum reliquiae nequeunt in aedibus vel oratoriis privatis asservari, sine expressa Ordinarii loci licentia.

§ 2. Reliquiae non insignes debito cum honore etiam in domibus privatis servari pieque a fidelibus gestari possunt.

Important relics of saints and blessed persons may not be preserved in private homes and oratories without the express permission of the local Ordinary. Minor relics, on the other hand, may be kept in private houses and rev-

31 S. Rit. C., Dec. 20, 1628; June 3, 1662 ad 2; Dec. 7, 1844 (nn. 490, 1234, 2883); S. C. Indulg., June 12, 1822 (Prinzivalli, n. 430).

32 S. Rit. C., June 27, 1899, ad II (n. 4041).

33 S. Rit. C., Dec. 3, 1672 (n. 1460).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

erently carried about by the faithful. The first paragraph is undoubtedly prompted by the desire that all the faithful should be benefitted by the presence of such sacred objects, and that important sacred remains should receive a greater reverence than they ordinarily receive if in private possession.

AUTHENTICATION OF RELICS

CAN. 1283

§ 1. Publico cultu eae reliquiae in ecclesiis, quanquam exemptis, honorari possunt, quas genuinas esse constet authentico documento alicuius S. R. E. Cardinalis, vel Ordinarii loci, vel alius viri ecclesiastici cui facultas authenticandi indulto apostolico sit concessa.

§ 2. Vicarius Generalis nequit, sine mandato speciali, reliquias authenticas edicere.

CAN. 1284

Locorum Ordinarii reliquiam, quam certo non esse authenticam norint, a fidelium cultu prudenter amoveant.

CAN. 1285

§ 1. Sacrae reliquiae, quarum authenticitatis documenta ob civiles perturbationes vel ob alium quemlibet casum interierint, publicae venerationi ne exponantur, nisi praecedat iudicium Ordinarii loci, non autem Vicarii Generalis sine mandato speciali.

§ 2. Reliquiae tamen antiquae in ea veneratione qua hactenus fuerunt, sunt retinendae, nisi in aliquo peculiari casu certis argumentis constet eas falsas vel suppositicias esse.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1286

Locorum Ordinarii ne sinant, maxime in sacris concionibus, libris, ephemeridibus vel commentariis fovendae pietati destinatis, ex meris coniecturis, ex solis probabilibus argumentis vel praeiudicatis opinionibus, praesertim verbis ludibrium aut despectum sapientibus, quaestiones agitari de sacrarum reliquiarum authenticitate.

Only genuine relics may be exhibited for public veneration in churches, even those of exempt religious. The genuineness of a relic is ascertained by an authentic document, issued either by a cardinal, or by the local Ordinary, or by a clergyman who has obtained an apostolic indult authorizing him to authenticate relics.

The Vicar General needs a special mandate to issue such a document.

The authentification of ancient relics is a delicate and difficult task, which requires a great deal of archaeological and palæographical knowledge. Hence the Cardinal Vicar of Rome supports a special department, called lipsanotheca, for the purpose of authenticating relics. This means was especially employed after 1870, when many churches and convents were suppressed, shrines and reliquaries scattered and sold without the knowledge of the proper authorities and imitations were not infrequently sold by unscrupulous persons for filthy lucre's sake. Hence the Vicariate of Rome warned bishops against being too credulous concerning bodies which purported to have been taken from the catacombs, even though they were "authenticated" by an Italian bishop, for these nefarious traders did not shrink from forging documents.[34]

34 Vicariatus Urbis litt. encycl., Jan. 17, 1881 (Coll. P. F., n. 1546).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Absolute certainty in regard to the genuineness of relics, especially such as date back to a remote age, is next to impossible. It would, however, be wrong for that reason to reject all ancient relics. Many documents attesting the transfer or translation of relics have been preserved, and, besides, the immemorable custom of veneration must be admitted as a living proof which amounts at least to moral certainty. It may also be assumed that Divine Providence watches over these sacred objects with special care.[35] Finally, even if there be fraud or erroneous belief, the act of venerating a relic is always a religious act addressed ultimately to God, and hence can never be entirely void of effectiveness.

The ecclesiastical authority who has to authenticate relics must, if possible, investigate their origin or source, and therefore demand a document. This document must contain the signature and seal of the one who enclosed the relics in its container. The latter (capse) must be sealed with the same seal which is impressed on the document of authentification. Generally also the make of the capse, its artistic decoration and the material from which it is made are indications of authenticity. If the signature, seal and capse (or shrine) all point to some degree of certainty, the document may be accepted as genuine.[36] In the same way the bishop must proceed when relics are transferred from one church or country to another, provided, in the latter case, the Apostolic indult was obtained. If no authentic document or no immemorable custom can be shown, no document should be issued.[37]

Can. 1284 obliges the local Ordinaries to withdraw from public veneration all relics of which he knows for 35 See Ps. 33, 2.

36 S. C. Indulg., Dec. 16, 1749 (Prinzivalli, n. 187).
37 S. Rit. C., July 21, 1696, ad 4 (n. 1946).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

certain that they are not genuine. As stated, the signature and seal on the document and capse may be considered sufficient authentication. However, the signature must be by hand, and not with a stamp (colla stampiglia), unless the prelate is notoriously prevented from writing by paralysis or other bodily infirmity.

Titular bishops are not empowered to authenticate relics.[38] This privilege is expressly reserved to cardinals and ordinaries in the strict sense of the term, though Vicars Capitular or Administrators are not excluded. Relics which are certainly spurious,[39] the Ordinaries would do well to withdraw and destroy.

However it may happen, as is evident from can. 1285, that the authenticating documents are lost. This has happened under the Huguenots' terror in Toulouse, during the French Revolution,[40] and in Italy after 1870. Such relics may be exposed to public veneration only if the local Ordinary deems it proper. The Vicar General is not competent to grant this permission without being specially commissioned to do so. If the faithful are deeply attached to certain, especially ancient, relics and have a special veneration for them, they may be retained and venerated, provided their spuriousness cannot be proved by solid arguments.[41]

The public discussion of the authenticity of relics should be avoided and may be forbidden by the local Ordinaries if the argument rests on mere conjectures, probabilities or prejudices, and if the methods employed are apt to cast ridicule and contempt on sacred relics or their 38 S. C. Indulg., Sept. 23, 1783 (Prinzivalli, n. 378).

39 For instance, relios of the Highpriest Melchisedek; S. Rit. C., Aug. 3, 1687 (n. 1977).

40 S. C. Indulg., Feb. 22, 1847 (Prinzivalli, n. 582); S. Rit. C., June 23, 1892 (n. 3779).

41 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 20, 1896; Pius X, "Sacrorum Antistitum," Sept. 1, 1910, n. VI (A. Ap. S., II, 664 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: 3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

veneration. Such discussions should not be conducted in sermons, or in books, magazines, and pamphlets intended to foster devotion rather than critical research. This well directed and carefully worded admonition, which is partly taken from the Motu proprio "Sacrorum Antistitum," of Sept. 1, 1910, warns writers against setting up merely probable statements for absolute truth, but it does not forbid sober and respectful criticism based upon scientific research. For the rule laid down in our canon applies to devotional books or periodical publications only, — not to critical disquisitions and scientific reviews. Besides, whilst it warns against the propagation of purely probable and subjective views, it leaves a large margin for solid arguments.[42] The language employed by critics should, of course, always be moderate and respectful.

EXPOSITION OF RELICS

CAN. 1287

§ 1. Reliquiae, cum exponuntur, in thecis seu capsis clausae et obsignatae sint oportet.

§ 2. Reliquiae sanctissimae Crucis nunquam in eadem theca cum reliquiis Sanctorum publicae venerationi exhibeantur, sed propriam thecam separatam habeant.

§ 3. Beatorum reliquiae, sine peculiari indulto, in processionibus ne circumferantur, neve in ecclesiis exponantur, nisi ubi eorum officium et Missa celebretur ex Sedis Apostolicae concessione.

When relics are exposed, they should be enclosed in a shrine, case or capsule, and sealed with the seal of the authenticating prelate or official.

42 The Bollandists cannot be seriously accused of making exaggerated or unfounded statements.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Relics of the true Cross should never be exhibited to public veneration together with relics of Saints, i. e., enclosed in the same chest or shrine, but in a separate case.[43]

Relics of the true Cross and of other instruments of Christ's Passion may be carried about in procession under a canopy; but no other relics of Saints or Blessed may on such occasions be carried in procession under the canopy at the same time.[44]

Relics of Blessed persons may not be carried about in procession without a special indult, nor may they be publicly exposed in churches except where the Mass and office is permitted by the Apostolic See.

RELICS IN THE BISHOP'S PECTORAL CROSS

CAN. 1288

Sanctissimae Crucis reliquiae, quas in cruce pectorali Episcopus forte defert, ecclesiae cathedrali, ipso defuncto, cedunt, Episcopo successori transmittendae; et si defunctus pluribus praefuerit dioecesibus, ecclesiae cathedrali dioecesis, in cuius territorio supremum diem obiit aut, si extra dioecesim mortuus est, ex qua ultimo discessit.

Relics of the true Cross which may be enclosed in the pectoral cross of a bishop, after his death belong to his cathedral church, which shall hand them to the bishop's successor. If the deceased bishop ruled several dioceses, the relics pass to the cathedral church of the one in which he died; if he dies outside the diocese, the relics belong to the cathedral church of the diocese in which he passed away. The reason for this enactment is to be sought 43 S. C. Indulg., Feb. 22, 1847 (Prinzivalli, n. 589).

44 S. Rit. C., May 27, 1826 (n. 2647) and pluries.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the scarcity of these relics which bishops should carry about their person as a token of their dignity. But the law only touches the relic, not the pectoral cross, or the theca or capsule in which the relic is contained. The theca may, after the sacred relic has been withdrawn, be disposed of or sold, with due precaution, of course, against profanation.[45]

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST THE SALE AND PROFANATION OF RELICS

CAN. 1289

§ 1. Sacras reliquias vendere nefas est; adeoque Ordinarii locorum, vicarii foranei, parochi aliive curam animarum habentes, sedulo caveant ne sacrae reliquiae, praesertim sanctissimae Crucis, occasione maxime hereditatum aut alienationis acervi bonorum, veneant, neve in acatholicorum manus transeant.

§ 2. Rectores ecclesiarum, ceterique ad quos spectat, sedulo invigilent ne sacrae reliquiae ullo modo profanentur, neve hominum incuria pereant, vel minus decenter custodiantur.

It is forbidden to sell relics, and hence the local ordinaries, rural deans, pastors, and all those who have charge of souls shall take proper precautions lest sacred relics, especially of the Holy Cross, be sold on the occasion of hereditary transfer or public auction, and see to it that they do not pass into the hands of non-Catholics.

The rectors of churches, and others whom it concerns, (e. g., the custos sacrae supellectilis) should also take great care lest sacred relics be exposed to profanation, [45] Vic. Urbis lit. encycl., March 25, 1889 (Coll. P. F., n. 1699).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or lost through carelessness, or preserved in an unbecoming manner.

As mentioned above, the impious custom of selling relics was practiced at times for gain. Often also well-meaning Catholics bought relics from traders in order to save them from profanation. But even this is forbidden because of the danger of simony and of aiding this impious traffic. All the faithful are in duty bound to denounce to the Ordinary any place where relics are exhibited for sale. He will then take such steps as he deems proper.[46]

[46] S. C. Indulg., Dec. 21, 1878 (Coll. P. F., n. 1505).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XVII

SACRED PROCESSIONS

DEFINITION AND DIVISION

CAN. 1290

§ 1. Nomine sacrarum processionum significantur sollemnes supplicationes quae a populo fideli, duce clero, fiunt eundo ordinatim de loco sacro ad locum sacrum, ad excitandam fidelium pietatem, ad commemoranda Dei beneficia eique gratias agendas, ad divinum auxilium implorandum.

§ 2. Ordinariae sunt quae statis diebus per annum fiunt ad normam librorum liturgicorum vel consuetudinum ecclesiarum; extraordinariae, quae aliis publicis de causis in alios dies indicuntur.

Sacred processions are solemn invocations made by the faithful people marching in an orderly manner, under the leadership of the clergy, from one sacred place to another, for the purpose of arousing devotion, praising God's benefits, thanking Him, and imploring His help.

Ordinary processions are those held on stated days throughout the year, according to the sacred liturgy or the custom of the churches; extraordinary processions are those held for some other public cause on other days.

Processions are a popular element in almost every form of religious worship.[1] The Roman Ritual specifies as or-

1 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., XII, 446 ff. s. v. "Procession."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dinary processions those held on Candlemas Day (Feb. 2), on Palm Sunday, the so-called greater Litanies of April 25, and the Rogation Days preceding the feast of the Ascension. Besides these, we may designate as ordinary the procession on Maundy Thursday, the return on Good Friday, and the procession for the holy fire on Holy Saturday. Funeral processions may also be called ordinary. Moreover, as the text also mentions as ordinary the processions introduced by ecclesiastical custom, it is evident that so-called field processions, as still in vogue in Switzerland, and processions from one church to another in honor of a special patron, must likewise be reckoned among the ordinary ones.

Extraordinary processions, according to the Roman Ritual, are all those held for the purpose of obtaining rain, or fair weather, of driving away storms, the three assigned for times of famine, plague, and war, one for the occasion of any calamity, one for thanksgiving, and one for the translation of relics.

The essential feature of a sacred procession certainly is that it is held under the leadership of the clergy. Hence a mere parade held for any purpose, even for the translation of sacred images from house to house, in which the clergy are mere participants without sacred vestments, cannot be called a procession in the liturgical sense.[2] Besides, even a religious procession if arranged and led by laymen, cannot be styled a sacred procession.

A sacred procession must be conducted in an orderly manner. This rule has a double meaning, of which one is described in can. 1295, and has reference to due reverence and becoming conduct, while the other is that the order of the participants be according to the rules of precedence, regarding which see can. 1295.

2 S. Rit. C., Aug. 20, 1870 (Dec. Auth., n. 3217).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 06:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CORPUS CHRISTI PROCESSIONS

CAN. 1291

§ 1. Nisi aliter ferat immemorabilis consuetudo, vel locorum circumstantiae, prudenti Episcopi iudicio, aliud exigant, die festo Corporis Christi unica tantum sollemnisque per publicas vias processio in uno eodemque loco fieri debet ab ecclesia digniore, eique clerici omnes religiosaeque virorum familiae, etiam exemptae, et laicorum confraternitates interesse debent, regularibus exceptis qui in strictiore clausura perpetuo vivant, aut a civitate ultra tria millia passuum distent.

§ 2. Ceterae paroeciae et ecclesiae etiam regulares possunt, intra octavam, proprias processiones extra ecclesiae ambitum agere; sed ubi plures sunt ecclesiae, Ordinarii loci est dies, horas ac vias praestituere quibus suam quaeque processionem agant.

§ 1. Unless there be an immemorial custom to the contrary, or unless local circumstances in the prudent judgment of the bishop demand a deviation from the rule here laid down, only one solemn procession is permitted in the same place through the public streets on the feast of Corpus Christi. This procession is to be arranged and led by the more prominent church of the respective city or town, and all the clergy and male religious orders, including the exempt, as well as the confraternities of laymen, must attend it. Only those regulars who live perpetually in strict enclosure, or dwell three thousand paces from the city, are excused from participation.

The solemn Corpus Christi procession is to be held on the following Sunday, if the feast is transferred to that day,[3] as is the case in our country. Therefore, even taking into consideration § 2 of our canon, it would clearly be against the intention of the Church to hold the principal procession on Corpus Christi Thursday and a less pompous one on Sunday.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There must be only one public procession in the same town or city, unless an immemorial custom or special circumstances should induce the bishop to permit more. There is not much danger in our country, especially in the large cities, of having too many processions.

The dignior ecclesia, i. e., the more distinguished church, should lead the procession. Dignior undoubtedly is the cathedral church, which follows the collegiate church, provided it is also a parochial church.[4] It appears but just that a parochial church should be preferred to a collegiate church if the latter is not a parish church. Among the parish churches the more ancient one takes the lead over those established later, according to the rule: Prior in tempore prior in iure.

In this public procession the entire secular and regular clergy, as well as all confraternities, of men as well as women, are bound to participate. Religious congregations and orders of women need not attend, though Sisters who do not live in enclosure may do so if they wish; — at least the text does not exclude them because it only mentions those who are obliged to assist (interesse debent). As to the regulars, whether exempt or not, the Council of Trent[5] had already made it obligatory for them to attend, with one exception, to be explained further down (see next paragraph). The Council employs the phrase, "vocati accedant," which presupposes some

3 S. Rit. C., June 24, 1911 ad VI (n. 4273).

4 S. Rit. C., Jan. 11, 1681 (n. 1657).

5 Sess. 25, c. 13, de reg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:03 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

kind of invitation. The Code discards this clause, and hence no invitation is required, though the leading church may reasonably be expected to indicate or announce the hour of holding the procession and the place where it is to start.

The exception for regulars is based upon enclosure and distance. The enclosure, of course, is to be understood of the so-called papal enclosure, as stated under can. 597. This was already enacted by the Council of Trent and confirmed by later interpretations, the substance of which is that all regulars, no matter how exempt they may be, must attend the Corpus Christi procession, unless they live under strict perpetual enclosure or can show a privilege granted after the Council of Trent, and directly, i. e., not obtained by way of communication.[6] Such privileges were granted to the Society of Jesus, to the Discalced Carmelites, the Theatines and the Scolapii.[7] The Code does not annul these privileges by any contrary clause. The great Mendicant Orders of St. Francis and St. Dominic are obliged to attend the Corpus Christi procession,[8] as are also the Augustinians, Calceati as well Discalceati, and the Celestinians.[9] As to the Benedictines there are two decisions worthy of note: the Cassinese monks need not take part in any procession except that of Corpus Christi, which they must attend, even though there be but six monks living in the monastery.[10] Note that no communication of privileges avails in this case. But what about enclosure? The Benedictines have a papal 6 Urban VIII, "Nuper," Nov. 17, 1638, § 1 f.; S. Rit. C., Sept. 28, 1658 (n. 1096).

7 Piatus M., Praelectiones Juris Regul., II, p. 41.

8 S. Rit. C., May 10, 1594; May 9, 1693 (nn. 48, 1895).

9 S. Rit. C., Dec. 9, 1638; Sept. 2, 1602; Aug. 4, 1674 ad 1 (nn. 661, 1244, 1716).

10 S. Rit. C., June 10, 1602; Oct. 2, 1683 (nn. 99, 1716).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:03 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

enclosure, but no strict enclosure in the sense of the text, like the Carthusians and the Camaldolese Hermits. The decision concerning the Cassinese Benedictines mentions custom, but the Corpus Christi procession is expressly excepted. The same is true of the Celestinians and may safely be applied to other monastic bodies of regulars; because if the enclosure means something, it certainly must be applied to that case also, the Corpus Christi procession, as a special token of belief in that mystery and a public profession of the same against heresy.

The next reason for exception is distance. The general decree of Urban VIII, as restated by the S. Congregation, mentions " Ultra medium milliare a civitate," i. e., over half a mile from the city. Our text has 300 passus. A passus, according to Roman reckoning, is 485 English or American feet, so that 3000 passus would be about 14,550 feet, or 1,290 feet less than three English statute miles.[11] In round figures, therefore, we may say, three English (not geographical) miles, especially since the text says, ultra, above.

The point from which the distance must be reckoned is simply stated as " the city." But in a large city there may be a considerable difference between the different points from which distance may be measured. If the city limits are taken as the starting point, the three miles would be entirely outside the boundaries. This, we believe, is the meaning of the text, for it obliges the entire clergy of a city or town to attend the procession, and one decision says that all the Friars Preachers and Friars Minor intra septa moenium civitatis must be present.[12] Therefore not the church from which the procession

11 Cfr. Ramsay-Lanciani, Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 462 f.

12 S. Rit. C., May 10, 1594 (n. 48).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google starts, but the city limits, is the point from which the distance is to be calculated. The direction, of course, is intended in the direct or air line, i. e., within a radius of three miles outside the city limits.

It may be added that the obligation of assisting at the Corpus Christi procession binds the secular and regular clergy only if the procession is held in the open air, per publicas vias, and the term regular must be taken in the strict sense, to the exclusion of such religious as are exempt by a special indult.

§ 2. The other parishes and churches, including those which are in charge of regulars, may have their own processions outside the church during the Octave of Corpus Christi; but the local Ordinary should assign the day, the hour and the route for each parish. This rule was established in order to avoid unpleasant encounters. In some cases even the side of the wall or street had to be determined [13] and pastors were ordered not to invade the boundaries of other parishes.[14]

OTHER PROCESSIONS

CAN. 1292

Ordinarius loci, audito Capitulo cathedrali, potest ex publica causa extraordinarias processiones indicere; quibus, sicut et ordinariis ac consuetis, ii omnes interesse debent de quibus in can. 1291, § 1.

The local Ordinary, after having heard the advice of his cathedral chapter, may for a public cause order extraordinary processions, which, like the customary and ordinary ones, must be attended by those mentioned in can. 1291, § 1.

13 S. Rit. C., June 11, 1594 (n. 49).

14 S. Rit. C., Jan. 11, 1681 (n. 1657).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the Ordinary is obliged to hear the advice of the chapter and cannot lawfully order a procession without it, this is a fortiori true of the Vicar Capitular or administrator. Should a procession be ordered without their advice, the canons cannot be compelled to attend it.[15] This rule must also be followed in our country, where the consultors should be asked collegialiter. This does not, however, mean that the bishop cannot order a customary or extraordinary procession without first hearing the advice of the consultors. He may order a procession to be held in any parish; but he cannot oblige the whole clergy, secular and regular, to attend it if he has not previously asked the chapter or the consultors. However, it is sufficient to ask their advice; their consent is not required.[16] Besides the bishop no one else in the diocese is entitled to order a procession, but in the absence of the bishop the Vicar General may do so, provided he has asked the advice of the chapter.[17]

The extraordinary processions which the local Ordinary may order must be for a public cause, or, as is sometimes stated, [18] pro bono publico et publico honore. This means that the public interest or the welfare of the community must be at stake, as is evident from the enumeration of these extraordinary processions in the Ritual. They cannot be ordered for mere display. If a procession is customary on the occasion of the entrance of a new bishop, this may be ordered for all, including the regulars, though without threatening censures.[19] An extraordinary procession may also be ordered on the 15 S. C. EE. et RR., May 11, 1663 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 261).

16 S. Rit. C., March 28, 1626 (n. 394).

17 S. Rit. C., Jan. 14, 1617, ad 1; Sept. 28, 1630 (nn. 346, 545).

18 S. Rit. C., July 27, 1609 (n. 272).

19 S. C. C., July 11, 1750 (Richter, Trid., p. 416, n. 9).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google occasion of a Eucharistic Congress, or a Congress in honor of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, or an important meeting of Catholics.

Those obliged to participate in these extraordinary processions are the same as mentioned in can. 1291; hence, first of all, the whole secular clergy, provided the Ordinary has duly intimated his intention to that effect. Indicere, to order, certainly implies a lawful summons. The regular clergy, too, must be present, under the same conditions as stated above. We will add that the monks, unless they can prove a legitimate contrary custom, must also be present. Thus it has been decided concerning the monks of St. Basil and St. Benedict in a case from the diocese of Paderborn.[20] The time or hour for the procession must be announced by the Ordinary, who may suit himself about it.[21] The lay confraternities also must attend these processions if they have been summoned by the Ordinary.[22]

RELIGIOUS NOT ALLOWED TO HOLD PUBLIC PROCESSIONS WITHOUT THE PERMISSION OF THE ORDINARY

CAN. 1293

Religiosi etiam exempti nequeunt extra suas ecclesias et claustra processiones ducere sine Ordinarii loci licentia, salvo praescripto can. 1291, § 2.

With the exception of the Octave of Corpus Christi, religious, even though exempt, are not allowed to hold processions outside their churches and cloisters without the permission of the local Ordinary, who may grant this 20 S. Rit. C., June 23, 1670; Dec. 22, 1770, ad 2 (nn. 2116, 2490).

21 S. Rit. C., June 17, 1606 (n. 217).

22 S. Rit. C., Sept. 23, 1820 (n. 2608).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:06 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

permission without asking the consent or advice of his chapter or consultors, nay, even against the will of the pastor or collegiate chapter,[23] and once for all. He may also prescribe or change the route the procession has to take.[24] If the religious have obtained a special papal indult, or can prove a legal custom, they do not need the permission of the Ordinary.[25] Also, if they have obtained a direct privilege, or can prove that the custom existed after the year 1628, no permission is required.[26] But if they have neither the Ordinary's permission, nor a privilege, nor an indult, nor a legitimate custom in their favor, they are allowed to hold processions only within their church or cloister, always excepting the Octave of Corpus Christi. However, a general decree of 1658, Sept. 28, states that if they have no cloister they may lead a procession even outside the church, provided they keep to the walls of the church and re-enter through the same or another door of the same (non extra ambitum ecclesiae).

PASTORS AND THE CLERGY IN RELATION TO PROCESSIONS

CAN. 1294

§ 1. Parochus vel quivis alius nequit processiones novas inducere aut consuetas transferre vel abolere sine Ordinarii loci licentia.

§ 2. Processionibus alicuius ecclesiae propriis interesse debent omnes clerici eidem ecclesiae adscripti.

§ 1. Neither the pastor nor anyone else can introduce new, or transfer or abolish the customary processions without the permission of the local Ordinary.

23 S. Rit. C., March 11, 1690; June 13, 1673; Aug. 31, 1697; (nn. 1824, 1573, 1980).

24 S. Rit. C., Nov. 24, 1691 (n. 1859).

25 S. Rit. C., Nov. 14, 1676; April 8, 1702 (n. 1581, 2099).

26 S. Rit. C., Sept. 28, 1658; Dec. 19, 1671, ad 1 (nn. 1096, 1440).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:08 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The term quivis alius includes cathedral and collegiate chapters, as well as confraternities, so that the prohibition also applies to them.[27] If the Ordinary wishes to transfer a procession, for instance, on account of rain, the chapter would have to be asked.[28] Our canon is silent about the advice of the chapter, we believe with good reason. It goes without saying that also pastors or religious orders or congregations must abide by this law concerning processions.[29]

§ 2. At processions which are peculiar to any church, all the clergy belonging to the respective church must be present. The term adscripti means ascribed or assigned, and, in canonical parlance, includes all the beneficiaries of a church. All who hold a benefice in a church, unless they are iubilati, must attend the processions of that church.[30] In our country all the clergy assigned to a church are under the same obligation. However, the bishop may exempt such as are employed in other occupations, for instance, in mission work, teaching, etc. One who has been granted a vacation need not trouble his conscience concerning this obligation.

ORDER OF PROCESSIONS

CAN. 1295

Curent Ordinarii ut sacrae processiones, exstirpatis, si qui sint, malis usibus, ordinate procedant eaque modestia ac reverentia ab omnibus perficiantur, quae piis ac religiosis huiusmodi actibus maxime convenit.

27 S. Rit. C., Nov. 22, 1681, ad 2, 8; Jan. 12, 1704, ad 22 (nn. 1684, 2123).

28 S. Rit. C., Sept. 3, 1695; July 21, 1696 (nn. 1932, 1947).

29 S. C. EE. et RR., March 14, 1879 (A. S. S., XI, 595 ff.).

30 S. C. C., Feb. 27, 1677; Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., III, 8, 9 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:10 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Ordinaries shall take care that any abuses that may have crept in are eliminated and that the processions proceed in an orderly manner, with the modesty and reverence suited to such pious and religious acts.

An orderly procession presupposes an orderly arrangement according to rules.[31] The participants must walk two by two, with the Cross leading the procession. After the cross-bearer follow the girls and boys, then the women and men, then the confraternities according to rank, then the religious according to the rules of precedence set forth in can. 491, then the secular clergy, and finally the officiating minister, prelate or priest. Here may be supplied what has been omitted under canons 106 and 491. The cathedral chapter precedes, or rather, strictly speaking, follows the collegiate chapter, and the chapter or body of regulars with their abbot or prelate must walk among the religious.[32] Among the secular clergy priority of ordination decides the order of precedence, to which also the "doctors" must defer.[33] Each of the religious orders or congregations must march separately under its own cross, if it carries one, and not promiscuously with other religious or the secular clergy. This rule also binds magistri[34] (i. e., doctors of divinity) in the order of Preachers.

There should be no dancing or fighting, no eating or drinking, and no unseemly noise.[35] For this reason processions should not last too long or cover a distance of more than six miles, especially if the roads are bad or walking is difficult.[36]

31 Cfr. Pont. Rom., l. II, c. 32, n. 2; Rit. Rom., tit. IX, c. 1.

32 S. Rit. C., Dec. 22, 1770 (n. 2490 ad 2).

33 S. Rit. C., April 4, 1626 (n. 397).

34 S. Rit. C., July 6, 1593; May 10, 1594; July 10, 1638 (nn. 33, 48, 647).

35 S. Rit. C., Jan. 21, 1690 n. 5 (n. 1821); Rit. Rom., l. c., n. 6.

36 S. Rit. C., March 7, 1703 (n. 2109).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:11 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XVIII

SACRED VESSELS, UTENSILS, VESTMENTS ETC. (SACRA SUPELLEX)

The Latin term sacra supellex includes all sacred vessels, utensils, vestments, linens, and ornaments which are used for sacred functions, especially for the celebration of the Mass. The reader should not expect a canonist to go into details with regard to these objects, as they strictly belong to the domain of liturgical writers, who, however, curious to say, seem to evade a definition of the term sacra supellex.[1]

CARE AND MAINTENANCE

CAN. 1296

§ 1. Sacra supellex, praesertim quae, ad normam legum liturgicarum, benedicta aut consecrata esse debet quaeque publico in cultu adhibetur, caute custodiatur in ecclesiae sacrario aliove tuto ac decenti loco, nec ad usus profanos adhibeatur.

§ 2. Ad normam can. 1522 universae sacrae supellectilis inventarium fiat et accurate servetur.

§ 3. Circa materiam et formam sacrae supellectilis, serventur praescripta liturgica, ecclesiastica traditio et, meliore quo fieri potest modo, etiam artis sacrae leges.

1 We consulted De Herdt, Van der Stappen, Martinucci, Wapelhorst, and several books written in the vernacular.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:12 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1297

Nisi aliter sit provisum, qui officio tenentur reparandae ecclesiae ad normam can. 1186, debent quoque ei providere de sacra supellectili ad cultum necessaria.

Articles of sacra supellex, especially when blessed or consecrated as required by the liturgical rules, and used for public worship must be carefully guarded in the sacristy of the church or in some other safe and decent place, and may not be used for profane purposes.

An inventory should be made of the whole stock and diligently preserved.

As to the material and form of the sacra supellex, the liturgical laws, ecclesiastical tradition, and, as far as possible, the rules of sacred art should be observed.

Chalice and paten must be consecrated by the bishop, or whoever is authorized to perform this function.

The following articles must be blessed: the ciborium[2] (and most probably also the lunula,[3] because it comes into immediate contact with the Blessed Sacrament); the vestments used by the priest at sacred functions, particularly in saying Mass, to wit: amice, alb, cincture, maniple, chasuble, palla, corporal and altar linens.

The following objects may be blessed, though it is not prescribed by the rubrics: the ostensorium, the custodia or pyx for the lunula; dalmatics, cope, and surplice.

Not to be blessed are the purificators,[4] the chalice veil,

2 The formula is either that of the Pontif. Rom., tit. De Bened. Tabernaculi sive Vasculi pro SS. Euch. Conservanda, or that of the Rit. Rom., tit. VIII, c. 23 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 76*).

3 Gasparri, De SSma Euch., n. 1031; S. Rit. C., Feb. 4, 1871 (n. 3234, ad IV) forbids the use of lunulae which so enclose the S. Host that the glass directly touches the sacred species. Yet, says Gasparri (l. c., n. 1029), the custom is widespread in France; we may add, also in the U. S.

4 S. Rit. C., Sept. 7, 1816 ad 12 (n. 2572).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:13 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the burse, the antipendium, candlesticks, cruets, censers, etc.

Concerning the consecration of the chalice and paten it may be noted that the formula requires three signs of the cross, one at the word consecrare, the other at the word sanctificare, the third at the benedictionem. If the last were omitted, there might be a doubt as to the validity of the consecration, although the S. Congregation would not answer the question directly.[5] It is more probable that the consecration would be valid, for the act of consecration proper is completed by the two anointings with holy chrism, made with the twofold sign of the cross, and the same S. Congregation has declared that chalice and paten are validly consecrated even though but one sign of the cross was made on them with holy chrism, either at the consecrare or sanctificare.[6] From this it appears lawful to conclude that, even though the last or third sign of the cross were omitted, the consecration would be valid. If the cup (cuppa) of the chalice be very deep, so that the consecrator cannot reach the bottom, which he should do when anointing from one rim through the center or bottom to the other rim, with the thumb, he may reach as far as possible with the thumb, rather than use the middle finger, and thus observe the rubric.[7]

The sacerdotal vestments require a special blessing. Therefore, if a priest should, in good faith, wear unblessed vestments, they would not become blessed by the mere act of wearing them at Mass.[8] Priests who are allowed to bless sacred vestments and linens must

5 S. Rit. C., June 14, 1873 (n. 3305): "servetur rubrica Pont. Romani."

6 S. Rit. C., Dec. 2, 1882 (n. 3560).

7 S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1884 (n. 3620).

8 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1867, ad VII (n. 3162).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:13 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

use the formula given in the Roman Ritual, and are not allowed to use the Pontificale for single pieces.[9] Thus a palla and corporal should be blessed together, and if only one of them is to be blessed, the formula prescribed in the Roman Ritual should be used.[10]

For the rest we refer to the rubrics in the liturgical books and to the authors who have written on the subject.

Can. 1297 applies the rules concerning the obligation of repairing churches as laid down in can. 1186 also to the support of the sacra supellex, which is necessary for divine worship. Hence, unless other provisions have been made, the same persons are bound to provide for the upkeep and repair of the sacred vessels, utensils, and vestments. There is a good rule stated in one decision, viz., if the parishioners cannot afford to contribute money, they should contribute their labor.[11] This is often done by the women, especially where there is an Altar Society which busies itself with embellishing the house of God. If other means fail, the beneficiaries of the church are obliged to share the burden pro rata.[12] Finally, Catholic storekeepers and pawnbrokers are admonished not to buy or sell any sacred utensils, especially if there is reason to suspect theft.[13]

CARDINALITIAL, EPISCOPAL, AND CLERICAL SUPELLEX

In order to understand these canons it will be well to take a historical note from the Constitution of Benedict XIV, which directly refers to our subject.[14] Whilst at Avignon, the Popes erected a magnificent chapel in their 9 S. Rit. C., March 16, 1876; Dec. 2, 1881, ad 1 (nn. 3392, 3533).

10 S. Rit. C., Sept. 4, 1880 (n. 3524); Rit. Rom., tit. VIII, c. 22.

11 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 10, 1841 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 477 f.).

12 S. C. C., March 13, 1657; Bened. XIV, Instit., 100, n. 13.

13 Bened. XIV, Instit., 69, n. 3.

14 "Inter arduas," April 22, 1749.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:13 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

palace, and after their return to Rome, they retained this custom in the Vatican palace, often performing solemn functions there which were formerly held in the basilicas, assisted by the Cardinals and the whole papal chapel. The Cardinals, too, held pontifical ceremonies requiring a more than common sacra supellex, which was partly purchased by the prelates, partly by the papal treasurer. The former were from time immemorial accustomed either to leave or bequeathe their vestments, etc., to the papal chapel,[15] and thus established a precedent which might be called a juridical prescription. Urban VIII formulated the written law[16] which, in substance, has entered our Code.

CAN. 1298

§ 1. Defuncti S. R. E. Cardinalis, qui in Urbe domicilium habebat, quamvis Episcopus suburbicarius aut Abbas nullius esset, quaelibet sacra supellex, exceptis annulis et crucibus pectoralibus etiam cum sacris reliquiis, aliaeque res omnes stabiliter divino cultui destinatae, nulla habita ratione qualitatis et naturae redituum quibus comparatae sint, cedunt pontificio sacrario, nisi Cardinalis eas donaverit aut testamento reliquerit alicui ecclesiae vel oratorio publico vel loco pio vel alicui personae ecclesiasticae seu religiosae.

§ 2. Optandum ut Cardinalis, qui huiusmodi facultate uti velit, saltem ex parte praeferat illas ecclesias, quas in titulum, administrationem seu commendam obtinuerit.

This law commands: (1) that the entire sacra supellex and everything that was permanently destined for divine 15 Julius III, "Cum sicut nobis," June 26, 1550.

16 Urban VIII, "Aequum est," July 19, 1642.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

worship, found in the possession of a cardinal at the time of his death, if that cardinal had his domicile in Rome, even though he was a suburbicarian bishop or an abbot nullius, belongs to the papal sacristy. Urban VIII excepted some things, viz., one tunicella for each cardinal deacon, one chasuble for each cardinal priest, one cope for each cardinal bishop, candlesticks, ewer, and basin. But none of these things are excepted by the new Code, and consequently all may be claimed by the papal sacristan. (2) Rings and pectoral crosses, together with the sacred relics enclosed therein, must not, but may be ceded to the pontifical sacristy.[17] (3) The entire sacra supellex, with the exceptions mentioned, belongs to the papal sacristy, without any regard as to the quality and nature of the pecuniary means from which said sacra supellex was acquired, i. e., it matters not whether the cardinal bought it from church revenues, or from his patrimonial income, or obtained it by donation or bequest. (4) But the Code permits cardinals de curia to donate or bequeathe their sacra supellex to a church, or a public oratory, or a pious institution, or any ecclesiastical or religious person. This was the point which gave occasion to the aforesaid constitution of Benedict XIV.

§ 2 expresses the wish that, when such a donation or bequest is made, preference be given to the church which the Cardinal held as titular possessor, administrator, or commendatory abbot.

Sacra supellex here comprises the following articles: mitres, chasubles, copes, tunics, dalmatics, sandals, gloves, sacerdotal vestments, chalices, patens, sacred vessels of every kind (pyx, ostensorium, thimble) especially those 17 Cfr. Pius IX, "Quum illud," June 1, 1847 (A. S. S., III, 281).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

consecrated or blessed, also oilstocks, ewer and basin, cruets, procession cross, candlesticks, crozier, faldstool; also the Missal, Pontifical, Canon, and Gradual.[18]

CAN. 1299

§ 1. Defuncti Episcopi residentialis, etiamsi cardinalitia dignitate fulserit, sacra supellex cedit ecclesiae cathedrali, exceptis annulis et crucibus pectoralibus etiam cum sacris reliquiis, salvo praescripto can. 1288, et iis omnibus utensilibus cuiusvis generis quae legitime probetur ab Episcopo defuncto comparata fuisse bonis ad ipsam ecclesiam non pertinentibus neque constet in ecclesiae proprietatem transiisse.

§ 2. Si quando Episcopus duas vel plures dioeceses successive rexerit aut simul praefuerit duabus vel pluribus dioecesibus unitis aut in perpetuam administrationem concessis, cathedralem ecclesiam habentibus propriam et distinctam, quae sacra utensilia constiterit reditibus unius tantum dioecesis fuisse comparata, ea eiusdem cathedrali ecclesiae cedunt; secus dividi debent, aequis partibus, inter singulas ecclesias cathedrales, dummodo dioecesium reditus ne sint divisi, sed unam episcopalem mensam perpetuo constituant; si vero reditus divisi sint ac separati, divisio fiat inter singulas ecclesias cathedrales pro ratione fructuum quos in singulis dioecesibus Episcopus perceperit ac temporis quo eisdem praefuerit.

§ 3. Episcopus obligatione tenetur inventarii sacrorum utensilium authentica forma conficiendi, in quo pro rei veritate quando acquisita sint, exprimat, distincteque describat si qua non ex ecclesiae reditibus ac proventibus, sed ex propriis bonis vel ex donatione

18 Pius IX, "Quum illud," 3, III.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sibi facta comparaverit; secus omnia reditibus ecclesiae comparata praesumuntur.

Can. 1299 lays down a rule concerning the sacra supellex left by a residental bishop, even though he may have been a cardinal. It excepts the rings and pectoral crosses, but as to the relics contained therein, it refers to can. 1288, which concerns a relic of the Holy Cross. Otherwise all articles of a bishop's sacra supellex belongs by law to the deceased prelate's cathedral church, with the exception, however, of such sacred appurtenances (omnibus utensilibus) which were bought by the deceased bishop with his own money and such utensils as have not passed into the possession of the church. However, for each of these two kinds of sacra supellex there must be legal proof that the money was not church money and that the ownership was acquired by the church. How is that proof to be furnished?

§ 3, following a letter of Pius IX, "Quum aliud," says that bishops are strictly obliged to draw up an inventory faithfully describing their sacred utensils, both as to the time when they were bought — because according to can. 1511, § 2, thirty years' possession suffices to acquire such objects — and also as to the nature of the revenues with which they were bought. If this is done conscientiously and accurately, there should be little difficulty to carry out the present law, which, be it said by the way, involves a strict obligation. If no inventory is found, the presumption (praesumptio iuris) is that the entire sacra supellex was purchased with church money.

§ 2 describes what is to be done in the case of a bishop who ruled several dioceses, either as titular bishop or perpetual administrator. The supposition is, of course, that each of these dioceses has its own cathedral church.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the bishop has made the required inventory, it will be easy to decide which of the cathedral churches furnished the money for the sacra supellex. If only one of them furnished the money, it has an exclusive claim to the articles in question. If two or three dioceses contributed to the purchase, there are two possibilities: If no separate accounts are kept but all revenues go to constitute the income of the bishop (mensa episcopalis), then the sacra supellex accrues to the different cathedral churches in equal shares.[19] But if the different dioceses keep separate and distinct accounts of their revenues, then the sacra supellex is to be divided and apportioned according to the salary, cathedraticum, etc., the bishop received from each diocese, and according to the length of time he governed each diocese. Of course, unless books and records are carefully kept, there may be difficulties in making the division.

CAN. 1300

Quae in can. 1299 praescripta sunt, applicentur quoque clerico qui in aliqua ecclesia beneficium saeculare vel religiosum obtinuerit.

This canon applies the enactment of can. 1299 to clergymen who held either a secular or a religious benefice in any church during their lifetimes. It is a timely reminder to the clergy of their legal status with regard to the sacra supellex, which received attention from the earliest times and is frequently mentioned in the Decretals.[20] Thus Alexander III sanctioned a previous law which provided that all the goods appertaining to and acquired by a church must and may be claimed by said church. Pius V

19 We suppose this holds also with regard to pro-cathedrals.

20 Cf. Can. Apost., 40; c. 12, X, III, 26.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reiterated this regulation and explained to the papal collectors that they had no right to claim these goods for the camera spoliorum, but should leave them to the church whose beneficiary died.[21] The same rule applied to the canons and beneficiaries of St. Peter's basilica, no matter whether they still held their offices at the time of their death or not.[22]

This canon is, strictly speaking, applicable only to clergymen who held a church benefice, either secular or religious, but we venture to say that the mind of the legislator also includes those who, though not beneficiaries in the strictly canonical sense, have been employed either as pastors or curates (assistants), or otherwise. In other words, the law is applicable also to most clergymen of our country. The reasons are almost the same: the sacra supellex should not pass into profane hands and the churches should not be deprived of the necessary furniture. Besides, there is no doubt that many, perhaps most sacred vessels, utensils, vestments, etc., are bought with money contributed by the congregation or the members of the altar society, and such supellex, therefore, strictly belongs to the church. On the other hand, we would not deny that sometimes gifts are made for merely personal motives, for instance, by parents, relatives, friends. These could not in justice be claimed by the church. Care must always be taken, however, to avoid profanation.

21 S. Pius V, "Romani Pontificis," Aug. 30, 1567, § 11.

22 Benedict XIV, "Ad honorandum," March 27, 1752, § 27.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DUTY OF MAKING A VALID TESTAMENT

CAN. 1301

§ 1. S. R. E. Cardinalis, Episcopus residentialis aliique clerici beneficiarii obligatione tenentur curandi testamento vel alio instrumento in forma iuris civilis valido ut canonica praescripta, de quibus in can. 1298–1300, debitum effectum etiam in foro civili sortiantur.

§ 2. Quamobrem tempestive ac forma iure civili valida personam integrae famae designent ad normam can. 380, quae, adveniente ipsorum morte, non solum sacram supellectilem, sed etiam libros, documenta aliaque quae ad ecclesiam pertinent et in eorum domo reperiuntur, occupet et cui debentur, remittat.

Cardinals, residential bishops, and all other clerical beneficiaries are in duty bound to draw up a last will or other instrument in a form acknowledged as valid by civil law, in order that the regulations laid down in can. 1298–1300 may be made effective also in the civil courts. For this purpose they shall in due time and legal form appoint some person of good character who, at the approach of their death, shall take temporary possession not only of their sacra supellex, but also of books, documents, and other objects belonging to the church and found in their residence, and deliver them to the lawful claimants.

Since the decree of the S. C. of the Propaganda, Dec. 15, 1840,[23] substantial changes have been introduced in the laws of our country which render said decree largely superfluous. Church property is no longer held in fee simple, but other forms of tenure have developed, which 23 Coll. P. F., n. 916.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

render the conveyance of church property more simple. There is no doubt that the "corporation sole" effectively serves the necessities of churches whose form of government is monarchical.[24] For the rest, the statute laws in the different States of the Union differ widely. In many States bishops are authorized to become corporations sole by complying with certain conditions, which are usually extremely simple, consisting merely of the filing of some statement, certificate, or affidavit with a certain officer of the law. Then there is the system of quasi-corporations, which are by statute declared corporations for the purpose of taking over property.[25]

24 Cfr. K. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 63.

25 Ibid., p. 46. Here it may be well to allege the following passage from the same distinguished author's work, p. 354 f.:

"The Roman Catholic church in this country has been until recently on a missionary basis. With the exception of some parishes in the territory acquired by the Louisiana Purchase, there are therefore few Catholic parishes in the United States. The theory was that the mission was conducted from abroad. It followed that the property necessary for the purposes of the church must be subject to the control of the church in general, rather than to that of any individual congregation or congregations. To achieve this condition of affairs the aim has been to place all the property of all the churches in the name of the bishop or archbishop of the diocese to which the particular church belongs. Consequently the property of Catholic churches is universally vested in some church dignitary either in his personal capacity or as a corporation sole. The question then arises as to the nature of this title. Is it legal or equitable or both? There can be no question that the bishop or archbishop is the holder of the legal title. The property ordinarily stands absolutely in his name. It is customary, and in fact required by church regulation in at least some of the dioceses, to eliminate from deeds to bishops all words of trust and all words indicating the official character of the grantee. Where the bishop is not a corporation sole he is required to make a will by which he devises such property to certain persons with a direction to convey it to the person appointed as his successor. The devisee, under such circumstances, is not held responsible for any negligence of the devisor. . . . It follows that money raised for the special purpose of building a local church and placed in the hands of the bishop does not pass absolutely to him, but is a trust fund which the congregation can reclaim at any time by action. It further follows that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CUSTODY OF THE SACRA SUPELLEX

CAN. 1302

Rectores ecclesiarum aliique quibus credita sit cura sacrae supellectilis, sedulo debent eiusdem conservationi et decori prospicere.

Rectors of churches and others entrusted with the care of the articles known as sacra supellex, shall diligently preserve them and keep them clean and neat.

Chapter churches generally have a custos among their members.[26] Of course the Ordinary cannot be dispensed from the duty of vigilance, and this applies also to the churches of the Oriental Rite.[27] Everything connected with divine service should be clean, whole and decent.[28] The pastors are responsible in a particular manner for the condition of the sacra supellex, which must not be left exclusively in the hands of laymen or even Sisters. The pastor may, of course, entrust his curate or assistant with this duty.[29] Care must be bestowed not only on pontifical vestments and utensils, but also on the things that are worn or used by simplices sacerdotes, for the law draws no distinction between the two, and the sacred minister, when he celebrates the sacred mysteries, is not inferior to the pontiff, except by accident, because the a voluntary assignment by a bishop for the benefit of creditors does not cover such property and that a deed or mortgage given to a purchaser who has notice of the facts (and who could purchase church property without such notice) passes no beneficial title. It further follows that on the death of the bishop the court may appoint a trustee in his stead." Parish corporations are recommended and corporations sole permitted, by the S. C. C., July 29, 1911 (Eccl. Review, Vol. 45, p. 585 f.).

26 C. 1, X, 27.

27 S. C. P. F., April 13, 1807, III (n. 692); S. C. EE. et. RR., Feb. 9, 1751 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 31 ff.).

28 S. C. EE. et RR., l. c.; Rit. Rom., tit. I, c. un., n. 9.

29 Rit. Rom., l. c., n. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google vestments he wears refer chiefly to the sacred action, and not to the person who performs it.

FURTHER DIRECTIONS REGARDING THE SACRA SUPELLEX

CAN. 1303

§ 1. Ecclesia cathedralis debet sacram supellectilem aliaque quae ad Missae sacrificium vel ad alias pontificales functiones necessaria sint, gratis Episcopo subministrare etiam privatim celebranti non solum in ecclesia cathedrali, sed in aliis quoque civitatis vel suburbii ecclesiis.

§ 2. Si qua ecclesia paupertate laboret, potest Ordinarius permittere ut a sacerdotibus qui in proprium commodum inibi celebrant, propter utensilia ceteraque ad Missae sacrificium necessaria, moderata stipes exigatur.

§ 3. Episcopi, non autem Vicarii Capitularis aut Vicarii Generalis sine speciali mandato, est eandem stipem definire, et nemini, etiam religiosis etsi exemptis, licet ea maiorem exigere.

§ 4. Episcopus pro tota dioecesi eiusmodi stipem in dioecesana Synodo, si fieri possit, definiat, aut extra Synodum, audito Capitulo.

§ 1. The cathedral church must furnish free of charge the sacra supellex and everything else that may be required for the celebration of Mass and other pontifical functions, no matter whether the bishop celebrates privately or solemnly, in the cathedral church or in any other church of the episcopal city or its suburbs. Hence if the bishop celebrates within the city limits or its suburbs he may take the pontifical vestments along with him, and the cathedral church cannot object.[30] But this holds only for the episcopal city, not for the whole diocese.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. If a church is very poor, the Ordinary may permit that a moderate fee is paid by the priests who say Mass there for their own convenience, to defray the expense of the sacred utensils and other things required for the celebration of Mass. The S. Congregation has decided that beneficiaries who are compelled to say Mass in a church not their own should contribute something for the candles, bread, and wine, and for the use of the vestments.[31]

§ 3. The bishop, but not the Vicar Capitular nor the Vicar General without a special mandate, may fix the amount of said offering, and no one, not even exempt religious, may charge more.

§ 4. The bishop should fix this fee for the whole diocese at the diocesan synod, or else with the advice of the chapter or diocesan consultors.

BLESSING OF THE SACRA SUPELLEX

CAN. 1304

Benedictionem illius sacrae supellectilis quae ad normam legum liturgicarum benedici debet antequam ad usum sibi proprium adhibeatur, impertire possunt:

1.° S. R. E. Cardinales et Episcopi omnes;

2.° Locorum Ordinarii, charactere episcopali carentes, pro ecclesiis et oratoriis proprii territorii;

3.° Parochus pro ecclesiis et oratoriis in territorio suae paroeciae positis, et rectores ecclesiarum pro suis ecclesiis;

30 S. Rit. C., March 14, 1643, ad 4, 5 (n. 831).

31 S. C. C., May 14, 1729 (Richter, Trid., p. 137, n. 62).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

4.° Sacerdotes a loci Ordinario delegati, intra fines delegationis et iurisdictionis delegantis;

5.° Superiores religiosi et sacerdotes eiusdem religionis ab ipsis delegati, pro propriis ecclesiis et oratoriis ac pro ecclesiis monialium sibi subiectarum.

The sacra supellex should be blessed before use, and it may be blessed by the following:

1.° By the cardinals and all bishops (hence also by titular bishops);

2.° By local Ordinaries not endowed with the episcopal character for the churches and oratories of their respective territory;

3.° By the pastors for the churches and oratories situated within their parishes, and the rectors of churches for their own churches;

4.° By priests delegated by the local Ordinary, within the limits of their delegation and the jurisdiction of the delegans;

5.° By religious superiors and by priests of the same institute delegated by the superior for their own churches and oratories and those of the nuns subject to them.

Notice that only blessings in which no sacred anointing is required are here understood. The consecration of chalices and patens is not included. The S. Congregation has clearly stated this in more than one decision, as may be seen from the references in the footnotes. What is said in no. 4, concerning delegation, may be deduced from the general rules on delegation.

The finis delegationis or purpose of delegation must be ascertained from the wording of the faculties. If the general term sacra supellex is used, it includes everything comprised under that name, also the vasa sacra, which only need to be blessed.[32] But if the faculty reads, "benedicto sacerdotalium indumentorum," it excludes the blessing of altar linens, corporals, palls, and sacred vessels, which are all separate and distinct blessings given by means of special formulas.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning religious superiors the text establishes nothing new, except perhaps that they require no privilege for blessing these things. Their power is, as it always was, restricted to their own churches. Thus abbots, priors (convenual not cloistral priors), guardians, rectors of the Society of Jesus, and all others who enjoy the privilege of blessing sacred vestments, cannot make use of this privilege except for the benefit of their convents and churches,— provided always that no sacred anointing is required.[33] When the S. C. was asked whether this faculty could be used also for blessing things pertaining to other churches than their own, in view of a standing custom (stante eorum allegata consuetudine), it replied: non posse, they cannot.[34] Hence the "awful" decree of Sept. 1659, decided nothing else but what was Roman jurisprudence.[35] The Cassinese abbots were also included in this decision.[36] If it is asked, which churches are meant by the term propriae ecclesiae, the answer is clearly contained in a decision[37] of the S. Rit. C., of May 16, 1744. They are the pleno iure subiectae, i, e., those churches which have been forever incorporated with the monasteries or religious organizations both as to temporal and spiritual matters by the Holy See. For the rest there is no need of stretching this power.

32 S. Rit. C., Dec. 2, 1881, ad II (n. 3533).

33 S. Rit. C., March 13, 1632 (n. 587).

34 S. Rit. C., Aug. 18, 1629 (n. 513).

35 S. Rit. C., n. 1131.

36 S. Rit. C., July 30, 1689, ad II (n. 1815).

37 S. Rit. C., May 16, 1744, ad II (n. 2377).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:16 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If every pastor and every rector has the right to bless these articles, why should the religious superior trouble himself? An occasion for this assumption, and a reasonable one at that, would be if a religious community would distribute vestments to poor churches gratis. But not even in that case would the religious superior be authorized to bless the vestments to be distributed to churches outside of his jurisdiction.[38]

The churches of nuns who are subject to religious, are of course, those of such nuns as are subject to the prelates regular; therefore they are styled moniales, i. e., Sisters with solemn vows. Tertiaries are not included. If these moniales (like the Sisters of the Visitation) are subject to the bishop, the sacra supellex of their churches must be blessed either by the Ordinary or the chaplain, provided the latter has received due delegation from the bishop. The same rule holds concerning the sacra supellex of ordinary sisterhoods. The chaplains should not imagine that they are rectors of the chapels or oratories of the religious whom they attend, for can. 479 gives a precise definition of a rector, in which they are not included.

LOSS OF BLESSING OR CONSECRATION

CAN. 1305

§ 1. Sacra supellex benedicta aut consecrata benedictionem aut consecrationem amittit:

1.° Si tales laesiones vel mutationes subierit ut pristinam amiserit formam, et iam ad suos usus non habeatur idonea;

2.° Si ad usus indecores adhibita vel publicae venditioni exposita fuerit.

38 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1867, ad XI (n. 3157).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:16 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Calix et patena non amittunt consecrationem ob consumptionem vel renovationem auraturae, salva tamen, priore in casu, gravi obligatione rursum ea inaurandi.

§ 1. An article of sacra supellex that has been blessed or consecrated, loses its blessing or consecration:

1.° If it is so badly damaged or changed that its form is lost and it becomes unfit for its proper purpose;

2.° If it has been used for unsuitable purposes or exhibited for public sale.

The first case would be verified if a chalice sustained a slight break or split in the cup near the bottom. Not so however, if the break be near the upper part, so that consecration can take place in it without fear of spilling the contents.[39] The same rule applies, mutatis mutandis, to the paten, if it had holes in it. Concerning vestments a serious damage or injury would occur if a vestment were entirely taken apart and a relatively large portion renewed. The form of a corporal, or palla, etc., would be changed if, according to common parlance, the vestment could no longer be recognized as such, which would be the case, e. g., if only rags remained.

Concerning indecorous use there is a synodal decree of Auvergne (536) which prohibits the use of sacred vestments for bridal or wedding purposes. The same synod also forbade covering corpses with altar linens (pallia et ministeria divina).[40] Zitelli refers to a decision according to which the consecration of a chalice would be lost if the sacred vessel was used for drinking purposes 39 Cfr. Schulte, Consecranda, 1907, p. 272, who also says: If the cup can be detached from the stem by loosening the screw, consecration would not be lost.

40 Can. 43, Dist. 1, de cons. Hefele, Conc.-Gesch., II, 739: ministeria divina here means sacred vestments.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by heretics.[41] There is no doubt that any profanation of a sinful character entails the loss of consecration. Exhibition for public sale or public auction also effects loss of consecration, no matter whether it is done by Catholics or non-Catholics.

§ 2 changes the former discipline or practice of the Roman congregations[42] when it states that chalice and paten do not lose their consecration by the wearing away of the gilding, or by the process of regilding. But if the gold plating wears away, there is a grave obligation to have the vessel replated. This new law undoubtedly presupposes, not only that the whole chalice is consecrated, but also that the consecration does not attach to the mere surface or gilding.

HANDLING SACRED VESSELS

Can. 1306

§ 1. Curandum ne calix cum patena et ante lotionem purificatoria, pallae et corporalia, quae adhibita fuere in sacrificio Missae, tangantur, nisi a celericis vel ab iis qui eorum custodiam habent.

§ 2. Purificatoria, pallae et corporalia, in Missae sacrificio adhibita, ne tradantur lavanda laicis, etiam religiosis, nisi prius abluta fuerint a clerico in maioribus ordinibus constituto; aqua autem primae lotionis mittatur in sacrarium vel, si hoc desit, in ignem.

§ 1. Care must be taken that the chalice with the paten, as well as the purificators palls, and corporals, before being washed, after having been used in the Sacrifice of the Mass are touched only by clerics or by those who have charge of these things.

41 Apparatus Iuris Eccl., 1886, p. 433; Lib. II, c. III, art. 1, § 5.

42 S. Rit. C., June 14, 1845 (n. 2889).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Pseudo-Soter says nuns and consecrated virgins were not allowed to touch the sacred vessels and palls.[43] Another canon says subdeacons and acolythes are allowed to touch sacred utensils — sacra ministeria, as they were then called.[44] The janitors (ostiarii) were not allowed to wash or handle them, but had to watch that no one touched them.[45] The general name for all who were allowed to touch such objects was sacrati Dominoque dedicati homines.[46] That the old Testament played a part in this prohibition is evident.[47] According to present-day practice only those who have received the clerical tonsure are allowed to touch the sacred objects mentioned. A cleric may touch the chalice and prepare it for the holy Sacrifice in the sacristy.[48] One who has received the clerical tonsure may act as chaplain to a prelate saying low Mass, or as quasi-master of ceremonies to a priest singing high Mass without deacon and subdeacon. But in the latter case he has to observe the following rules: (a) he shall not wipe the chalice before the offertory, nor bring it to the altar uncovered; (b) he shall not pour wine and water into the chalice; (c) he shall not pass the paten with the host, nor the chalice to the celebrant; (d) he must not touch the chalice after the canon has started, nor remove the pall from it; (e) after the ablution he shall not clean the chalice, but may cover it with the veil and burse, and carry it to the credential. If a cleric who has received only the tonsure[49]

43 C. 25, Dist. 1; — the manufacturer of this canon betrays himself as a forger, because monachae were unknown in Soter's time.

44 C. 32, Dist. 1.

45 C. 40, Dist. 1, de cons. (Pseudo-Clem.).

46 C. 41, Dist. 1, de cons. (Pseudo-Sixtus).

47 C. 42, Dist. 1, de cons.

48 S. Rit. C., Nov. 23, 1906, ad I (n. 4194).

49 A reasonable or plausible cause is required that one in minor orders or simply tonsured be admitted as subdeacon, but one who is no cleric should not be admitted; S. Rit. C., March 10, 1906, ad I (n.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

acts as subdeacon, dressed in amice, alb, cincture and tunic (without maniple), he has to observe these rules, but may carry the chalice to the altar. If an untonsured cleric is to assist a prelate at low Mass, the chalice must be placed on the altar before Mass, entirely covered and the cleric must act as if he were assisting a simplex sacerdos. He may, however, assist the prelate at the missal, turn the leaves, hold the candle, but he must not touch or wipe the chalice.[50]

§ 2. Purificators, palls, and corporals, which have been used in the Sacrifice of Mass, shall not be given to lay persons, even though they be religious, to be washed by them before they have been washed by a cleric in higher orders. The water of the first washing should be poured into the waste hole, called sacrarium, or if there is no sacrarium, into the fire.

Religious here means lay Brothers and Sisters. Even the Ordinary cannot grant these the permission here in question.[51] If, therefore, laymen, Sisters or Brothers, have to handle an object which they are forbidden by § 1 to touch, let them use a clean purificator.

Concerning the ostensorium, ciborium, and custodia, there is no prohibition of touching these objects, nor are laymen obliged to use a cloth in handling them.

4181); this is the general tenor of decisions.

50 S. Rit. C., March 10, 1906, ad II–VII (l. c.).

51 S. Rit. C., Sept. 12, 1857 (n. 3059). "Vel ab aliis qui eorum custodiam habeant" may cause a doubt, as if laymen or Sisters were allowed to touch said articles. Yet it appears from can. 1302 that these custodians are supposed to be of the clerical rank. This is confirmed by the last quoted decision of S. Rit. C. However, this seems to be understood of immediate touch; for a mediate touch, i. e., by means of a cloth, can hardly be forbidden. Neither should Sisters have scruples if they touch the sacred vessels transiently or inadvertently.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XIX

VOWS AND OATHS

CHAPTER I

VOWS, DEFINITION AND CAPACITY

CAN. 1307

§ 1. Votum, idest promissio deliberata ac libera Deo facta de bono possibili et meliore, ex virtute religionis impleri debet.

§ 2. Nisi iure prohibeantur, omnes congruenti rationis usu pollentes, sunt voti capaces.

§ 3. Votum metu gravi et iniusto emissum ipso iure nullum est.

§ 1. A vow is a deliberate and free promise made to God concerning something possible and better; it obliges by reason of the virtue of religion.

The promise[1] must be made to God, because He is the end of our actions, which ought indeed all to be directed to Him. A promise involves the obligation of keeping it, and hence differs from a mere resolution. A promise, to entail a lasting obligation, requires full consent, freely given. Every substantial error, therefore, in fact every error which is the cause of a vow, renders the latter

1 Cf. Suarez, De Religione, tract. VI, De Voto (ed. Paris., 1859, t. XIV, p. 750 ff.); S. Alphonsus, Lib. IV, tr. II c. 3, De Voto (ed. Paris, 1875, Vol. II, p. 120 ff.); Lehmkuhl, Theol. Moralis, I, n. 428 ff.; Cath. Enc., Vol. XV, 511 f. (by Vermeersch, S. J.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

null and void. This does not, however, imply that every circumstance or detail attending the vow must be known in advance.

Freedom excludes fear and compulsion, which may be brought to bear upon the will either from the outside or from within.

From the necessity of free and deliberate consent — because every vow is a human act — it naturally follows that the material object of the promise made must be something that lies in man's power, an object of which he is allowed to dispose and over which he has control. Hence it must be something possible, namely, attainable by his physical and moral faculties. Thus it would involve a physical impossibility to impose upon oneself a fast which were incompatible with the physical labor one has to do, or which would seriously impair one's health; and it would be morally impossible to avoid every sin.

The object of a vow must furthermore be a bonum melius, i. e., something better than its omission, or something which does not impede or nullify a higher or better good. Hence no object which is sinful in itself (ex parte rei votae) can be made the object of a vow. Nor can anything useless or entirely indifferent be properly speaking intended in a vow. Thus a matter which would disturb the means of higher perfection or prevent the fulfillment of an ecclesiastical law, could not be made the object of a vow.

Lastly, the definition says that a vow obliges by reason of the virtue of religion. A vow is an act that refers to God as its immediate and proper end, and therefore is an act of that worship (actus latriae) which is due to God alone. If one "makes a vow to a saint," the meaning is that he makes the vow to God in honor of the saint, just as churches are dedicated. Such acts naturally spring from the virtue of religion, which regulates the relation between the Creator and His creature, the union between God and man.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Unless prohibited by law, all who have the necessary use of reason, are capable of making a vow.

§ 3. A vow made under the influence of grave and unjust fear is null and void by law.

The general rule [2] is that everyone who has sufficient use of reason and free will may make a vow. However, as Suarez [3] says, for a vow to be valid before God there is required the necessary knowledge of God and of what the vow implies. If the latter knowledge were wanting, the subject would not enjoy that use of reason which is proportionate (congruens) to the object of the vow. On the other hand, although it may be said that the use of reason enlightened by faith is necessary, yet even a heretic who errs in certain doctrinal matters may pronounce a valid vow of chastity, provided he has the intention to make a vow and knows what it involves, at least substantially.[4] And substantial knowledge is generally supposed to exist in those who have sufficient use of reason to realize what a grievous sin is.

Some persons are excluded by law from making vows. Thus those who have not attained the required age, are forbidden to make a religious vow, and those who are subject to others in the matter of the vow are forbidden to do so. Bishops and clergymen should not take a vow to resign their offices or undertake a pilgrimage which would for a long time prevent them from fulfilling their duties.[5]

2 Cfr. S. Thom., Summa Theol., 2^a 2^{ae} q. 88, art. 8 f.

3 De Voto, l. III, c. 2, n. 9 (l. c., p. 895).

4 S. Poenit., Nov. 29, 1842 (Coll. P. F., n. 959).

5 Cfr. Suarez, l. c. l. III, c. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Married women should not make vows incompatible with their state, religious should not, without the knowledge of their superiors, vow things which would clash with their ordinary duties.

Fear to render a vow invalid, must be grave, i. e., such as is apt to influence a man of character and constancy. Such a fear would be that of torment or death.[6] It must also be unjust, viz., threatened by such as have no authority or right to do so, or entirely out of proportion to the matter of the vow. The law which declares such a vow invalid is presumably the ecclesiastical law, for it would be difficult to prove that the natural law renders such a law invalid, since the voluntarium is not entirely wanting even under the pressure of grave fear.

KINDS OF VOWS

CAN. 1308

§ 1. Votum est publicum, si nomine Ecclesiae a legitimo Superiore ecclesiastico acceptetur; secus privatum.

§ 2. Sollemne, si ab Ecclesia uti tale fuerit agnitum; secus simplex.

§ 3. Reservatum, cuius dispensationem sola Sedes Apostolica concedere potest.

§ 4. Personale, quo actio voventis promittitur; reale, quo promittitur res aliqua; mixtum, quod personalis et realis naturam participat.

A vow is public when it is accepted by a lawful ecclesiastical superior in the name of the Church; all vows not so accepted are private.

Therefore, the intervention of the Church through her

[6] C. 6, X, 40; Suarez, De Voto, l. I, c. 8, n. 5, thought otherwise.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lawful representatives is necessary to make a vow public.

The term superior supposes authority in foro externo, at least this is the usual acceptation. Hence neither the pastor, as such, nor a confessor, as such, can accept a public vow or render a vow public.

Private vows, of course, may be made into the hands of pastor or confessor, nay without any intervention on the part of the Church.

A vow is solemn if it is acknowledged as such by the Church; otherwise it is simple. This distinction has been explained in Vol. III of this Commentary. A vow is reserved if dispensation from it can be granted only by the Apostolic See.

A vow is personal if the object of the promise is an act of the vowing person, for instance, to love another; it is real if an object other than the act itself is promised; it is mixed if it combines the elements both of a personal and of a real vow. A vow to make a pilgrimage, e. g., is a personal vow, but if it includes giving an alms, it is mixed.

RESERVED VOWS

CAN. 1309

Vota privata Sedi Apostolicae reservata sunt tantummodo votum perfectae ac perpetuae castitatis et votum ingrediendi in religionem votorum sollemnium, quae emissa fuerint absolute et post completum decimum aetatis annum.

The only private vows which are reserved to the Apostolic See are that of perfect and perpetual chastity and that of entering a religious order with solemn vows, provided they are made unconditionally and after the eighteenth year of age has been completed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

St. Thomas knew two reserved vows: that of continence and that of a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. But the number was later increased, so that five were considered as reserved: to enter a religious order, to observe perpetual chastity, to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, St. James of Compostella (Spain), and to the tombs of St. Peter and Paul in Rome.[7] Now the three pilgrimages are taken away from the number of vows reserved to the Holy See, and only two are left. These two are explicitly defined, so that little doubt is left as to their extent.

The vow of perfect and perpetual chastity (perfectae et perpetuale castitatis) tends to an act that is perfect in itself and by reason of the matter intended. If the vow is taken from a motive lower than love of the virtue of chastity, it is imperfect. Such a lower motive may be vanity, physical imbecility, or even stubbornness. A vow of chastity would be imperfect on the part of the matter vowed, if only virginity, or integrity of the body, or not marrying, was contracted.[8]

A vow is perpetual if it is taken not for a limited time only, (for instance until a certain age), but forever.

The vow of "entering a religious institute" here refers to orders of regulars, i. e., the religious state in which solemn vows are pronounced.

These private vows are not reserved to the Holy See unless made unconditionally. A condition would be, for instance, if I receive that favor, if I am restored to health; if the order is approved by the Holy See; if there is a convent of that order in such and such a country, etc.

Besides, the person who takes such a vow must have completed the eighteenth year of age. This is a higher

7 Bened. XIV, "Inter praeteritos," Dec. 3, 1749, § 42.

8 Cfr. Lehmkuhl, I, n. 477.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:17 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google limit than was set before, in fact until now there was no definite limit set to age in this connection.

PERSONAL OBLIGATION

CAN. 1310

§ 1. Votum non obligat, ratione sui, nisi emittentem.

§ 2. Voti realis obligatio transit ad heredes, item obligatio voti mixti pro parte qua reale est.

§ 1. A vow, as such, obliges no one but the person who makes it, for the reason that a vow involves a strictly personal obligation, which can neither be assumed nor fulfilled except by the one who has offered this promise to God.

In the city of Rome the fastday of Feb. 1 was long ago introduced by reason of a vow. After the promulgation of the Constitution of Urban VIII, "Universa," of Sept. 13, 1642, doubts were proposed to the S. Congregation of Rites as to whether the feasts suppressed by that constitution also included the feasts which had been kept merely by reason of a vow. The answer was that the feasts observed by reason of a vow, but now suppressed, oblige only those who made the vow, not their successors.[9] Why, then, is the 1st of February still observed in Rome? Because there was a law, or statute, or precept attached to the vow. Therefore it is not the vow as such (ratione sui), but the law attached to it, which obliges the successors of the one who made the original vow[10]; provided that law was accepted by the majority and was not abrogated by a later law or contrary custom.

§ 2. The obligation arising from a real vow passes

9 S. C. Rit., April 18, 1043; Nov. 19, 1650; June 23, 1703, ad 1 (nn. 834, 932, 2113).

10 Suarez, De Voto, l. IV, c. 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to the heirs, that arising from a mixed vow only in so far as the real part is concerned.

A personal vow expires with the death of the person who made it, and hence, for instance, the obligation of making a pilgrimage does not pass to the heirs. But if one vowed not only a pilgrimage, but also a certain sum of money to the sanctuary, the real part of the vow, respecting the donation, must be fulfilled by those who succeeded the deceased in the possession of his property. Why? Because an heir is, in virtue of justice and by reason of an at least implied or tacit contract, obliged to pay the debts of the one whose property he obtains either by last will and testament or by succession ab intestato. There is no reason why religious debts should not be paid, even though the civil law does not compel the heirs to pay them.[11] It is not necessary to recur to the religious aspect of the question, because, as Suarez truly says,[12] religious loyalty does not strictly oblige to restitution. Of course, if the vow was originally restricted to the lifetime of the vovens, or made conditional upon its acceptance by the heirs, it does not oblige the latter unless they accept the inheritance. It is evident that the heir must know of such a vow, one way or the other; if he does not, the inheritance must be considered free of encumbrance. A legacy or bequest left by vow must therefore, in virtue of justice, be delivered to the persons or pious institutes for whom it was intended by the vovens.

11 Cfr. l. 2, Dig. 50, 12: "voti enim obligationem ad heredem transire constat."

12 De Voto, l. IV, c. 11, n. 8 f. The older English law left it with the Ordinaries to dispose of goods left ab intestato for pious purposes. Cfr. Blackstone-Cooley, II, § 494.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CESSATION OF OBLIGATION

CAN. 1311

Cessat votum lapsu temporis ad finiendam obligationem appositi, mutatione substantiali materiae promissae, deficiente conditione a qua votum pendet aut eiusdem causa finali, irritatione, dispensatione, commutatione.

A vow ceases to oblige:

(a) After the time conditionally set for its fulfillment has expired; (b) If there is a substantial change in the thing promised; (c) if some condition on which the vow was made to depend, is not fulfilled; (d) if the cause or object for which the vow was made ceases to exist; (e) by nullification, dispensation, or commutation.

Before explaining these points we must premise that the time when an obligation commences (terminus a quo), differs according to the character of the vow, whether it is negative (a promise to omit something) or positive (a promise to perform a good work). If a vow is negative (for instance, not to play cards, not to gamble), it obliges immediately (statius ac pro statim), unless it was limited by the vovens. An affirmative vow, on the other hand, e. g., to enter a religious order, though it also begins to oblige from the time it was made, may reasonably be postponed until a time which is more convenient according to one's own prudent judgment.[13]

Now as to cessation:

Ad 1. The lapse of time is here considered as ad finiendam which signifies that a precise term was set, beyond which the vovens had no intention to oblige himself. For instance, if one would take the "pledge" (to abstain from 13 See Suarez, De Voto, l. IV, c. 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

intoxicating drinks) in the form of a vow (in itself the pledge implies no vow, but a mere resolution) for one year, the obligation would cease after 365 days have elapsed, even in a leap year. This rule holds good for personal as well as real and mixed vows. If a vow was made for a certain time, but the time limit was only a secondary or accessory consideration, and not a condition proper, it is generally presumed that the vow, if personal (for instance, of fasting), ceases after the lapse of that period. Whereas if it is real, it does not cease to oblige even after that time and must therefore be complied with even if the time limit has expired.[14] This, of course, holds also of mixed vows, as to their material object.

Ad 2. A substantial change of the thing promised also renders a vow null and void. Such a change would occur, e. g., if one had vowed to give substantial alms for a good purpose, and later became poor; he would then be free of his vow and need not beg to get the money.[15] The same rule applies to a personal vow (for instance, of undertaking a pilgrimage or of fasting) if one's health becomes so gravely impaired that one cannot comply with one's promise. This holds even if the change has been brought about by one's own fault.[16]

Ad. 3. A vow ceases to oblige, thirdly, if the condition attached to it by the vovens is not fulfilled, for instance, if one made a vow in order to obtain good health, and this favor has not been restored; or if one vowed to enter religion, provided such and such a convent would receive him or her. In the latter case he would not be obliged to ask for admission to another convent.[17]

14 S. Alph., lib. IV, tr. II, c. 3, De Voto, n. 220 (ed. cit., p. 132 f.).

15 Ibid., n. 225, 3 ff.

16 Ibid.

17 Cfr. Suarez, De Voto, l. IV, c. 17.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ad 4. By final cause (causa finalis) must be understood the main and primary reason that moves or prompts one to make a vow; for instance, if the poverty of a church caused one to vow a legacy to it, or if the sickness of a friend prompted one to vow a pilgrimage for his recovery. Besides this final cause, there may be impulsive reasons, which aided in impelling one to make the vow, but only accidentally or secondarily; these do not constitute the end or object for which the vow was made.[18] Now, if the final cause or purpose of a vow ceases to exist, as in the case of a poor institution becoming wealthy, the obligation ceases. But if the poverty of the institution was only a secondary or impelling cause ("ad facilius donandum") the vow obliges even after the institution ceases to be poor. It is, therefore, somewhat similar to a condition.

Ad. 5. The nullification or irritation of vows as well as dispensation and commutation are treated in the following canons.

IRRITATION OF VOWS

CAN. 1312

§1. Qui potestatem dominativam in voluntatem voventis legitime exercet, potest eius vota valide et, ex iusta causa, etiam licite irrita reddere, ita ut nullo in casu obligatio postea reviviscat.

§ 2. Qui potestatem non quidem in voluntatem voventis, sed in voti materiam habet, potest voti obligationem tandiu suspendere, quandiu voti adimplementum sibi praeiudicium afferat.

§ 1. Whoever lawfully exercises controlling power over the will of the vovens may validly and, for a reasonable

18 Suarez, De Voto, lib. IV, c. 18, n. 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google cause, also licitly nullify his vow, so that the obligation ceases, never to revive.

This is what is called irritation, and may be defined as an act by which either the object of the vow, or the act of the vowing person itself, ceases to oblige. When the matter of the vow (for instance, a pilgrimage) is immediately concerned, irritation is called indirect (see § 2). When the will, or, rather, the act of the vovens, is affected, irritation is called direct, because by it the act is revoked and, as it were, cancelled.[19] This power may be exercised only by persons to whom the will of the vovens is subject by reason of governing or domestic power, as distinguished from the power of jurisdiction. The dominative or domestic power, like the paternal power, is radically based upon the natural law, but has its formal sanction in ecclesiastical law.

The domestic authorities here concerned are:

(1) The pope and religious superiors (and superioresses) with regard to vows made by their subjects after their religious profession. As to the pope, the question is solved in can. 499, § 1; as to the superiors, there can be no doubt, since all superiors, even the female, enjoy domestic power over their subjects by virtue of the vow of obedience. This certainly is true with respect to all those who rule and live in a community to which the name "religious" may be applied in the canonical sense. Hence the superiors, higher and local, of all orders and congregations, papal as well as diocesan, have the power of irritating vows made by their subjects after the simple profession, for it is by this profession that the members are really placed under domestic power.

The answer is different for religious societies which 19 Suarez, De Voto, l. VI, c. 1, n. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pronounce no vows, or only the one or other. For the mere act of constituting a body or society does not yet give rise to the dominative power in its full sense. However, if the members are obliged to obey superiors who, in the constitutions, are said to enjoy dominative power,[20] there can be no doubt that their private vows can be nullified by these superiors. Vows of novices cannot be nullified by the religious superior in virtue of direct irritation.[21] Neither can the superiors, per se, irritate vows made before profession. Yet in virtue of the higher perfection attached to the religious state, and by reason of the ecclesiastical law, these private vows remain suspended, as will be seen under can. 1315.

(2) Parents and tutors or guardians may by direct irritation nullify the vows taken by boys who have not yet completed the fourteenth or by girls who have not yet completed the twelfth year of age.[22] Some authors[23] have extended this right to grandparents, which may be accepted as a benign interpretation, although can. 89 hardly warrants the extension.

(3) The husband, being the head of the wife according to divine and ecclesiastical law, may nullify the vows of his helpmate made in the married state. This rule most probably applies to all kinds of vows made by the wife, not only to such as are directly opposed to conjugal life.[24] The wife, on the other hand, cannot directly irritate any vow of her husband. What if the wife has taken a vow with the consent and approval of her husband? Even in 20 Thus the Constit. of the Precious Blood Fathers, pro Praxi Americana reads (art. 1): "Sacerdotes Provinciae Americanae subiiciuntur vicario, qui auctoritate dominativa pollet, cui proinde obedientiam praestare tenentur." See can. 675, 501.

21 Cfr. Lehmkuhl, l. c. I, n. 460.

22 Can. 88, § 2.

23 S. Alph., l. c., n. 229; Lehmkuhl, l. c., n. 458.

24 S. Alph., De Voto, n. 234.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this case he may nullify the vow, because his power has not been curtailed by his former consent.[25] This rule is extended by some authors also to the mutual vow of chastity,[26] holding that the husband may irritate the vow, and consequently also his own.

§ 2. Those who have power over the object of the vow, but not over the will of the vowing person, may suspend the obligation accruing from the vow if its fulfillment would be prejudicial to them. This, as stated above, is called indirect irritation. It is based on the principle that no one can promise anything that would violate the rights of another. Under this heading may be enumerated the following cases:

(1) Ecclesiastical superiors, the pope, bishops, religious superiors, also in virtue of jurisdiction, may suspend the obligation of vows that are detrimental to the welfare of the church, either universal or particular, or of their subjects. This holds good also of vows made before the vowing person became dependent on the respective superior.

(2) Parents and guardians may suspend the obligation of vows made by their dependants until these are of age.

(3) A wife may suspend certain vows of her husband, for instance, one which would cause long absence, one of keeping severe abstinence or of not asking the debitum coniugale.[27]

(4) Authors add that masters may suspend the vows of their servants. This applies to the ancient relation between master and servant (herus et servus), but is hardly applicable to modern conditions.

Direct irritation requires no reason for its validity, but

25 Ibid.; n. 239.

26 Ibid.; cfr. Lehmkuhl, l. c., I, n. 463, who, however, advises provisional dispensation.

27 St. Alph., l. c. n. 235, n. 242.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:18 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

only for licitness. If the vovens demands the irritation of a vow from his or her superior, the reason must be sincerely stated, otherwise the superior would act invalidly, because he is not supposed to make use of this power without a reason.[28] Of his own accord, however, the superior may irritate a vow of his subject without a reason, though he may grievously sin by doing so, if the vow is important.

Indirect irritation requires no reason except the fact that a vow is detrimental to the welfare of the Church, or to authority, or to the salvation of the vovens. Of this the superior is the judge.

DISPENSATION FROM VOWS

CAN. 1313

Vota non reservata possunt iusta de causa dispensare, dummodo dispensatio ne laedat ius aliis quaesitum:

1.° Loci Ordinarius quod attinet ad omnes suos subditos atque etiam peregrinos;

2.° Superior religionis clericalis exemptae quod attinet ad personas quae can. 514, § 1, enumerantur;

3.° Ii quibus ab Apostolica Sede delegata fuerit dispensandi potestas.

Vows that are not reserved may be dispensed from, for a just reason, provided the dispensation does not trench on the right acquired by a third person. Such dispensations may be granted:

1.° By the local Ordinary to his own subjects as well as to peregrini;

2.° By religious superiors of exempt clerical institutes

28 Lehmkuhl, l. c., n. 465.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:19 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to all those persons that are mentioned in can. 514, § 1;

3.° By those to whom the power of dispensing has been granted by the Apostolic See.

Dispensation here means a relaxation of the rigor of the law in a particular case. More particularly it involves a remission of an obligation contracted before God[29]; for a vow is made to God only. A vow may justly be considered a law, because it is based upon the divine law, although made by individual persons, since vows in general have always been sanctioned in Holy Writ. That the divinely instituted Church possesses the power of condoning vows is evident from the universal jurisdiction granted her by Christ. As vows, as well as the power of dispensing from them, are rooted in divine law, it follows that not even the Sovereign Pontiff can validly dispense from them without a proportionate reason. Much less, then, may those validly dispense without a cause, who enjoy only a limited and dependent power.

Notice the clause: dummodo ne laedat ius aliis quaesitum. A vow may be made in favor of a third person, say a poor girl, for the purpose of endowing her, or of a pious or charitable institution, or it may be a religious vow which affects a community. To dispense from a vow made in favor of a third person, if the latter has freely and fully accepted the same, per se exceeds even the power of the Pope. Yet it must be and is admitted by most canonists[30] that the Pope, in virtue of his supreme power and government of the Church, may dispense from vows which affect either physical persons or ecclesiastical communities for the reason that this is necessary for the common welfare. Of course, there must be a solid reason.

29 Lehmkuhl, l. c., n. 470.

30 Cfr. S. Alph., n. 256, where the negative opinion is said to have been held by some; St. Alphonsus himself defends the statement made in the text.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:19 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This power cannot, however, be vindicated to inferior prelates, and is therefore excluded in our text.

What are "vota non reservata"? Reservation must be interpreted strictly, according to can. 1309. Hence only those private vows are reserved which are enumerated and comply with the conditions laid down in that canon. Thus the vow of entering a religious congregation or embracing a stricter order is not reserved.

However, some difficulty arises from the comparison of our canon with can. 1309, because the latter mentions private reserved vows, whilst our canon (1313) simply says: "vota non reservata," without making a distinction between private and public vows. Public vows are those taken in a religious institute approved by the Church,[31] more especially the three that make up the religious state, no matter whether these vows be temporary or perpetual, simple or solemn. Are these religious vows included in the power of dispensation granted by law to those mentioned in can. 1313? It is certain that these vows must be considered as reserved to the Holy See, at least on account of the ius tertii.[32] Hence the general rule certainly forbids superiors, even though otherwise empowered, to dispense from them. Yet our bishops formerly could dispense from temporary vows of poverty and obedience in favor of non-enclosured members of diocesan institutes; also from the vow of chastity if not taken forever and absolutely.[33] The question therefore arises, whether bishops and exempt prelates may

31 Can. 488, 1.

32 S. C. P. F., Aug. 24, 1885 (Coll. P. F., n. 1642).

33 Ibid. and S. O., Aug. 2, 1876 (Coll. cit., n. 1461): "Quoad vota non reservata paupertatis et obedientiae, posse Episcopum in utroque casu dispensare, dummodo ius ex contractu oneroso acquisitum tertii, ipso rationabiliter invito, non laedatur. Quoad votum non reservatum castitatis, ex potestate ordinaria Episcopi, negative, nisi constet votum non fuisse perpetuum et absolutum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:19 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

still make use of this power? The answer is yes, because canonists generally hold, and the Code (can. 1309) does not deny, that vows not lasting or perfect in themselves, are not reserved. Hence, per se loquendo, the superiors mentioned might still use their power in favor of members with temporary vows, did not the Code, following a decision of the Holy Office, add the provision: provided no right arising from the onerous contract and acquired by a third person be violated.[34] Here, then, is the practical rule that should guide superiors: Follow can. 647, which determines the dismissal of religious with temporary vows only. This certainly is the canonically correct way, because it safeguards the rights of the third person, viz., the religious institute.

Here we may supply from St. Alphonsus [35] the information that no vow is reserved (a) if it is made with the intention of obliging oneself only sub levi, (b) if it is made under the influence of fear, (c) if it is not complete as to the object promised, e. g., the vow of virginity intended only to preserve the integrity of the body; (d) if it is made conditionally, even though the condition was fulfilled.

Concerning the persons mentioned in our text as being endowed with the power of dispensation, we must draw attention to the peregrini. For the purpose of this law a peregrinus is any one (hic et nunc) sojourning in the diocese of the dispensing Ordinary, and no inquiry is necessary as to his future intentions.[36] It goes without saying that by the local Ordinary is understood also the Vicar General and the administrator.

Those who have received delegated power to dispense from non-reserved vows from the Apostolic See are,

34 Ibid.

35 De Voto, n. 258; Lehmkuhl, I, n. 477.

36 Thus St. Alph., n. 262.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

among others, the regular confessors, i. e., confessors belonging to a regular order, for, according to the common doctrine of the school, these can dispense all the faithful from non-reserved vows, either in or outside the confessional. This power, based upon privilege, is granted by papal delegation.[37] How far it may be extended to papal delegates, depends on their credentials.

Since none of those named in our canon can dispense without a reason, it may be well to state some valid reasons as given by St. Alphonsus:[38]

(1) Periculum transgressionis ac indispositionis particularis vel communis hominum fragilitas;

(2) Magna difficultas in executione, sive praevisa fuit sive non praevisa;

(3) Si vovens vexetur magnis scrupulis;

(4) Si votum fuit emissum ex perturbata mente vel absque perfecta deliberatione, e. g., ex tristitia, ira, metu, etc.

COMMUTATION OF VOWS

CAN. 1314

Opus voto non reservato promissum potest in melius vel in aequale bonum ab ipso vovente commutari; in minus vero bonum ab illo cui potestas est dispensandi ad normam can. 1313.

Any good work promised in a non-reserved vow may be changed by the vovens into one better or equally good; but only those who may dispense according to canon 1313, can change it into a lesser work.

Commutation is the substitution of a promised good work for another, according to the rules of (at least)

37 S. Alph., l. c., n. 257; Lehmkuhl, I, 472.

38 De Voto, n. 252 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

geometrical proportion. The quality of a good work is measured by the spiritual profit of the vovens and the degree of divine pleasure and glory involved. This, of course, cannot be determined mathematically. The safest commutation always is a change into greater frequentation of the Sacraments.[39] The confessor, who is supposed to know the condition of his penitent, is the best judge in this matter.

Note that for a private change no reason is required, provided the promised good work is commuted into one that is obviously better. To commute the promised work into one less good, the authority that is empowered to dispense, must intervene. Therefore all those mentioned in can. 1313 may commute a non-reserved vow for a just reason, though it may be held with probability that the commutation would be valid even if there was no just reason because a commutation is not a complete liberation from a vow. It is also probable that even a vow made under oath may be commuted.[40]

Can. 1315

Vota ante professionem religiosam emissa suspenduntur, donec vovens in religione permanserit.

Vows made before religious profession are suspended as long the vovens remains in the religious institute which he has joined. This includes the vow of entering a stricter, say the Carthusian, order, for this vow is not reserved.[41] But what if this vow has been accepted by the stricter order, or if it was made under oath? Since

39 S. Alph., n. 243.

40 S. Alph. l. c., De Voto, n. 245; n. 190; Lehmkuhl, I, n. 479.

41 C. 5, 6°, III, 14, but the Pontiff dictates a penance for the vow not fulfilled, although the subject may remain in the more mitigated order.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the text draws no distinction, the vow would be suspended even in that case; in fact the stricter order could not formally accept it until the religious had made his profession there. But this is not intended here because it would be a case of transfer, which is reserved.[42] After dismissal, the vows revive.

42 Can. 632.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

OATHS

DEFINITION

CAN. 1316

§ 1. Iusiurandum, idest invocatio Nominis divini in testem veritatis, praestari nequit, nisi in veritate, in iudicio et in iustitia.

§ 2. Iusiurandum quod canones exigunt vel admittunt, per procuratorem praestari valide nequit.

§ 1. An oath, that is, the invocation of the Divine Name in witness of the truth, cannot be taken except with truth, judgment, and justice.

§ 2. Oaths demanded or admitted by Canon Law cannot validly be taken by proxy.

There were heretics who rejected oaths as illicit, or minimized their value, or depreciated their gravity, or made little of perjury.[1] The golden mean always held by the Church is that oaths are permitted if made under the conditions[2] laid down in this canon, to wit:

(1) They must be made in truth, for what a man solemnly affirms, should be in conformity with the truth,

1 Cfr. Professio Fidei Waldensibus proposita (Denzinger, n. 371); Errores Wicl. et Hus. (Denzinger, nn. 519, 556–558); propp. damn., 24–28, March 4, 1679 (ibid., nn. 1041 ff.); prop. 101, Quesnellii damn., Sept. 8, 1713 (ibid., 1316); prop. 75 Syn. Pisotoriens. damn., Aug. 28, 1794 (ibid., n. 1438).

2 Cfr. the Commentators on tit. 24, lib. II, de Iureiurando; S. Thom., II–II, q. 89; q. 98; S. Alph., l. IV, tr. II, c. 2; Suarez, De Relig., tr. V, de Iuramento, t. XIV, 438 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

and when he makes a promise, he should have the intention of keeping it.

(2) They must be made with judgment, i. e., with due and reverent consideration of the usefulness or necessity of an oath.

(3) They must be made in justice, because no unjust obligation is binding.

Of the various distinctions made by canonists we will consider only the two especially referred to in our Code — the assertory or affirmative oath, by which God is called upon to witness an assertion of a past or present fact; and the promissory oath, by which God is called upon to witness the execution of a resolution, vow or agreement. In both, the Deity must be invoked as witness and the intention must correspond with the words used in the invocation.

In judging the intention, which is always a difficult matter, the formula or terms of the promise must be taken according to the customary interpretation.

It is strictly forbidden to use a name for the Deity which is commonly considered to mean an evil spirit.[3] It is not necessary to couple the name of God with a verb in the imperative, or subjunctive, or optative form, for the indicative may have the same meaning, as in the formula: "God liveth, God knoweth, before God I speak, I tell the truth." But if these expressions were used as mere enunciations, the intention of swearing would, of course, be wanting.[4]

3 Thus deocce, with the Gallas, indicates an evil spirit; S. O., June 20, 1866, ad 37 (n. 1293).

4 S. Alph., l. c., n. 134.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE OBLIGATION ARISING FROM AN OATH

CAN. 1317

§ 1. Qui libere iurat se aliquid facturum, peculiari religionis obligatione tenetur implendi quod iureiurando firmaverit.

§ 2. Iusiurandum per vim aut metum gravem extortum valet, sed a Superiore ecclesiastico relaxari potest.

§ 3. Iusiurandum nec vi nec dolo praestitum quo quis privato bono aut favori renuntiat lege ipsi concesso, servandum est quoties non vergit in dispendium salutis aeternae.

§ 1. One who freely takes an oath, promising to perform something, is under a special obligation, arising from the virtue of religion, to keep what he has promised. The reason is that in a promissory oath God is called upon as solemn witness of our intention to keep what we promise, and as a guarantee and pledge of executing our intention, and hence failure to do so is a slur and an injury to His honor and truthfulness, and involves a sin, either mortal or venial according to the gravity of the matter, against religion.[5]

§ 2. An oath extorted by violence or grave fear is valid, but may be rescinded by one's ecclesiastical superior.

This "great question," as St. Alphonsus [6] calls it, is here solved according to the doctrine laid down in the decretals,[7] viz., that an oath taken under the influence of compulsion or grave fear is valid because man is obliged to keep what he promises under oath, lest God be found a 5 Cfr. Suarez, l. c., l. I, c. 9; l. III, c. 16; cfr. c. 1, C. 22, q. 2; cc. 8, 9, 17, 28, X, II, 24; Pius IX, Syllabus, n. 64.

6 L. c., II, n. 174; S. Thom., II-II, q. 89, art. 7, ad 2.

7 Cc. 8, 15, X, II, 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:20 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

false witness. However, the unjust extortioner has no just claim to the thing thus promised, and therefore the ecclesiastical authorities have absolved even sacred ministers who abjured their ministry under compulsion, from the obligation of the oath. Besides, all agree that no obligation of justice arises from an unjustly exacted oath, and that if the object (money, etc.) was already delivered, it could be claimed in court or regained by occult compensation.

§ 3. An oath taken without compulsion or fraud, by which one renounces some private good or favor granted him by law, must be kept, if it does not imply the loss of eternal salvation. The case is taken from the decretals.[8] Women had promised by oath to have their dowries sold. The pope told the judges to observe the canon law, which permitted such alienation, and to instruct the women to keep their oath, as long as no injury was done to others and there was no danger to their salvation.

NATURE OF OBLIGATION

CAN. 1318

§ 1. Iusiurandum promissorium sequitur naturam et conditiones actus cui adiicitur.

§ 2. Si actui directe vergenti in damnum aliorum aut in praeiudicium boni publici vel salutis aeternae iusiurandum adiiciatur, nullam exinde actus consequitur firmitatem.

§ 1. A promissory oath follows the nature and conditions of the act to which it is attached.

8 C. 15, 28, X, II, 24. Thus also an oath made to a meretrix, if no sin is involved, would hold; S. Alph., n. 177; even an oath to pay a usurer interest would bind, but the money may be reclaimed; c. 6, X, II, 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. If the oath is attached to an act which implies damage to others, or prejudice to the common welfare or to eternal salvation, the act receives no strength from the oath.

§ 1 explains the meaning of a promissory oath. It is attached to a contract, stipulation, or agreement, and lends higher sanction to the same, but the obligation of the oath cannot be extended farther than the contract or natural promise itself. Hence (a) a sworn promise, in order to be valid, must be accepted before it obliges; (b) it cannot be condoned, abated, or forgiven. Besides there may be other mutual or implied conditions, as is the case in every contract; e. g., if I am able, if my superior permits, etc.[9]

§ 2 declares that an oath has no binding force if attached to an act that (a) implies injury to a third person, for this would be evil,[10] or (b) injury to the public welfare, as if a judge would swear not to prosecute criminals, or a clergyman would take a civil oath forbidden by higher authority[11]; or (c) endangers eternal salvation. The underlying principle is that an oath cannot be a chain of iniquity.

CESSATION OF OBLIGATION

CAN. 1319

Obligatio iureiurando promissorio inducta desinit:

1.° Si remittatur ab eo in cuius commodum iusiurandum emissum fuerat;

2.° Si res iurata substantialiter mutetur, aut, mutatis adiunctis, fiat sive mala sive omnino indifferens, aut denique maius bonum impediat;

9 Cfr. c. 25, X, II, 24; Lehmkuhl, l. c., I, n. 419.

10 C. 12, X, II, 14; not to speak to parents or relatives.

11 Cfr. c. 21, X, II, 14; c. 12, X, II, 2; Engel, l. II, tit. 24, n. 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Deficiente causa finali aut conditione sub qua forte iusiurandum datum sit;

4.° Irritatione, dispensatione, commutatione, ad normam can. 1320.

The obligation contracted by a promissory oath ceases:

1.° If condoned by the one in whose favor it was taken;

2.° If the thing promised is substantially changed, or if, by reason of a change in the circumstances, the oath becomes sinful, or entirely indifferent, or an obstacle to attaining a higher good;

3.° If the final cause or condition under which the oath was taken, have ceased to exist or failed;

4.° By irritation, dispensation, or commutation, according to can. 1320.

The first reason has been explained above.

The second reason is a substantial change in the thing promised. Thus, one is not obliged to marry a girl to whom he promised marriage under oath, if the girl has undergone a substantial change as to her health, social condition, virginal state, etc., etc.,[12] or if the change affect the vovens so that he may incur danger of death, or infamy, or risk the loss of a great good. No one is supposed to have had the intention of obliging himself under oath to something that will gravely [13] embarrass him. If the thing becomes evil or entirely useless, for instance, if one had sworn to punish a child and the child has amended its conduct. Lastly, if one had taken an oath that would deter him from entering the religious or clerical state, it would not be binding, unless the public welfare were at stake.

12 S. Alph., n. 180.

13 Ibid., n. 187; for instance, the oath of keeping a secret.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DISPENSATION FROM OATHS

CAN. 1320

Qui irritare, dispensare, commutare possunt votum, eandem potestatem eademque ratione habent circa iusiurandum promissorium; sed si iurisiurandi dispensatio vergat in praeiudicium aliorum qui obligationem remittere recusent, una Apostolica Sedes potest iusiurandum dispensare propter necessitatem aut utilitatem Ecclesiae.

Those who are empowered to annul, dispense from, or commute vows, have the same power with regard to promissory oaths; but in case the dispensation involves a prejudice to a third person, who refuses to condone the obligation, the Holy See alone can dispense on account of the utility or necessity of the Church.

This power is included in the supreme power of the Church and required for the tranquillity and peace of individuals and society. Thus it would certainly be in favor of the public welfare to dispense a child under age from the oath of marrying a certain person, even though the parents should be unwilling to have the oath annulled.[14]

INTERPRETATION

CAN. 1321

Iusiurandum stricte est interpretandum secundum ius et secundum intentionem iurantis, aut, si hic dolo agat, secundum intentionem illius cui iuratur.

An oath must be interpreted strictly according to law and the intention of the vovens, or if the latter swears de-

14 C. 19, C. 22, q. 4; c. 15; C. 22, q. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ceitfully, according to the intention of the person to whom the oath is made.

Thus one who swears to keep the statutes of a certain society or congregation is obliged to observe only those which were issued when the oath was taken, not those published later.[15] Nor can the obligation of an oath be extended beyond the intention of the vovens, because this intention is the measure of the obligation. But if the person swears deceitfully, he has only himself to blame if his intention is not accepted and that of the person receiving the oath substituted therefor.[16]

15 C. 35, X, II, 24.

16 Cfr. the peculiar case stated in c. 25, X, II, 24.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PART IV

THE TEACHING OFFICE OF THE CHURCH

Although the authority of teaching and preaching the Word of God belongs to the Church by virtue of her divine constitution, and is therefore an inherent attribute of ecclesiastical persons, the manner of exercising this office constitutes part of the administrative rights of the Church. And although the depositum fidei can receive no substantial increase, yet its unfolding and explicit declaration are evidenced through the centuries. The material increase of the faithful and the administration of the Word of God have necessitated methods and means which were not so imperative in former times. Hence a certain change is noticeable also in the spread and exposition of the Word of God.

In Part IV the Code sets forth in a preamble the authority of the Church with regard to teaching the Word of God, and what is opposed to faith as understood by the Church. Then the text lays down rules for preaching (can. 1327–1351); sets up regulations for the institutions which hand down the Church's teaching, viz., seminaries and other schools (can. 1352–1383); the warding off of errors as exercised through the censorship of books (can. 1384–1405); and, lastly, the obligations connected with the profession of faith (can. 1406–1408).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:21 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RIGHT OF THE CHURCH TO TEACH

CAN. 1322

§ 1. Christus Dominus fidei depositum Ecclesiae concredidit, ut ipsa, Spiritu Sancto iugiter assistente, doctrinam revelatam sancte custodiret et fideliter exponeret.

§ 2. Ecclesiae, independenter a qualibet civili potestate, ius est et officium gentes omnes evangelicam doctrinam docendi: hanc vero rite ediscere veramque Dei Ecclesiam amplecti omnes divina lege tenentur.

§ 1. Christ, our Lord has entrusted to the Church the deposit of faith, in order that, by the continual assistance of the Holy Ghost, she might preserve the revealed doctrine and expound it faithfully.

The term "depositum fidei" (an allusion to I Tim. 6, 20), may be taken in a twofold sense. In the strict sense the deposit of the faith comprises all the truths which are either implicitly or explicitly contained in the written word of God or in tradition, and must be believed as revealed with divine faith. In a wider sense the deposit of faith comprises also those truths which, though not revealed, bear such an intimate relation to revealed truths that, without them, the latter could not be, at least easily and fully, preserved, expounded, and defended.[1] Both kinds of truth are in the lawful possession of the Church, who is entitled to make the deposit of faith in the wider sense an object of her infallible teaching, precisely in order to preserve the faith holy, i. e., unchanged, unsoiled, and unadulterated. The duty of preservation is in itself positive and affirmative and the Church complies with it by interpretation or exposition; but it sometimes also requires reprobation or rejection. Hence the Church has always claimed (a) the right of defining what belongs to the deposit of faith, i. e., faith and morals, or the extent of divine faith; (b) the right of proposing the true meaning of revealed truth in its professions of faith; (c) the right of rejecting or condemning whatever is contrary to the teaching of faith and morals, either by rejecting false interpretations of revealed truth, or reprobating false conclusions of reason, censuring and proscribing erroneous propositions, etc.; (d) the right of infallibly judging dogmatic facts connected with certain doctrines, as in the case of Jansenius.

1 Cfr. Mazzella, De Religione et Ecclesia, 1892, p. 615.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This office of an infallible teacher belongs to the Catholic Church not merely in virtue of her divine origin, but by reason of the continual assistance of the Holy Ghost promised to her by Christ, and which implies no new revelation, but a special providence keeping her free from error in the function of preserving and expounding the deposit of faith.[2]

§ 2. The Church, independently of the civil authority, possesses the right of teaching all nations the truth. Correlative to this right is the duty of teaching men, and on their part the duty of obtaining a knowledge of the truth and embracing the true Church of God. This obligation, incumbent on all, is derived from the divine law. Our Saviour not merely advised, but commanded, His Apostles to teach all nations and to preach the Gospel to every creature.[3] This command, intended also for their successors, itself forms part and parcel of the deposit of faith. It is attached to the universal mission of the Church, whose real object is nothing else but the union of men

2 Cfr. Matt. 28, 19 f.; John 14, 26; Mazzella, l. c., n. 789, p. 603. The divine assistance presupposes human coöperation and investigation.

3 Cfr. Matth. 28, 19 f.; Mark 16, 15 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

with God, or the salvation of all mankind through intimate union with the Creator. This mission is incumbent on the Church to the end of time and is fulfilled first of all by preaching the word of God, because faith is the conditio sine qua non of salvation.[4] Faith, of course, must here be taken as including the works of faith, or, in the usual formula, faith and morals. The law of prescription adds weight to the divine law which dictates that everything directly related to the spiritual end or purpose for which the Church was founded, is her proper and exclusive domain, in which she is supreme, having no higher authority than God Himself. The Church, then, is not at liberty to abdicate this right or to shirk this duty, for if she did so, she would cease to exist or give up her divine mission.

On the other hand, as salvation is the individual concern of every rational creature destined to the ultimate end for which he is created, and since salvation begins with faith, it follows that every person endowed with the necessary faculties must coöperate in the attainment of that end by adopting the means without which it cannot be achieved — necessitate medii. Each and everyone must hear and believe those who preach the word of God by the authority of the Church. Every preacher must have a divine call, this is communicated to him through the organization founded by Christ. This is the Church in which all those who wish to be saved must be enrolled: "Unless one believeth, he shall be condemned" (Mark 16, 16). Such is, if we mistake not, the meaning of § 1 of our canon. The term omnes certainly includes all men who have sufficient use of reason to realize what a grievous sin is, when they are capable of merit and demerit, reward and [4] Rom. 10, 10 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

punishment. Omnes, furthermore, includes every individual without regard to ancestral or paternal prejudice and authority. For the ultimate end of man is not bound up with either national or family traditions, nor is paternal or maternal authority stronger than the divine command. Salvation, as we have said, is a strictly individual concern which involves a serious obligation from the time that reason dawns upon the child. From this viewpoint also is to be understood the phrase: "independenter a qualibet civili potestate." For if the duty of acquiring the necessary knowledge of the Gospel and embracing the Church of God is individual, it necessarily follows that the State cannot be allowed to interfere in a matter which transcends its purpose — which lies entirely within the sphere of man's temporal welfare, whereas the object of the Church is spiritual and supernatural, reaching into eternity. Those two ends cannot, per se, clash, for although the two societies are supreme each in its own domain, their ends are different and only touch each other at some points. This could not be otherwise, as the author of both societies is one and the same God, who created both the natural and the supernatural world.[5]

THE MATERIAL OBJECT OF FAITH

CAN. 1323

§ 1. Fide divina et catholica ea omnia credenda sunt quae verbo Dei scripto vel tradito continentur et ab Ecclesia sive sollemni iudicio sive ordinario et universali magisterio tamquam divinitus revelata credenda proponuntur.

5 Cfr. Leo XIII, "Immortale Dei," Nov. 1, 1885; Cavagnis, Institutiones Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici, 1883, p. 6 ff.; Lib. IV, c. 1; Bachofen, Summa Iuris Eccl. Pub., 1910, p. 110 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Sollemne huiusmodi iudicium pronuntiare proprium est tum Oecumenici Concilii tum Romani Pontificis ex cathedra loquentis.

§ 3. Declarata seu definita dogmatice res nulla intelligitur, nisi id manifeste constiterit.

§ 1. All those truths which are contained in the written word of God, or in tradition, and proposed to our belief as divinely revealed either by a solemn proclamation or by the ordinary and universal magisterium of the Church must be believed by Divine and Catholic faith.

§ 2. To pronounce a solemn judgment of this kind appertains either to a general Council or to the Roman Pontiff speaking ex cathedra.

§ 3. Nothing is to be taken as dogmatically declared or defined, unless it is manifestly known to be such.

The material object of faith (objectum materiale fidei), or that which is to be believed, is contained either in Holy Writ, as accepted by the Church, or in tradition, as preserved by the Church. However, as Holy Writ itself, without the acceptance of the Church, would be merely a material or indifferent book — though perhaps sacred on account of its venerable age and contents — so tradition would lack sacred character and obligation but for the infallible judgment of the Church. This infallible judgment is embodied in the teaching office of the Church, and constitutes a special prerogative granted to the Church by Christ, in virtue of which she cannot deceive nor be deceived in matters of faith and morals.[6]

Our text distinguishes a solemn ex cathedra judgment and the ordinary magisterium of the Church. But there is no intrinsic difference between the two, as they derive from the same source, viz., the divine promise and provi-

[6] Mazzella, l. c., n. 782, p. 599.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:22 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dence, and have the same object and purpose. The object is faith and morals; the purpose, to protect the faithful from error.

The ordinary and universal teaching body of the Church consists of the pastors together with their head, the Roman Pontiff, no matter where the former are found, whether scattered over the globe, or sitting united in St. Peter's Dome. This is called the active subject of the infallible magisterium (subiectum activae infallibilitatis). To this teaching body corresponds the believing body of the faithful, which latter, however, being the subiectum passivae infallibilitatis, cannot be separated from the teaching body or be opposed to it. For the teaching office or authority is the cause of the infallibility of the Church, and both bodies are one in the same faith.

There is, however, a distinction, though not quite adequate, between the teaching office of the Sovereign Pontiff alone, and the body of teachers or the teaching Church united to its head, i. e., the Pontiff. Without the latter, or, worse still, in opposition to the latter, there can be no teaching body, whilst the authority of infallible teacher is embodied in the Roman Pontiff alone. Both the Pontiff sole and the body of teachers united with him, enjoy the power of teaching infallibly.

The "universal[7] and ordinary magisterium" consists of the entire episcopate, according to the constitution and order defined by Christ, i. e., all the bishops of the universal Church,— dependently on the Roman Pontiff.[8] Priests and deacons do not, iure divino, belong to the hierarchy of jurisdiction, and therefore, are not, prop-

7 The word "universal" was added in order to distinguish it from the official attribute of infallibility inherent in the Pontiff. See Coll. Lac., t. VII, 176.

8 Cfr. Pius IX, "Tuas libenter," Dec. 21, 1863.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

erly speaking, judges in matters of faith and morals, nor can they be, iure ordinario, bearers of infallible teaching. However, they exercise a certain teaching authority by divine right, inasmuch, namely, as they are helpers and co-workers of the bishops, from whom they receive delegated mission, and preach and testify to the faith preached and expounded by the episcopate. They, too, in a wider sense partake of the assistance of the Holy Ghost.

This teaching authority, then, proposes what must be believed by divine and Catholic faith. It is indeed true that what God has revealed may and must be believed with divine faith,[9] and that what the Church proposes as part of divine Revelation, may and must be believed with divine and Catholic faith, or, shortly, with Catholic faith. But the material object of divine faith comprises more than the object of Catholic faith, and besides there is something in Catholic faith which is not so clearly expressed or conspicuous in divine faith. For the former is offered by the living word of the Church with a precision and determination that leaves no doubt as to the supernatural origin and medium through which it is conveyed. This Catholic faith then commands our assent and obedience to the full extent of a childlike belief, but from the motive of divine veracity and truth.[10]

The term proposed means not merely an official or authentic formulation of a given object or article, but an authoritative promulgation of a law or rule contained in revelation, commanding our full interior and exterior assent.[11]

§ 2 defines, according to Vatican Council,[12] the solemn

9 The Blessed Virgin Mary certainly believed the Angel with divine faith, but of Catholic faith there can be no question.

10 Cfr. Scheeben, Dogmatik, 1873, I, p. 324; Coll. Lac., t. VII, 72 ff., 159 f.

11 Scheeben, l. c., p. 179 f.

12 Conc. Vat., Sess. VII, c. II, De Revelatione; c. III, De Fide; c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:23 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

judgment of the Church in contradistinction to her ordinary and universal magisterium, not as if the office of the Supreme Pontiff were extraordinary, in the strict sense, but because this means of proposing an infallible truth is uncommon. Such a solemn pronunciamento or proclamation may be made either by a general council or by the Pope. That a council cannot be ecumenical without the head, is evident, as explained in our Vol. II, where the other requisites are also discussed.[13]

The Pope alone, after having been duly elected and having accepted the election, is the lawful head of the Church, and, in virtue of his primacy of jurisdiction, is the supreme pastor and teacher of the whole Church, as the Vatican Council has defined.[14] As such he may define, or issue decrees on, points of faith and morals, binding the whole Church. His decisions do not receive their obligatory force from the consent of the Church, as the Gallicans asserted,[15] but embrace the whole extent of the object of the infallibility inherent in the teaching Church. The term ex cathedra means: (a) that the Pope proclaims a dogma as the supreme teacher and pastor of the Church; (b) that it be a matter of faith and morals, not of history or politics disconnected with the former; (c) that he pronounce an authoritative and final sentence with the manifest intention of obliging (d) the entire Church, i. e., all individuals as well as the whole body of the faithful.[16]

However, as § 3 intimates, there may be doubt as to

IV, De Fide et Ratione; De Revelatione, can. 4; De Fide, can. 6; De Fide et Ratione, can. 3; Sess. IV, c. IV, De Romani Pontificis Infallibili Magisterio.

13 See can. 222 ff.; p. 217 f.

14 Sess. IV, De Eccl., c. 4 (Denz., n. 1682).

15 Art. 2, Decl. Cleri Gall. dam. ab Innoc. XI, April 11, 1682; ab Alex. VIII, "Inter multiplices," Aug. 4, 1690 (Denz., 1189).

16 Mazzella, l. c., n. 1051, p. 821.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

what is declared or defined either by the universal teaching Church or by means of papal ex cathedra definitions. Therefore the theologians have laid down certain rules, which we will briefly restate.

a) What has been solemnly defined, either by a general council or by the Supreme Pontiff, is certainly de fide; but not all the historical or theological assertions which accompany a papal decision (for instance, the Bull "Ineffabilis") are de fide.

b) What is clearly and undoubtedly contained in Holy Scripture and Tradition as a matter of faith or morals, must be believed, although individual errors are not entirely excluded;

c) What the universal and approved practice and discipline proposes as connected with faith and morals must also be believed ("Lex orandi, lex credendi").

d) What the Holy Fathers and the theologians hold unanimously as a matter of faith and morals,[17] is also de fide.

There may be some doubt as to the form of infallible decisions. A test for genuine ex cathedra definitions has been found in the following formulas: (1) if those who assert the contrary are declared heretics; (2) if the terms "si quis" is used with "anathema" following; (3) if it is declared that the doctrine in question must be firmly believed by all the faithful as a dogma.[18]

If after the application of these rules a solid doubt remains, the utterance is not infallibly binding, as is evident from our text.

17 Cfr. Simar, Dogmatik, 1893, p. 41 ff., § 11.

18 For instance, Christ is true man; hence he must have a human body and a soul.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DANGERS TO FAITH

CAN. 1324

Satis non est haereticam pravitatem devitare, sed oportet illos quoque errores diligenter fugere, qui ad illam plus minusve accedunt; quare omnes debent etiam constitutiones et decreta servare quibus pravae huiusmodi opiniones a Sancta Sede proscriptae et prohibitae sunt.

It is not enough to eschew heretical depravity, but those errors also must be carefully avoided which more or less closely approach heresy; and for this reason all must observe also those constitutions and decrees by which the Holy See proscribes and forbids such perverse opinions.

This text is very cautiously worded, no doubt in order to avoid theological controversy. The question here evidently turns about certain conclusions, commonly called theological, for there is no doubt that truths either immediately and expressly, or immediately but obscurely contained in Revelation must be believed fide divinâ, and, if properly proposed, also fide catholicâ et divinâ. But there is a controversy as to truths which are not directly and explicitly contained in Revelation, but only virtually (virtualiter) deducted therefrom by logical reasoning. Besides there are natural truths, not revealed in the proper sense, which have such an intimate connection with the revealed truths of faith and morals, that the purity and integrity of faith and morals cannot be safely maintained and defended without them. Concerning these some writers have asserted that they must be believed fide divinâ, whereas others (e. g., De Lugo) maintain that they must be believed fide ecclesiasticâ only.[19] Our Code does not decide this controversy. One thing is certain, viz., that the assent which every Catholic must give to the judgment of the Church when she pronounces on certain errors, must be internal, and that the condemnations issued by the S. Congregations may not be treated as if they had no weight.[20] For even the so-called fides ecclesiastica requires not a mere servile silence, but a real assent, elicited by the will, although the formal reason, the auctoritas Dei loquentis, may not be implied.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PROFESSION OF FAITH

CAN. 1325

§ 1. Fideles Christi fidem aperte profiteri tenentur quoties eorum silentium, tergiversatio aut ratio agendi secumferrent implicitam fidei negationem, contemptum religionis, iniuriam Dei vel scandalum proximi.

§ 2. Post receptum baptismum si quis, nomen retinens christianum, pertinaciter aliquam ex veritatibus fide divina et catholica credendis denegat aut de ea dubitat, haereticus; si a fide christiana totaliter recedit, apostata; si denique subesse renuit Summo Pontifici aut cum membris Ecclesiae ei subiectis communicare recusat, schismaticus est.

§ 3. Caveant catholici ne disputationes vel collationes, publicas praesertim, cum acatholicis habeant, sine venia Sanctae Sedis aut, si casus urgeat, loci Ordinarii.

§ 1. The faithful are obliged to openly profess their 19 De Lugo, De Virtute Fidei, disp. 20, sect. 13, n. 109; Simar, l. c., p. 49 f., p. 640 ff.

20 "Lamentabili," July 4, 1907, propp. VII and VIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Christian faith, as often as silence, evasion, or mode of acting would involve an implicit denial of the faith, contempt of religion, dishonor to God, or scandal to their neighbors.

The Apostle says: "With the heart we believe unto justice; but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation."[21] This and the declaration of Christ: "He that shall be ashamed of me and my words, of him the Son of man shall be ashamed,"[22] clearly indicate a double duty, namely, (1) to profess the Christian religion, and (2) not to deny it. But as a prohibitive or negative law obliges always, whereas an affirmative or a positive law does not oblige at every moment or on every occasion, so in our case the text states the negative side of the obligation, namely not to omit the profession of faith when it is called for. Faith may be concealed by mere silence, which, however, is sometimes permissible, for, as stated, we need not profess the faith all the time. Nay, it may even be necessary to hide it, namely, when great damage, such as persecution or vexation,[23] threatens a whole community. On the other hand it is certain that whenever the public and lawful authority demands a profession of one's faith, it is never permitted to refuse it.[24] Besides, in no case is it allowed to conceal the faith entirely and to be a hidden Christian, even though there were danger of life or loss of temporal goods.[25] Such as wish to remain occult Christians always cannot be admitted to baptism.[26]

Faith may also be concealed by subterfuge, and various devices have been adopted for this purpose, some of them

21 Rom. 10, 10.
22 Luke 9, 26; Matth. 10, 32.
23 Lehmkuhl, I, n. 291.
24 S. C. P. F., Feb. 7, 1791 (Coll., n. 604).
25 S. C. P. F., Nov. 24, 1628 (n. 44).
26 S. C. P. F., May 28, 1635 (n. 84).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

despicable. Thus the custom of Christians assuming pagan or Mohammedan names was branded as deceitful and hypocritical and strictly forbidden by papal constitution.[27] While there is little or nothing in a name as such, if it becomes a shibboleth of heresy or apostasy and is so regarded by the magistrate and populace, it is no longer as sounding brass, even if the bearer interiorly desires to retain the faith. Therefore circumstances must be considered.

A curious kind of subterfuge was devised by certain Christians who wished to graduate or take the doctor's degree in China, a ceremony accompanied by religious rites, such as the offering of flowers, meat, or incense to an idol, etc. This is never permitted. It is also forbidden to bribe the magistrate or to "play sick" on the day of the ceremony, because this would amount to a lie.[28] A somewhat similar artifice was employed in good faith by some missionaries. The mandarins, in order not to lose their office, made an investigation as to the conduct of these missionaries and, in a report to the "Celestial Son," assured him that the missionaries were not priests, had not preached the faith and left no following. This report, together with the sentence of exile (instead of capital punishment), had to be signed by the missionaries themselves, so that they, as it were, condemned themselves in order to be treated more leniently. The S. Congregation decided that the missionaries were not allowed to sign the sentence thus worded. On the other hand, however, they were not bound to protest publicly against the magistrates, if these published the sentence without the signature of the missionaries.[29]

27 Bened. XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744, § 3–6; "Quod provinciale," Aug. 1, 1754; S. O., Nov. 29, 1729 (Coll. P. F., n. 373).

28 S. C. P. F., Jan. 4, 1798 (n. 644).

29 S. C. P. F., Dec. 9, 1822 (n. 776).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

For in that case the malice of the act was imputable entirely to the mandarins.

It may be added that no denial of the faith is involved in the act of hiding one's special or peculiar state (for instance, the priesthood) nor would such an act per se amount to a mortal sin.[30]

Lastly, one's conduct, or ratio agendi, may imply a denial of the faith. To this class belong certain acts which are indifferent in themselves, but become wrong by the end for which they are performed, or by their object or accompanying circumstances.[31] Thus eating meat is in itself an indifferent act, but may become sinful through either or all of three concomitant adjuncts. Thus to eat or prepare meat in odium fidei, in contempt of religion, is a grievous sin because the end is sacrilegious, and may amount to a denial of the faith, if the meat is taken as a signum protestativum of apostasy. If the act is performed merely for economy's sake, without any religious motive, no denial is involved. Christians in the Orient were permitted to build, or help build, a Mohammedan mosque because compelled to do so by the Turks; at least the S. Congregation decided that they were not to be disquieted.[32] A different answer was given by the Holy Office in reply to the question whether Christians were allowed to build, or coöperate in building, a pagan temple because they feared for their life or were in danger of being exiled. This was declared forbidden.[33] There is an 30 Lehmkuhl, I, n. 292, according to De Lugo, Suarez, etc.

31 S. O., April 19, 1635; May 27, 1671, n. 1; June 20, 1866, n. 38 (Coll. P. F., nn. 83, 195, 1293); S. C. P. F., June 26, 1820 (n. 747). The end is also perceptible in the following case: Christians may contribute to public funds or public demonstrations, if these may be interpreted as signs of public joy, even though idolatrous customs may be connected with them, but the intention of contributing to idolatry is never permissible. S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1645, n. 114.

32 S. C. P. F., Sept. 26, 1840, n. 14 (Coll., n. 914).

33 S. O., Jan. 8, 1851, ad 1 (Coll., n. 1055).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

essential difference between a mosque and a pagan temple, because the latter involves idol worship, whereas the former does not. Besides, the cases are somewhat different in this that the latter implies voluntary coöperation, whereas the former contains an element of violence.

That circumstances, too, may change the nature of an act is evident from the example of certain Christians who were made to trample on the cross. To walk over or to step on an object, is in itself a merely material and indifferent act, but intentionally to trample on the cross, if seen and perceived, is sacrilegious. The case was as follows: The pagans placed crosses across the road and in narrow gates, where Christians had to pass. The decision was: (a) if the Christians were not warned, they should walk as if nothing had happened; but (b) if they were warned, they should take care not to step on the crosses; (c) if they were warned, but could not pass by without stepping on them, they should protest to the bystanders and pass over them as reverently as they could.[34]

Idol worship in whatever form, for instance, in the shape of tablets dedicated to the "seat of such and such a soul," is incompatible with the Christian faith. Therefore such tablets must be destroyed, if they are in the exclusive possession of Christians, or, if pagan families have a share in them, may be restored to these.[35] A convert from the Anglican Church may not hide his faith so as to retain a Protestant minister in his home and assist at the prayer meetings, even though the convert recites the Catholic prayers; nor is he allowed to leave his children in the care of heretical tutors.[36]

Concerning schismatic priests the following decisions may be noted: Assistance at schismatic services is not 34 S. O., Inst., 1863 (Coll. P. F., n. 1235).

35 S. O., Aug. 20, 1778 (n. 530).

36 S. O., July 29, 1699 (n. 246).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

allowed. An Armenian priest of the Catholic faith is not allowed to pour water secretly into the chalice in the sacristy.[37] Catholic Nestorian priests are not allowed to hear the confessions of their schismatic coreligionists, even though by their refusal they risk losing their support; nor are they permitted to recite the names of Dioscurus or Nestorius at Mass, even though they merely intend to honor the patron saints of these two heresiarchs.[38]

As to clothes, the answer is always the same: if they are distinctive and notorious signs or proofs of infidelity, heresy or apostasy, a Catholic is never allowed to wear them.[39]

For the rest, the rules on material and formal cooperation should be consulted.

§ 2 defines three classes of Catholics who have suffered "shipwreck of the faith."[40] The first class is that of heretics who, having been baptized, retain the name of Christians, but obstinately deny or doubt some of the truths that must be believed by divine or Catholic faith. The second class is that of apostates, who have given up the Christian faith entirely and fallen away from it. The third class is that of schismatics, who refuse to obey the Sovereign Pontiff or to live in union with those who submit to him.

Heresy, therefore, supposes the valid reception of Baptism, which is the means of Christian initiation. But there is a difference in the attitude of different heretics. Some have been validly baptized and raised in a sect the truthfulness of which they have never doubted.

37 S. O., Aug. 7, 1704 (n. 267). They do it to hide their faith, because the Monophyites abhor a mixture of wine with water.

38 S. O., Aug. 28, 1669 (Coll., n. 185).

39 Cfr. Lehmkuhl, l. c., n. 294.

40 I Tim. 1, 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Such are called material heretics, who may, nay should remain where they are, as long as no doubt arises in their mind concerning the truth of their sect. Others have doubts, but make no effort to disperse them, and are not ready to accept the truth, even though convinced of it. Such are formal heretics. To this we may also reckon those so-called Catholics who interiorly reject or doubt any revealed truth, provided the rejection as well as the doubt be obstinate (pertinax), because this characteristic constitutes malice. Obstinacy may be assumed when a revealed truth has been proposed with sufficient clearness and force to convince a reasonable man. Of course, the character of each individual must be taken into consideration.

Apostasy differs from heresy only as to the extent of the material object of faith denied; the specific malice, viz., the denial of God's truthfulness, or of the divine authority, is the same in both.[41] An apostate, therefore, is one who rejects the whole deposit of faith and becomes an unbeliever, whilst a heretic is one who wilfully rejects or doubts only the one or other truth revealed and proposed by the Catholic Church.

Pure schism involves mere stubbornness or disobedience to the Roman Pontiff, or to a bishop, as the case may be; but in reality it hardly ever occurs without heresy. The Puseyites endeavored to convince the Apostolic See of the contrary; but the Holy Office very properly decided that separation from the See of Peter meant a split in the unity and apostolicity of the Church and setting up another Church in place of the one founded by Christ.[42]

§ 3 warns Catholics against disputations and conferences with non-Catholics. To hold such a disputation

41 Cf. Lehmkuhl, l. c., I, n. 299.

42 S. O., Sept. 16, 1864 (Coll. P. F., n. 1262).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or conference, especially in public, requires the special permission of the Holy See, or, in urgent cases, of the local Ordinary. This has been the attitude of Apostolic See ever since the beginning of the seventeenth century, though public disputations and conferences — including the so-called congresses or parliaments of religion — are not absolutely forbidden, but may be tolerated, under the condition mentioned, when there is hope of a greater good.[43] The S. Congregation has often expressly forbidden them on the ground that they do more harm than good, since false eloquence may cause error seemingly to triumph over truth.[44] Religious superiors are urged to forbid such public disputations and conferences to their missionaries.[45] This rule in our opinion also affects public disputations with Socialists, because their tenets often contain heresies.[46]

When such disputations are expressly permitted, care should be taken that only capable and prudent speakers be employed to defend the Catholic side.[47]

BISHOPS AS JUDGES IN MATTERS OF FAITH

CAN. 1326

Episcopi quoque, licet singuli vel etiam in Conciliis particularibus congregati infallibilitate docendi non polleant, fidelium tamen suis curis commissorum, sub auctoritate Romani Pontificis, veri doctores seu magistri sunt.

What is said in this canon has been partly explained under can. 1323, where it was said that the bishops,

43 S. C. P. F., Feb. 7, 1645 (n. 112).
44 S. C. P. F., Feb. 7, 1625 (n. 8).
45 S. C. P. F., Dec. 18, 1862 (n. 148).
46 S. C. pro Neg. Eccl. Extr., Jan. 27, 1902; n. VIII (Anal. Eccl., X, 74).
47 S. C. P. F., Dec. 18, 1662 (n. 148).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dependently upon the Roman Pontiff, are true teachers of the flock confided to them. But neither singly nor in councils do they share the infallibility which is their prerogative when acting as the ordinary teaching body of the Church under the leadership of the Sovereign Pontiff, or when united under the same at a general council. One case in particular illustrates the second clause of our text, viz., that the bishops must be regarded as true teachers of their flocks, as long as they obey the ordinances and laws issued by the Roman Pontiff. It is the question of interest taking which has repeatedly agitated the minds of confessors and bishops.[48] To take interest on money loaned seemed to be prohibited, especially since Pius VIII ("Vix pervenit") had forbidden the practice to a certain extent. But his words seemed ambiguous and did not cover various cases. Therefore it was left to the bishops to decide in individual cases, whether it was allowed to accept and retain interest, provided they followed the principles laid down in the papal constitution; and the confessors had to abide by their decisions. This may be applied to disciplinary cases in general and also to rubrics. But in case of doubt recourse may be had to the S. Congregations.[49]

48 Cfr. S. O., Aug. 18, 1830, Aug. 31, 1831; Jan. 17, 1838 (Denz., nn. 1470 ff.).

49 S. O. May 9, 1821, ad 2 (Coll. P. F., n. 759, Kentucky).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XX

PREACHING THE WORD OF GOD

CAN. 1327

§ 1. Munus fidei catholicae praedicandae commissum praecipue est Romano Pontifici pro universa Ecclesia, Episcopis pro suis dioecesibus.

§ 2. Episcopi tenentur officio praedicandi per se ipsi Evangelium, nisi legitimo prohibeantur impedimento; et insuper, praeter parochos, debent alios quoque viros idoneos in auxilium assumere ad huiusmodi praedicationis munus salubriter exsequendum.

Preaching the word of God is a necessary means of spreading as well as preserving the deposit of the faith.[1] This office emanates from the power of jurisdiction, of which the magisterium ecclesiasticum is a part. The Sovereign Pontiff is the supreme teacher of the faithful and consequently has the duty, above all others, of preaching the Catholic faith to the whole Church. This, of course, means that there is no Catholic church on the whole earth in which he is not allowed to preach without interference from any, either ecclesiastical or civil, authority. But it also implies that his pastoral letters and other instructions need no approbation or permission from the civil government. St. Peter asked neither Nero (54–68) nor the Jewish synagogue for permission to 1 Bened. XV, "Humani generis," June 15, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 305 ff.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

address the faithful of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, nor do we read of any such permission being asked for by Clement I. Up to the eleventh century there is barely a trace of what later on came to be called placetum regium. On the contrary, Pope Paschal II (1099–1118) complained against Henry I of England that letters sent by the Apostolic See were subjected to the placet of his royal majesty.[2] The quarrel between Philip IV, the Fair, and Boniface VIII is too well known to need repetition. Other regalistically tainted governments followed the perverse example of Henry and Philip up to even the "enlightened" nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Government supervision was, and in some countries[3] is still, applied to the pastoral letters of bishops. That such a course of action is against the divine law needs no proof. Obedience is due to God rather than to men.[4] Nor is there any seditious inference contained in this assertion. For a law is a law in the proper sense only if it conforms to the eternal or natural law, which requires conformity with the Divine Mind, the source of every right and incapable of self-contradiction. Hence no human authority, no matter on what pretext, can lawfully command what runs counter to a divine command. A human law, therefore, forbidding the free and unhampered preaching of the divine law cannot be acknowledged as binding the conscience.[5] This is also evident from the nature and constitution of the Church as a perfect, legal, and necessary society, independent in the choice of the means conducive

2 Cf. Friedberg, Grenzen zwischen Staat und Kirche, 1872, p. 729; Bachofen, Summa Iuris Eccl. Publici, 1910, p. 57.

3 Thus in the Canton of St. Gall, Switzerland, the pastoral and even the Lenten letters are still subject to the approval of the cantonal government!!

4 Act. 5, 29.

5 Cfr. Leo XIII, "Sapientiae," Jan. 10, 1890.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to its spiritual and supernatural end. Finally, if the Vicar of Christ on earth is bound to teach the faithful, it is his inherent right to do so, and in the exercise of this right no human power may hinder him. This right is inalienable because inherent in the primacy of jurisdiction that spans the universal Church.

The bishops, in virtue of their jurisdiction, are obliged to preach the Catholic faith each within his own district or diocese. This duty, as § 2 states, they must perform personally, unless they are lawfully prevented. For as they are, as a rule, chosen for their personal qualities (de industria personae), they are in conscience bound to break the spiritual bread for their flocks.

Some of the lawful reasons which may prevent an Ordinary from fulfilling this duty, are mentioned in a papal decretal.[6] They are: manifold pastoral or episcopal occupations, such as the diocesan visitation, attendance at councils or synods, bodily infirmity, hostile invasions, etc. The decretal adds within brackets: "ne dicamus defectum scientiae, quod in eis reprobandum est omnino, nec de caetero tolerandum."

If a bishop is legitimately prevented from preaching, he should entrust this duty to another,[7] as Bishop Valerian did when, on account of defective speech, he commissioned St. Augustine to preach in his place.

Our text continues that bishops should also employ, not only pastors, but also others who are fit or capable (men not women) as co-workers in preaching the word of God. The pastor's duty is evident, and it is also clear that the bishop is responsible for the pastors under his jurisdiction. The S. Congregation once recommended to an archbishop (of Antivari) to explain the catechism

[6] C. 15, X, I, 31.

[7] Reg. Iuris 68, 72 in 6°.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

on Sundays and holydays if the pastor failed to do so.[8] The reason is that the bishop is par excellence the pastor of the diocese, and the divinely constituted judge in matters of faith and morals, as successor of the Apostles.[9] If the bishop is pre-occupied by other pastoral work, the pastor of the cathedral church is obliged to preach for him.[10]

The text says that the bishop should choose idoneos viros, fit or capable men, to assist him in preaching. This means clergymen who possess the qualities necessary for sacred preachers and ministers of God, to wit, a sufficient familiarity with sacred science and the moral virtues that impress the people. Besides, natural gifts are necessary, lest they appear to tempt God.[11] Preachers who possess these qualifications will preach with salutary effect (salubriter praedicabunt) because they will not preach for the sake of showing off their eloquence or of gaining applause.[12]

It goes without saying that the bishop may call upon any member of his diocesan clergy (secular or non-exempt religious) to fulfill this duty.

Concerning exempt religious see can. 608, § 1.

MISSIO CANONICA

CAN. 1328

Nemini ministerium praedicationis licet exercere, nisi a legitimo Superiore missionem receperit, facultate peculiariter data, vel officio collato, cui ex sacris canonibus praedicandi munus inhaereat.

8 S. C. P. F., Nov. 28, 1785 (Coll., n. 581).

9 Bened. XV, "Humani generis," June 15, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 307); Trid., Sess. 5, c. 2, de ref.

10 S. C. C., Sept. 14, 1748 (Richter, Trid., p. 22, n. 5).

11 Bened. XV., "Humani generis" (A. Ap. S., IX, 309).

12 Ibid., (l. c., p. 308).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

No one is allowed to preach the word of God unless he has received the missio canonica from his legitimate superior. This is a requirement of the divine [13] as well as of human law, for the latter clearly supposes that preaching is an attribute of jurisdiction which must be obtained from the lawful authority.

The missio canonica may be given either by means of a special faculty, or by virtue of an office to which the right of preaching is attached by ecclesiastical law.

As to the special faculties required, consult Ch. II of this Title. Here we will only state that the offices to which the right and duty of preaching are attached by law, are those of the Sovereign Pontiff, bishops, and pastors. Thus a cathedral prior or collegiate provost, to whom the care of souls is entrusted, is obliged to preach.[14]

13 Rom. 10, 15; "Humani generis" (A. Ap. S., IX, 307).

14 S. C. C., July 30, 1591; May 26, 1639 (Richter, Trid., p. 22, nn. 3 f. et pluries).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE PASTOR'S DUTY

CATECHETICAL INSTRUCTION

CAN. 1329

Proprium ac gravissimum officium, pastorum praesertim animarum, est catecheticam populi christiani institutionem curare.

It is the proper and a most weighty duty, especially of pastors of souls, to provide for the catechetical instruction of the people.

The term "catechetical instruction," as is well known,[1] means oral instruction in the elements of religion, especially as a preparation for initiation into the Church. It is now usually, though not exclusively, conducted by means of questions and answers. We need not dwell upon the importance of this instruction, as Pius X has brought its necessity home to all concerned in his encyclical letter "Acerbo nimis," of April 15, 1905.

CAN. 1330

Debet parochus:

1.° Statis temporibus, continenti per plures dies institutione, pueros ad sacramenta poenitentiae et confirmationis rite suscipienda singulis annis praeparare;

2.° Peculiari omnino studio, praesertim, si nihil ob-

1 Cath. Encycl., Vol. V, 75 ff., s. v., "Doctrine, Christian."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google sit, Quadragesimae tempore, pueros sic instituere ut sancte Sancta primum de altari libent.

CAN. 1331

Praeter puerorum institutionem de qua in can. 1330, parochus non omittat pueros, qui primam communionem recenter receperint, uberius ac perfectius catechismo excolere.

CAN. 1332

Diebus dominicis aliisque festis de praecepto, ea hora quae suo iudicio magis apta sit ad populi frequentiam, debet insuper parochus catechismum fidelibus adultis, sermone ad eorum captum accommodato, explicare.

The pastor is obliged:

1.° To prepare the children for receiving the Sacraments of Penance and Confirmation each year by a continuous course of instructions held at stated times;

2.° To instruct the children with special care, if nothing prevents him, especially, during Lent, in order that they may worthily receive First Holy Communion.

Besides the instruction of children mentioned in the preceding canon, the pastor shall not neglect to instruct the boys and girls who have already received their First Communion more fully in Christian doctrine.

On Sundays and other holydays of obligation he shall, at an hour convenient for the people, teach catechism also to his adult parishioners, in a manner adapted to their capacity.

We notice some mitigation in the wording of our text, as compared with the injunctions of Pius X. For instance, no mention is made in can. 1330, n. 2 of instructions to be given every day in Lent; in can. 1332 the "full" hour is omitted as well as the addition that no Sunday shall be excepted, etc. These are wise moderations for a Code binding the universal Church. But even the rulings of the Code need some modification in missionary countries, including our U. S., as we know from experience. Take, for example, a pastor who has to attend two missions, twelve or more miles apart. He has perhaps to start a fire in both churches, then to hear confessions, sing high Mass at least in one church, and preach in both, perhaps in different languages. Then he ought to teach catechism for another hour before making his train — and all this with an empty stomach. These are not fanciful, but real conditions, which cannot be compared to those existing around Treviso, Mantua, or Venice. Hence it must be left to the diocesan Ordinaries to determine how far the prescriptions of the code can be carried out. Meanwhile every pastor ought to impress upon his mind what Pius X says concerning catechetical instruction: — that it is the milk which St. Peter wished the faithful to yearn for in all simplicity like new-born babes; that the labor of the pulpiteer presupposes that of the catechist; that ornate and flowery sermons often tickle the ears, but utterly fail to touch the heart,[2] etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The best opportunity for effective catechetical instruction is offered by the schools, which, we are happy to say, flourish in our country as nowhere else. Where such a school exists, the pastor can easily find convenient hours for extensive catechetical work.

2 "Acerbo nimis"; see Amer. Eccl. Rev., 1905, Vol. XXXII, p. 606.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CATECHISTS

CAN. 1333

§ 1. Parochus in religiosa puerorum institutione potest, imo, si legitime sit impeditus, debet operam adhibere clericorum, in paroeciae territorio degentium, aut etiam, si necesse sit, piorum laicorum, potissimum illorum qui in pium sodalitium doctrinae christianae aliudve simile in paroecia erectum adscripti sint.

§ 2. Presbyteri aliique clerici, nullo legitimo impedimento detenti, proprio parocho in hoc sanctissimo opere adiutores sunto, etiam sub poenis ab Ordinario infligendis.

§ 1. If the pastor is lawfully prevented, he may, nay should employ the help of clerics living in his district, for the religious instruction of the children. He may also, if need be, call upon pious laymen, especially such as belong to the Sodality of Christian Doctrine or a similar organization represented in the parish.

This is an expedient for overburdened pastors and missionaries who can visit their parishes only at intervals. It might be good practice for seminarians of the last year to spend a few hours in the school room, not as hearers, but as teachers, provided the professor of pastoral theology or homiletics has taught some method.

The Confraternity of Christian Doctrine was founded in 1560 in Rome and approved by Pius V, in 1571. Of late it has spread all over Italy and other countries.

Laymen, in the text, includes members of the female sex, provided, of course, they enjoy the necessary qualifications of knowledge, virtue, and strength. School-teachers may be supposed to be peculiarly adapted to this task.

Male and female catechists are frequently employed in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

missionary countries. They should be chosen by the missionaries with care and only such should be called to this important office as are at least twenty-five years of age and possess the necessary moral and mental qualities.[3]

§ 2. Priests and other clerics, who are not lawfully prevented, must assist their pastor in this most holy work, and may be punished by the Ordinary if they fail to do so.

It has been the general practice, also of the Roman Court,[4] not to oblige any cleric to work not prescribed in the law or the foundation document. This rule was upheld in principle by Benedict XIV, though the great Pontiff strongly insisted on the necessity of proper instruction in Christian doctrine.[5] He found a means of compelling all priests and clerics, even those not charged with the care of souls, to assist in that holy work. The bishop should not promote clerics who are remiss in this duty to higher orders or better positions if they refuse to obey his commands. This is the punishment adverted to in our canon. It is a powerful weapon in the hands of the bishop, who may lawfully wield it under the law, though no censure can be inflicted for refusal, because neither the old nor the new law mentions such a penalty sub poenis or censuris infligendis.

OBLIGATION OF RELIGIOUS

CAN. 1334

Si, Ordinarii loci iudicio, religiosorum auxilium ad catecheticam populi institutionem sit necessarium, Superiores, etiam exempti, ab eodem Ordinario requisiti,

3 S. C. P. F., Feb. 29, 1836 (n. 846).

4 S. C. C., July 15, 1882, ad 10 (A. S. S., XV, 324 f.).

5 "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tenentur per se vel per suos subditos religiosos, sine tamen regularis disciplinae detrimento, illam populo tradere, praesertim in propriis ecclesiis.

If the local Ordinary is convinced that the help of religious is required for the catechetical instruction of the people, he may call upon the religious superiors, including those of exempt orders, and they are obliged to comply with his orders, either personally or through their subjects, especially in their own churches, provided the regular discipline does not suffer. Religious, therefore, should give catechetical instructions, especially in their own churches. We may repeat here what Benedict XIV said concerning regulars, to wit, that they should not interfere by their celebrations with instruction in Christian doctrine, nor by their solemnities,[6] draw the people away from their parish churches while instructions are given.

Although no penalty is attached to this law, it imposes a moral obligation, the extent of which must be gauged by the need of the people, as well as the scarcity and physical inability of the secular clergy.

We wish to draw attention to the clause: "sine tamen regularis disciplinae detrimento," which also occurs in can. 608, § 1. This means, first and above all, that if the Rule or Constitution approved by the Holy See excludes such work, the religious are not bound by this canon, and therefore the bishop has no right to call on them. It means, secondly, that, if the Constitutions permit such work, the discipline must be safeguarded. Thus at least the ordinary choir service, the school work, either in the seminary, college or school, must not suffer any serious detriment. And, lastly, regular discipline also means community life. Consequently, if by frequent calls the religious should sustain a serious setback in their religious or common life, the religious superior would be entitled to modify the bishop's command. It may also be permitted to state that if the bishop and clergy wish to be aided by the religious of the diocese, they are reasonably expected to aid and support the diocesan institutions conducted by such religious. This is not only a dictate of natural law, but is also insinuated by can. 608, § 2.

[6] "Etsi minime," § 15.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DUTIES OF PARENTS

CAN. 1335

Non solum parentes aliique qui parentum locum tenent, sed heri quoque ac patrini obligatione adstringuntur curandi ut omnes sibi subiecti vel commendati catechetica institutione erudiantur.

Not only parents, but also those who take the parents' place, as well as masters and sponsors, are obliged to see to it that their subjects and protegés receive catechetical instruction.

This obligation rests on the natural as well as on a positive law, which latter is here briefly formulated according to Benedict XIV, who urged bishops and pastors to remind all those above mentioned of their grave obligation to instruct their subjects in the catechism.[7] The natural obligation arises from the fact that the ultimate end of all men is God, who must be known in order to be served and loved. It also follows from the superiority of the soul to the body. Hence at least as much care should be bestowed upon acquiring the knowledge of salvation, as upon the acquisition of natural science.[8]

7 "Cum religiosi," June 26, 1754, § 4.

8 Cfr. Leo XIII, "Humanum genus," April 20, 1884.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DIOCESAN REGULATIONS

CAN. 1336

Ordinarii loci est omnia in sua dioecesi edicere quae ad populum in christiana doctrina instituendum spectent; et etiam religiosi exempti, quoties non exemptos docent, eadem servare tenentur.

This canon corroborates what was said above about the authority of the local Ordinary to regulate instruction in Christian doctrine. He is entitled to issue decrees with reference to the instruction of the people in Christian doctrine, and these regulations must be obeyed also by exempt religious, whenever they impart religious instructions to anyone not possessed of the privilege of exemption. It follows that all those persons mentioned in can. 514, § 1, to wit, servants, pupils, guests, and the sick, must, as far as their condition permits, attend the catechetical instructions given by the pastor or his assistants. For these persons are not properly exempt.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:26 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

SERMONS

FACULTY REQUIRED FOR PREACHING

CAN. 1337

Tum clericis e clero saeculari, tum religiosis non exemptis facultatem concionandi pro suo territorio solus concedit loci Ordinarius.

The secular clergy as well as non-exempt religious receive the faculty of preaching only from the local Ordinary for his respective diocese.

According to a medieval decretal, some clerics usurped the office of preaching under the cloak of piety without being authorized either by the Apostolic See or a bishop.[1] There is in this decretal a hint that members of the rising religious orders were at times carried too far by their zeal. It is therefore not surprising that the same papal constitutions [2] which regulated the matter of hearing confessions, also settled the question of preaching. The law was challenged by Wiclif and his followers, who maintained that any deacon or priest may preach the word of God without authority from the Apostolic See or from a Catholic bishop.[3] Therefore the Council of Trent again insisted upon previous examination for all who assume the office of preaching.[4]

1 C. 13, § 6, X, V, 7, de haereticis.

2 Greg. XV, "Inscrutabili," Feb. 5, 1622, § 3, 6; Clement X, "Superna," June 4, 1670, § 1, 3.

3 Prop. 14 dam. (cf. Denzinger, n. 490).

4 Sess. 5, c. 2, De Ref.; S. C. EE. and RR., July 31, 1894 (Coll. P. F., n. 1878).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Note the word: solus loci Ordinarius. The Ordinary alone is competent to grant the faculty of preaching. Hence no municipality or university may grant it, although they may select the preacher, for instance for Lent, as happened in certain Italian communes.[5] It also means that the faculty given by the bishop is sufficient, and consequently no pastor or rector can lawfully reject one so approved.[6]

RELIGIOUS PREACHERS

CAN. 1338

§ 1. Si concio habenda sit tantum ad religiosos exemptos aliosve de quibus in can. 514, § 1, facultatem concionandi in religione clericali dat eorum Superior secundum constitutiones; qui in casu potest eam concedere etiam iis qui de clero saeculari vel de alia religione sunt, dummodo a proprio Ordinario vel Superiore fuerint idonei iudicati.

§ 2. Si concio habenda sit ad alios, vel etiam ad moniales regularibus subiectas, facultatem religiosis quoque exemptis impertit Ordinarius loci in quo concio fiet; concionator autem, verba facturus monialibus exemptis, licentia Superioris regularis praeterea indiget.

§ 3. Facultatem vero concionandi apud sodales religionis laicalis, quamvis exemptae, dat loci Ordinarius; sed concionator nequit facultate uti sine Superioris religiosi assensu.

Formerly[7] a distinction was drawn between churches

5 S. C. C., April 21, Aug. 11, 1742; Aug. 3, 1743 (Richter, Trid., p. 22, nn. 7 f.).

6 S. C. C., June 27, 1744 (ibid., n. 15).

7 Trid., Sess. 5, c. 2, De Ref.; Greg. XV, "Inscrutabili"; Clement X, "Superna."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that belonged to regulars and such as did not belong to them, or to another religious order. Our text distinguishes between the persons preached, or the hearers.

§ 1 rules that religious of a clerical order obtain the faculty of preaching from their own superiors, according to their constitutions, in case they preach to exempt religious of their own order or to such who are mentioned in can. 514, § 1. For these the respective superior may also grant the faculty to the secular clergy, or to members of another religious institute, provided, however, that the secular cleric has been previously approved or found fit by his Ordinary and the religious by his superior.

This law has been widened, as is apparent from a comparison with former regulations on the same subject. For what was formerly considered a privilege of the regulars in the strict sense, is here applied to all religious clerical institutes, whether exempt or not, and the distinctive character is attached to the hearers only, who must be exempt or share exemption de facto, as is the case with the persons mentioned in can. 514, § 1, i. e., servants, guests, students, and sick persons, besides the professed members and novices. However, like the Tridentine Council and various papal decrees,[8] our text requires fitness in the preacher, as defined in can. 1340.

The text mentions only religiosos exemptos aliosve, in the masculine gender, thereby evidently excluding the female sex, as is patent also from the following section.

§ 2. If the sermon is to be delivered before others, including nuns subject to regular prelates, the faculty of preaching must be granted by the Ordinary in whose diocese the sermon is to be delivered; and the preacher who addresses exempt nuns must also have the permission of the regular superior to whom they are subject.[9] Preaching to nuns (moniales with solemn vows) is done at the grate, so that the preacher is not obliged or permitted to enter the enclosure, which is here understood to be the papal one.

[8] Sess. 5, c. 2; Sess. 24, c. 4, De Ref., and the constitutions quoted.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The others (alios) are all non-exempt religious, as well as laymen and clerics who do not share the exemption mentioned in can. 514, § 1.

§ 3. To preach for members of a religious lay institute, for instance, the Christian Brothers, even though they may enjoy exemption, a priest must obtain faculties from the local Ordinary, in whose diocese the religious house is located. However, he cannot make use of his faculty unless the religious superior of the institute gives his consent. This ruling is partly taken from the Constitution of Leo XIII, "Conditae," A. D. 1900, but has an added clause requiring the consent of the religious superior. The superior and his religious are here understood of institutes of men, not of women, § 2 having sufficiently provided for the latter. Moreover, it would not be proper for religious women to refuse to accept a preacher appointed by the bishop. The consent of the religious superior is required for reasons of discipline and to maintain his authority.[10]

RELIGIOUS VS. ORDINARIES

CAN. 1339

§ 1. Ordinarii locorum religiosis qui a proprio Superiore exhibeantur, facultatem concionandi, sine gravi causa, ne denegent, concessamque ne revocent, prae-

9 Clement X, "Superna," § 3.

10 Preachers were sometimes imposed on such institutes, who lacked even a knowledge of the essentials of the religious life, not to mention other defects.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sertim una simul universis domus religiosae sacerdotibus, firmo tamen praescripto can. 1340.

§ 2. Concionatoribus religiosis, ut facultate recepta uti liceat, opus est praeterea sui Superioris licentia.

§ 1 closely resembles can. 880, which concerns the faculty of hearing confessions. It commands the local Ordinaries not to refuse the faculty of preaching to such religious as are presented by their superiors, nor to withdraw it from them without weighty reasons. They should refrain especially from refusing or withdrawing the faculty from all religious of one house at the same time, provided, of course, at least the one or the other was found fit.

Religious formerly had reasons to complain against some Ordinaries, who either had not read the decrees of the Tridentine Council [11] or interpreted them arbitrarily and withdrew the faculty of preaching without any reason. The S. Congregations sustained the complaints and ordered the nuncio (in Spain) to stop such arbitrary proceedings, which prejudiced the Friars. There must be for such action, says the decree in question, a lawful cause proved by documents (in actis [12]). Mere caprice or dislike cannot be styled a lawful reason, and a legitima causa is one which concerns preaching.[13] However, if a moral defect or want of knowledge render a particular preacher undesirable, and his incapacity can be proved, the bishop may withdraw or refuse the faculty. But it is hardly imaginable that such defects could be imputed to a whole community.

§ 2. Religious, in order to make lawful use of the faculty granted by the Ordinary, must in addition obtain 11 Sess. 5, c. 2; Sess. 24, c. 4, De Ref.; Clement X, "Superna," § 3.

12 S. C. EE. et RR., Jan. 13, 1610 (Bizzarri, 243).

13 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 14,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

permission from their respective superiors. This is required in virtue of the vow of obedience. Those who take the vow of stability, like the Benedictines, have still another reason for asking permission, namely, because the office of preaching may call them away from their habitual residence.

It may not be amiss to draw attention to former regulations which are now out of date. Formerly the religious, before they were allowed to preach in churches not belonging to their own institute, had to obtain a written permission from the bishop, and also to ask his blessing. This was particularly required for the famous Lenten preachers employed by municipalities.[14] These formalities are no longer required, nor need the faculty of the bishop or the permission of the religious superior be given in writing, though the bishop would not exceed his power if he were to demand a written statement of the religious superior as to the ability and moral standing of the religious who wishes to preach in his diocese.

Examination

Can. 1340

§ 1. Graviter onerata eorum conscientia, loci Ordinarius vel Superior religiosus facultatem vel licentiam concionandi cuiquam ne concedant, nisi prius constet de eius bonis moribus et de sufficienti doctrina per examen ad normam can. 877, § 1.

§ 2. Si, concessa facultate vel licentia, compererint necessarias dotes in concionatore desiderari, debent eam revocare; in dubio de doctrina, debent certis argu-

1674; S. C. C., Feb. 28, 1654 (Bizz., l. c., p. 273).

14 Clement X, "Superna," § 1, S. C. C., apud Richter, Trid., p. 22, nn. 7 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mentis dubitationem executere, novo etiam examine, si opus fuerit.

§ 3. Ob revocatam concionandi facultatem vel licentiam, datur recursus, sed non in suspensivo.

§ 1. Local Ordinaries as well as religious superiors are seriously charged to grant the faculty or permission to preach only to such as have passed an examination with regard to their moral standing and sufficiency of knowledge, according to the rule laid down in can. 877, § 1.

This section of our canon must therefore be compared to can. 877, § 1, which prescribes an examination, but excepts those whose theological knowledge is otherwise known and tried.

The examination is held to establish the moral standing of the preacher and his knowledge. It was prescribed by the Council of Trent [15] and elaborated in an Instruction of the S. Congregation of Bishops and Regulars [16] of 1894.

As to moral standing, it is evident that lack of a good name would hardly recommend a preacher to the people. Hence, neither the bishop nor the religious superior are allowed to give faculties to one who has been rejected or disvowed by another bishop.[17] This rule, of course, applies especially to such clerics or religious as are tainted with Modernism.[18] But mere rumor and defamation should be carefully sifted from true and proved statements.

With regard to knowledge, sacred eloquence requires not only piety but also familiarity with the sacred armory

15 Sess. 5, c. 2; sess. 24, c. 4, de ref.

16 July 31, 1894 (Coll. P. F., n. 1878).

17 S. C. Consist., Sept. 25, 1910, ad X, XI (A. Ap. S., II, 741).

18 Pius X, "Sacrorum Antistitum," Sept. 1, 1910 (ib., II, 653 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of Holy Writ, with dogmatic and moral theology and with ecclesiastical history, as well as a delivery worthy of the subjects treated. St. Thomas says: "In order that a preacher may really be the light of the world, he must possess three things; firmness or stability, in order that he may not deviate from the path of truth; clearness, in order that he may not teach with confusion and obscurity; the right intention, in order that he may seek not his own, but God's honor and glory."[19] Therefore he must avoid vainglory and the motive of material gain.[20] As to these points, therefore, the candidate should be examined when passing through the seminary, or when he presents himself for the faculty to preach. If however, as can. 877, § 1 states, his moral standing and knowledge are sufficiently known to either the bishop or the religious superior, the examination may be waived.

§ 2. If a preacher shows that he lacks the necessary requisites after the faculty or permission to preach has been granted to him, the Ordinary and the superior must withdraw it. If a doubt arises as to his knowledge, they should endeavor to disperse it by gathering the necessary information or proofs, and may also subject him to a new examination. The prudent enforcement of this law requires vigilance, so much recommended with regard to the sacred office of preaching by our Holy Father, who warns the bishops against human respect in this regard and requires a strict examination as to the two requisites.[21]

19 Comment. in Matth., V; S. C. EE. et RR., l. c., n. 5.

20 Bened. XV, "Humani generis," June 15, 1917 (A. Ap. S., X, 309 ff.).

21 Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXTRADIOCESAN PREACHERS

CAN. 1341

§ 1. Sacerdotes extradioecesani sive saeculares sive religiosi ad concionandum ne invitentur, nisi prius licentia ab Ordinario loci in quo concio habenda sit, obtenta fuerit; hic autem, nisi eorum idoneitatem aliunde compertam habeat, licentiam ne concedat, nisi prius bonum testimonium super concionatoris doctrina, pietate, moribus a proprio eiusdem Ordinario habuerit; qui, graviter onerata conscientia, secundum veritatem respondere tenetur.

§ 2. Licentiam tempestive petere debet parochus, si agatur de paroeciali ecclesia aliave eidem subiecta; rector ecclesiae, si de ecclesia parochi auctoritati non obnoxia; prima dignitas, de Capituli consensu, si de ecclesia capitulari; moderator seu cappellanus confraternitatis, si de ecclesia eiusdem confraternitatis propria.

§ 3. Si ecclesia paroecialis sit simul capitularis aut confraternitatis propria, ille licentiam petat, qui sacras functiones iure peragit.

The general rule is, as stated in can. 1337, that the Ordinary in whose diocese a priest wishes to preach, grants the faculty. This rule also binds exempt religious who wish to preach to persons not belonging to their own institute.

Now § 1 supposes that priests from another diocese are invited to preach. Whether these be seculars or religious, exempt or non-exempt, does not matter, provided only that the hearers are not exempt religious. Such priests need the faculty of the Ordinary in whose diocese

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

they are invited to preach. If, e.g., a Jesuit from St. Louis University wishes to preach in the cathedral of St. Joseph, or in the Abbey Church of Conception, to the parishioners, he requires a faculty from the Bishop of St. Joseph, which the latter should not grant unless he has satisfied himself as to the preacher's knowledge, piety, and moral standing by means of a statement from the latter's Ordinary. Therefore, in the case mentioned, the Archbishop of St. Louis has to furnish the Bishop of St. Joseph with a testimonial as to the qualifications of said preacher, and he is bound in conscience to state the truth. This shows how serious the sacred office of preacher is regarded by the Church.

Yet, in order to avoid red tape, and also, we suppose, mistrust, the Code adds the wise clause: "nisi eorum idoneitatem aliunde compertam habeat." If the Ordinary who has to give the faculty knows the preacher, and is convinced that he possesses the necessary qualities, he may dispense with the formality of demanding testimonials from the other Ordinary. Of course, the bishop who has to impart the faculty may, though he is not bound to, abide by the statement of the pastor who has invited the strange priest. The superiors general are specially cautioned against sending out their subjects to preach, unless they are certain that these subjects are duly qualified, and against permitting their religious to preach without the knowledge of the bishop.[22] This warning applies also to secular priests, who should not invite an outsider to preach without informing the bishop.

§ 2. Pastors must, therefore, ask for the permission in good time, if the preaching is to be done in their own church, or in one subject to them, as may be the case

22 S. C. EE. et RR., July 31, 1894, n. 7 (l. c.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:27 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

when a pastor governs two parishes, or one with several missions. The same obligation is encumbent on rectors with regard to churches not subject to the pastor, and on the first dignitary (provost or dean), who has to ask the consent of the chapter before applying to the bishop for a faculty; also on chaplains or directors of confraternities if the preaching is to be done in their own church.

§ 3. If the parish church is at the same time a chapter or confraternity church the obligation of asking for permission for a strange priest to preach devolves on the one who has the right to perform the sacred functions.

In a parish church which at the same time serves as a cathedral or collegiate chapter church the sacred functions by right belong to the pastor,[23] who must ask the consent of the chapter before he "invites a preacher," as required by § 2. It is the pastor, therefore, and not the first dignitary, who must ask for permission. Does this rule apply also to monastic chapters? The text simply says: ecclesia capitularis, a chapter church, which term may be applied to an abbey church, which serves at the same time as parish church, as is insinuated in can. 609, § 1.

With regard to confraternities, the general decree of the S. Congregation of Rites may be consulted. It states that confraternities lawfully erected in parish churches depend on the pastor for the exercise of all, even non-parochial, functions.[24] From this it follows that the pastor must demand permission for the preacher.

The term tempestive (in good time) has been officially declared[25] to mean two months before the preaching

23 Can. 415, §2.

24 S. Rit. C., Jan. 12, 1704, ad 1 (n. 2123).

25 S. C. C., April 30, 1729 (Richter, Trid., p. 22, n. 9).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google commences. However, as communication is swifter nowadays, the time must be left to the prudent judgment of the petitioner, provided the matter is not delayed purposely so that the bishop cannot obtain the necessary information.

WHO MAY PREACH

CAN. 1342

§ 1. Concionandi facultas solis sacerdotibus vel diaconis fiat, non vero ceteris clericis, nisi rationabili de causa, iudicio Ordinarii et in casibus singularibus.

§ 2. Concionari in ecclesia vetantur laici omnes, etsi religiosi.

Only priests and deacons should be given the faculty of preaching, and no other clerics should be allowed to preach, except in particular cases and for a cause which the Ordinary deems reasonable.

Laymen, even though they may be religious, are forbidden to preach in church.

It is well known that some Oriental lay monks played a rather conspicuous part in the religious controversies of the fifth century. We need not wonder, therefore, that they were forbidden to preach, because this office demands a canonical mission.[26] There is a remarkable decretal of Innocent III, which shows the ingenuity of some abbesses who, besides hearing confession, also delivered public homilies.[27] This appeared as a novelty to the pope, who stopped the practice. Laymen, too, at times went so far as to hold secret conventicles and to despise the word of God when preached by priests.[28] Wiclif and Huss were not the first to demand permission to preach to men and women alike.[29] This prohibitive

26 See c. 19, C. 16, q. 1 (Leo I).
27 C. 10, X, III, 38.
28 C. 12, 14, X, V, 7.
29 Art. 37 (Denz., 581).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google law is based on the requisite of jurisdiction, of which the faculty of preaching is a part.

CAN. 1343

§ 1. Ordinarii locorum ius habent concionandi in qualibet sui territorii ecclesia, quamvis exempta.

§ 2. Nisi agatur de magnis civitatibus, potest quoque Episcopus prohibere ne in aliis eiusdem loci ecclesiis verba fiant ad fideles, quo tempore vel concionem ipse habet vel coram se, ex causa publica atque extraordinaria, convocatis fidelibus, habendam curat.

§ 1 vindicates to the local Ordinaries the right of preaching in every church of their diocese, including the churches of exempt religious.

§ 2 recalls the ancient quarrel between bishops and regulars. The latter maintained that no bishop could forbid them to preach in their own churches and places where the bishop could not himself preach, but engage a preacher to deliver a sermon in his presence. The S. Congregation decided [30] substantially as our text reads, namely, that with the exception of large cities, to which the law does not apply, the bishop may forbid sermons to be delivered to the faithful in other churches of a place in which he or another by his command is preaching at the same time. However, this prohibition binds only when the preaching is done for a special and public cause and the faithful have been properly invited to attend. Such a "special event," as it is called in one decision, would be a Catholic congress or solemn gathering to which the clergy and the faithful have been invited. Large cities are excepted. The size of a city

30 S. C. C., April 26, 1607; March 10, 1646 (Richter, Trid., p. 23, n. 17); Bened. XIV, De Synod. Dioec., IX, 17, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

must here be gauged, not by the total number of its inhabitants, but by the number of Catholics and Catholic congregations it contains. New York, Chicago, and St. Louis are undoubtedly large cities in the sense of this canon.

THE PASTOR'S DUTY TO PREACH

CAN. 1344

§ 1. Diebus dominicis ceterisque per annum festis de praecepto proprium cuiusque parochi officium est, consueta homilia, praesertim intra Missam in qua maior soleat esse populi frequentia, verbum Dei populo nuntiare.

§ 2. Parochus huic obligationi nequit per alium habitualiter satisfacere, nisi ob iustam causam ab Ordinario probatam.

§ 3. Potest Ordinarius permittere ut sollemnioribus quibusdam festis aut etiam, ex iusta causa, aliquibus diebus dominicis concio omittatur.

Pastors are in duty bound to preach the word of God in the customary manner on all Sundays and holy days of obligation, especially during the Mass that is most largely attended.

This obligation is personal and cannot be habitually committed to another, except for reasons recognized as sufficient by the Ordinary.

The Ordinary may allow the sermon to be omitted on solemn feast-days, and, for good reasons, also on the one or other Sunday.

That preaching is a personal duty of the pastor is evident from the fact that he is generally appointed for his personal qualities, and as pastor is bound by divine law to break bread to the hungry and to feed his flock

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

with spiritual food.[31] Therefore the custom of not preaching must be styled unreasonable, and has been so styled by the Roman Pontiffs.[32] Nor can the pastor be dispensed from this sacred obligation during Lent or Advent, when other preachers take the pulpit, or other churches in the same city have such preachers.[33]

On the other hand every obligation, no matter how personal, has its equity, which mitigates the rigor of the law. Hence § 2 sets certain bounds to this otherwise strict duty of preaching. The law merely wishes to prevent habitual shirking of the obligation, even though the motive be natural shyness, timidity, or lack of confidence. If the bishop sanctions the reason for which the pastor shifts the burden to others, the habit or custom may become lawful. Where there is a natural impediment, for instance, throat trouble, failing memory, or other obstacles, the Ordinary may certainly permit a pastor to let others preach for him habitually. Where it is customary for pastors and curates or assistants to take turns at preaching, and the custom has been ratified by the bishop, no breach of the law occurs.

The last section gives the Ordinary the power of dispensing[34] pastors from the duty of preaching on the more solemn feasts of the year, and even on the one or other Sunday. If the bishop pontificates in a parish church, e. g., he may tell the pastor not to preach. A just reason would be the necessity of hearing many confessions, or the reading of a lengthy financial statement of the parish. The text does not require an express per-

31 Trid., Sess. 5, c. 2; Sess. 22, c. 8, De Sac. Missae; Sess. 23, c. 1; Sess. 24, c. 4, De Ref.

32 Innoc. XIII, "Apostolici ministerii," May 23, 1723; Bened. XIII, "In supremo," Sept. 23, 1724; cfr. Bened. XIV, Instit., X, n. 3.

33 S. C. C., Aug. 30, 1817 et pluries (A. S. S., IX 465 ff.).

34 This is the term used by S. C. C., April 1, 1876 (A. S. S., IX, p. 468).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google mission, nor that it be given separately for each occasion, and consequently the bishop may do so in the synod, or through a circular letter, or by a general statement, either written or oral; provided always that no abuses creep in and no contrary custom develops.

INSTRUCTION IN CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE IN OTHER THAN PARISH CHURCHES

CAN. 1345

Optandum ut in Missis quae, fidelibus adstantibus, diebus festis de praecepto in omnibus ecclesiis vel oratoriis publicis celebrantur, brevis Evangelii aut alicuius partis doctrinae christianae explanatio fiat; quod si loci Ordinarius id praeceperit, opportunis datis instructionibus, hac lege tenentur non solum sacerdotes e clero saeculari, sed religiosi, exempti quoque, in suis ipsorum ecclesiis.

What our text prescribes in a mildly optative form was laid own by Benedict XIV, not as a general rule, but as a guiding principle for Ordinaries.[35] The Church desires that in all churches and public oratories, even though they are not parish churches, the Gospel or some part of Christian Doctrine should be expounded during the Masses that are attended by the faithful on holy days of obligation. Our text continues: If the Ordinary issues instructions to that effect, all priests, secular as well as religious, including those who are exempt, are bound to obey this law in their respective churches.

The Roman Pontiff will side with Ordinaries even against exempt religious.[36]

35 "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 15.

36 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

LENTEN AND ADVENT SERMONS

CAN. 1346

§ 1. Curent locorum Ordinarii ut tempore quadragesimae, itemque, si id expedire visum fuerit, tempore Adventus, in ecclesiis cathedralibus et paroecialibus sacrae conciones frequentius ad fideles habeantur.

§ 2. Canonici aliique de Capitulo huic concioni, si in propria ecclesia continuo post chorum habeatur, interesse tenentur, nisi iusto impedimento detineantur; et illos Ordinarius, poenis quoque adhibitis, ad id adigere potest.

§ 1. The Ordinaries should see to it that during Lent, and if expedient also during Advent, sermons are delivered more frequently in cathedral and parish churches.

Pius X ordained that the young who are preparing for first Communion, should be given daily instructions during Lent.[37] Our text speaks of " sermons to the faithful," but leaves the details (arrangement, frequency, etc.) to the judgment of the Ordinaries.

§ 2. Canons and other members of a Chapter are obliged to attend these sermons, if held immediately after choir service, unless they are lawfully prevented; and the Ordinary may compel them to attend under penalties.

All the canons, except of course the Canonicus theologus and the Pœnitentiarius, and those employed in other offices with the permission and sanction of the bishop, must be present; also the prebendaries and beneficiaries (mansionarii). They must wear the choir dress (habitus choralis) and occupy their seats, as usual. This obligation binds even in case the sermon is held in another

[37] "Acerbo nimis," April 25, 1905, n. III,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

church which (for instance, on account of repairs) temporarily serves as cathedral or collegiate church. The collegiate canons, too, are included.[38]

The penalties depend on the judgment of the Ordinary and may consist of fines.[39]

SUBJECTS OF SERMONS

CAN. 1347

§ 1. In sacris concionibus exponenda in primis sunt quae fideles credere et facere ad salutem oportet.

§ 2. Divini verbi praecones abstineant profanis aut abstrusis argumentis communem audientium captum excedentibus; et evangelicum ministerium non in persuasibilibus humanae sapientiae verbis, non in profano inanis et ambitiosae eloquentiae apparatu et lenocinio, sed in ostensione spiritus et virtutis exerceant, non semetipsos, sed Christum crucifixum praedicantes.

§ 3. Si, quod absit, concionator errores aut scandala disseminet, servetur praescriptum can. 2317; si haereses, in eum praeterea, ad normam iuris, agatur.

§ 1. Sermons should be devoted above all to what is necessary for the faithful to believe and do for salvation.

§ 2. Therefore the preachers shall abstain from profane and abstruse arguments which exceed the capacity of their hearers, and perform their evangelical ministry (as the Apostle warns [40]) not in persuasive words of human wisdom, or for the display of vain and ambitious eloquence, but in showing of the Spirit and power; preaching not themselves, but Christ crucified.

38 S. Rit. C., March 22, 1653; Oct. 1, 1661; March 31, 1703; Dec. 10, 1718, ad 4 (nn. 944, 1217, 2108, 2258).

39 Ibid., nn. 1217, 2258.

40 I Cor. II, 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

They should not play the rôle of philanthropists, limiting their arguments to this life and disregarding the next. They may speak of the beauty and the blessings arising from religion, but should also mention man's duties to God, the eternal judge.[41]

§ 3. If (what God may avert!) a preacher should disseminate errors and scandals, he should be deprived of the faculty of preaching and removed from the teaching office, and may also be subjected to such penalties as the Ordinary may deem necessary to repair the scandal.[42] Should he preach heresies, the Ordinary must proceed against him according to the law. The first step in the latter case would be to forbid him to preach, followed by a canonical summons, or, where the Holy Office still exercises its jurisdiction, denunciation to the same. But the Council of Trent warns bishops to be careful lest innocent priests be injured by calumny.[43]

DUTY OF THE PEOPLE

CAN. 1348

Monendi et adhortandi diligenter fideles sunt ut sacris concionibus frequenter intersint.

The faithful should be diligently admonished and exhorted to hear sermons frequently. They may also be told that, even when they have no opportunity to hear Mass on Sundays and holy days of obligation, the duty of keeping holy these days by hearing the word of God does not cease. But the exhortation or admonition must not be so worded as if it were an ecclesiastical precept obliging under sin to attend sermons.[44]

41 S. C. EE. et RR., July 31, 1894, n. 6 (Coll. P. F., n. 1878).
42 Can. 2317.
43 Sess. 5, c. 2, De Ref.
44 S. C. P. F., Jan. 4, 1798 (Coll., n. 642).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:28 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

MISSIONS

CAN. 1349

§ 1. Ordinarii advigilent ut, saltem decimo quoque anno, sacram, quam vocant, missionem, ad gregem sibi commissum habendam parochi curent.

§ 2. Parochus, etiam religiosus, in his missionibus instituendis mandatis Ordinarii loci stare debet.

§ 1. Ordinaries shall see to it that the pastors arrange a holy mission — as it is called — for their flocks at least every ten years.

§ 2. Pastors, including religious, must abide by the regulations of the local Ordinaries in this matter.

Thus, if the local Ordinary orders a mission to be held in a parish church which is in charge of exempt religious and governed by them, they have no right to hinder it or vex the missionary sent by the bishop.[1]

MISSIONS TO NON-CATHOLICS

CAN. 1350

§ 1. Ordinarii locorum et parochi acatholicos, in suis dioecesibus et paroeciis degentes, commendatos sibi in Domino habeant.

§ 2. In aliis territoriis universa missionum cura apud acatholicos Sedi Apostolicae unice reservatur.

1 S. C. EE. et R.R., July 23, 1694 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 281).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 1. The non-Catholics living in a diocese or parish are recommended to the benevolent attention of the bishop and the pastors, who should ponder effective means and ways of bringing them back to the one true fold of Christ. This may be accomplished by spreading apologetic tracts,[2] etc. Of course, the social and intellectual conditions of the non-Catholic population must be duly taken into account. Prayers for their conversion should be offered.[3]

§ 2. In all other territories the care of non-Catholics is reserved exclusively to the Holy See. Therefore all foreign missions, the superiors general of missionary societies and their subjects, are under the special supervision of the S. C. de Propaganda Fide, without the consent of which no new mission may be founded or missionary work started. This law binds all religious, exempt and non-exempt, of whatever denomination, under threat of ecclesiastical penalties.[4]

CAN. 1351

Ad amplexandam fidem catholicam nemo invitus cogatur.

No one should be compelled to embrace the Catholic faith against his will.

This golden rule of the great bishop of Hippo[5] was followed in the treatment of the Donatists until they caused troubles which led the civil rulers to interfere. If it has been lost sight of in course of time, this was 2 S. C. P. F., Sept. 8, 1869 (Coll., n. 1346). The Faith of Our Fathers, by Cardinal Gibbons; Fr. Conway's Question Box, the pamphlets of the Catholic Truth Societies, "The Antidote," and similar literature may be recommended for this purpose.

3 S. C. P. F., Instructio of 1879 (ibid., n. 1507).

4 S. C. P. F., Dec. 5, 1640; Jan. 11, 1656 (Coll., nn. 101, 125).

5 Cfr. cc. 3, 5, Dist. 45.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

due to the mixture of ecclesiastical with political affairs. But it remains as true as it was in St. Augustine's day that faith is a free gift of God, though, of course, men may be instrumental in procuring it. The early Christians were allowed to buy and retain pagan slaves who voluntarily fled to them in order to be more leniently treated; they could use exhortations and persuasive words, but were not allowed to exercise any compulsion.[6]

[6] S. O., Sept. 12, 1776 (Col. P. F., n. 515).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXI

SEMINARIES

From the second century onward, i. e., as soon as the Church was free to spread, schools were instituted which, though called catechetical, offered more than a catechetical training to such as wished to enter the clerical state or to hold some other responsible position. The schools of Alexandria and Antioch resembled theological academies where philosophy was not neglected, though it would be hazardous to identify them with seminaries.[1] More closely resembling our modern seminaries were the cloistral and cathedral schools of the Middle Ages, where clerics and laymen, especially of the nobility, received their education. These nurseries of learning and piety, fashioned after the domestic school of St. Augustine, may be called forerunners of the modern colleges and seminaries established upon the initiative of the Council of Trent.[2] The twenty-third session of that council, held in July, 1563, contains a long chapter on this important subject, in which the colleges for the training of clerics are for the first time called seminaries. The council ordained that youths of at least twelve years, especially from among the poorer classes should be received into these schools for the necessary scientific, moral, and practical training qualifying them for the priesthood. A peculiar feature was that the pupils should receive the tonsure when they entered the seminary. The

1 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., XIII, 694 ff., s. v. "Seminary."

2 Sess. 23, c. 18, De Ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google council prescribed two school boards, to be chosen by the bishop, one for the spiritual, the other for the temporal administration. Such a seminary was to be established in every diocese large enough to maintain one. The smaller dioceses were allowed to combine. Thus the terms diocesan, interdiocesan, provincial, and pontifical seminaries were introduced.

A seminary may be broadly defined as a school destined either remotely or proximately for the preparation of candidates for the sacred ministry, especially the priesthood.[3]

A diocesan seminary is one under the control of the local Ordinary, an interdiocesan is one under the control, generally in solidum, of all the bishops who send their students there, although interdiocesan may only mean that the control is entrusted to the local Ordinary, whilst other bishops are merely entitled to send their candidates; a provincial seminary is one under all the bishops of an ecclesiastical province with the metropolitan as head; a pontifical seminary is one under the immediate control and supervision of the Holy See, who generally exercises this right by means of the papal delegate.

RIGHT OF THE CHURCH TO EDUCATE THE CLERGY

CAN. 1352

Ecclesiae est ius proprium et exclusivum eos instituendi qui ecclesiasticis ministeriis sese devovere cupiunt.

[3] A promiscuous college with business, scientific, and classical courses, even though erected by the bishop and conducted by the diocesan clergy, cannot be styled a seminary, as is apparent from the Council of Trent as well as from our Code. One consequence is that the seminaristicum cannot be collected for such colleges, but at most a subsidium caritatis, if no other college of the same nature exists in the diocese.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It might seem superfluous to make a law saying that "the Church enjoys the native and exclusive right to train those who wish to devote themselves to the sacred ministry." Yet the legislator, taught by experience, has thought it well to emphasize this right. He calls it a ius proprium, or inherent right. This is evident from the office of the Church as the divinely constituted teacher of faith and morals. This office demands that those who shall be the bearers of light be imbued with those mental and moral qualities which render the exercise of the teaching office effective and conformable to the principles of faith and virtue. It is a native right of the Church to select those who are in a more particular manner the elect of the Lord, from among the multitude of men and place them in the shadow of the sanctuary, where they are protected against dangerous maxims and practices. In doing this the Church does not violate the rights of the State or of any individual. The State has no right to dictate any one's vocation. If God, who is the author of civil authority, calls one to the priesthood or religious state, no human power can hold him back. Individuals are free to choose the clerical state because in doing so they obey their Maker. There is now no longer any danger, as there was in the fifth and sixth centuries, that a wholesale flight from public office and municipal obligations would endanger the existence of an empire. Those were abnormal times suffering from a corrupt system of administration and taxation.

The text says further that the right of training clerics belongs exclusively to the Church. The Gallican, Febronian, and Josephinist schools claimed the right of prescribing the programme of studies for the clergy of the State.[4]

4 Syllabus Pii IX, n. 46 (Denzinger, l. c., n. 1594); Pius IX, "Nunquam fore," Dec., 1856.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This claim is based on a false notion of ecclesiastical authority. If the Church, as an autonomous and independent society, is entitled to attain her purpose by the choice of appropriate means, she certainly has the right to train those who are to be the living and successive bearers of her divine mission,— the sacred ministers. From this it naturally follows that the right of choosing the means best adapted for the training of the clergy belongs to the Church exclusively. Her sphere of interests differs essentially from that of the State, though there is no contradiction between the two. The State may monopolize salt and tobacco, but for it to monopolize education, and clerical education in particular, would be usurpation.[5] There is no danger that the clerical training might prove detrimental to the State. For the very fact that loyalty and morality are the principal objects of that training guarantees the foundations of civil society.

THE DUTY OF PASTORS WITH REGARD TO CLERICAL VOCATIONS

CAN. 1353

Dent operam sacerdotes, praesertim parochi, ut pueros, qui indicia praebeant ecclesiasticae vocationis, peculiaribus curis, a saeculi contagiis arceant, ad pietatem informent, primis litterarum studiis imbuant divinaeque in eis vocationis germen foveant.

Priests, and especially pastors, should interest themselves in such boys as show signs of an ecclesiastical vocation, keep them away, as much as possible, from worldly contagion, instruct them in piety and the elements of sci-

[5] Leo XIII, "Iampridem," Jan. 6, 1886; "Officio sanctissimo," Dec. 22, 1887 (to Prussia and Bavaria after the "Kulturkampf").

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ence, and foster in them the germ of their vocation. For it is evident that by such means an ordinary or general vocation may develop into a special or extraordinary one. Suitable surroundings and a favorable atmosphere develop the seeds of a supernatural calling.[6]

DIOCESAN SEMINARIES

CAN. 1354

§ 1. Unaquaeque dioecesis in loco convenienti ab Episcopo electo Seminarium seu collegium habeat in quo, pro modo facultatum et dioecesis amplitudine, certus adolescentium numerus ad statum clericalem instituatur.

§ 2. Curandum ut in maioribus praesertim dioecesibus bina constituantur Seminaria: minus, scilicet, pro pueris litterarum scientia imbuendis, maius pro alumnis philosophiae ac theologiae vacantibus.

§ 3. Si constitui Seminarium dioecesanum nequeat, aut in constituto Seminario conveniens institutio, praesertim in philosophicis ac theologicis disciplinis, desideretur, Episcopus alumnos in alienum Seminarium mittat, nisi Seminarium interdioecesanum vel regionale, auctoritate apostolica, constitutum fuerit.

§ 1. Every diocese should have a seminary or college in a convenient place selected by the bishop. There, according to the revenues and size of the diocese, a certain number of young men should be trained for the clerical state.

§ 2. In the larger dioceses there should be established two seminaries: one as a college or petit seminaire, the other for the students of philosophy and theology.

[6] Cavagnis, Institutiones Iuris Publ. Eccl., 1883, l. IV, n. 76; Vol. III, p. 45.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. If a diocesan seminary cannot be erected, or the philosophical and theological courses cannot be properly given in one already existing, the bishop shall send his students to another seminary, unless there is an interdiocesan or provincial seminary erected by authority of the Apostolic See.

§ 1 prescribes that a preparatory college or petit seminaire be established in every diocese. But it wisely sets a limit to this obligation, making it dependent upon the revenues and size of the diocese. Where there is a college conducted by religious, the bishop may make use of it for his students.

§ 2 prescribes two seminaries, a college and a clerical seminary, for the larger dioceses. The size of a diocese is not determined by its area, but by the number of the faithful, for in extent some apostolic vicariates are large enough to comprise many Italian dioceses or even archdioceses, yet they were told to establish central or provincial seminaries.[7] The revenues, also, are a determining factor, as the same Instruction intimates. Besides it is evident that an efficient staff of teachers and an adequate number of students cannot be expected in a small diocese, not to speak of the expenses necessary for the building and maintenance of the required edifices and the cost of administration.

The two seminaries should, if possible, be separated and conducted as different establishments. This is desired mainly by reason of the different discipline required for younger and for more advanced students.[8]

§ 3 permits bishops to send their students to another seminary, i. e., one existing in a different diocese, but only in case there is no interdiocesan or provincial seminary

7 S. C. P. F., Oct. 18, 1883 (Coll., n. 1606).

8 S. C. Consist., July 16, 1912, n. 1 (A. S. S., IV, 492 f.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

erected by the Holy See. The latter may intervene either directly or indirectly in the establishment of an interdiocesan or provincial seminary. Directly by a formal decree issued by the S. Congregation of Seminaries and Universities,[9] declaring an institution to be an interdiocesan or provincial seminary; indirectly by the S. C. Conc. approving the acts of a provincial synod erecting or approving such an institution. The latter mode of approval is intended in certain Instructions of the S. Congregation of the Propaganda.[10] There may be a doubt whether the "auctoritas apostolica" is expressly required for both provincial and interdiocesan seminaries,— in other words whether our text intends to draw a real distinction between an interdiocesan and a provincial seminary. Though there is a distinction between the two, this distinction has no practical value in our case, as can. 1357, § 4 simply rules that the government and administration of "an interdiocesan or provincial seminary" are to be conducted according to the rules laid down by the Holy See. This undoubtedly means that interdiocesan and provincial seminaries must have their statutes, and thereby also their existence, approved by the S. Cong. of Seminaries and Universities.

Where such an interdiocesan or provincial seminary exists, therefore, a bishop who has no seminary of his own, in which philosophy and theology are taught, must send his students to that provincial seminary, but only for the strictly clerical, not for the classical, studies.

9 Cfr. can. 256.
10 Oct. 18, 1883, IV; Aug. 28, 1893 (Coll., nn. 1606, 1848).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE SEMINARISTICUM

CAN. 1355

Pro constitutione Seminarii et alumnorum sustentatione, si proprii reditus deficiant, Episcopus potest:

1.° Parochos aliosve ecclesiarum etiam exemptarum rectores iubere ut statis temporibus in ecclesia ad hunc finem stipem exquirant;

2.° Tributum seu taxam in sua dioecesi imperare;

3.° Si haec non sufficiant, attribuere Seminario aliqua beneficia simplicia.

If there are no endowments for the support of a seminary and its students, the bishop may

1.° Command the pastors and other rectors of churches, even though they be exempt religious, to take up collections for that purpose at stated times;

2.° Impose a seminary tax in the diocese;

3.° If these resources do not prove sufficient, he may attach some simple benefices to the seminary.

The first means is modern. It imposes the obligation of taking up a collection, even in churches which are not parish churches, and in such as belong to exempt religious.

As to the incorporation of benefices, it should be observed that only simple benefices are intended, i. e., such as require no permanent residence in the place of benefice,[11] and the duties of which may be performed by a substitute or vicar. Thus a simplex canonicatus or a chaplaincy may be united with a seminary; but a parochial benefice may not, without apostolic indult.

Incorporation is either pleno iure or semipleno iure, either as to the spiritual and temporal, or as to the tem-

11 Cfr. can. 1411.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:29 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

poral benefits only; the latter element is especially intended here, since incorporation is permited for the purpose of support. But the union cannot be made without the advice of the seminary board; that of the chapter or consultors is not sufficient.[12]

An incorporation of benefices made before the seminary is in existence, is invalid.[13]

Simple benefices of any kind may be united with a seminary, even if the appointment to these falls within so-called papal months, i. e., those in which the right of appointment belongs to the Holy See. But in this case the incorporation must be made before the vacancy occurs.[14]

CAN. 1356

§ 1. Tributo pro Seminario obnoxia sunt, quavis appelatione remota, reprobata qualibet contraria consuetudine et abrogato quolibet contrario privilegio, mensa episcopalis, omnia beneficia etiam regularia aut iurispatronatus, paroeciae aut quasi-paroeciae, quamvis alios reditus, praeter fidelium oblationes, non habeant, domus hospitalis auctoritate ecclesiastica erecta, sodalitates canonice erectae et fabricae ecclesiarum, si suos reditus habeant, quaelibet religiosa domus, etsi exempta, nisi solis eleemosynis vivat aut in ea collegium discentium vel docentium ad commune Ecclesiae bonum promovendum actu habeatur.

§ 2. Hoc tributum debet esse generale eiusdemque proportionis pro omnibus, maius vel minus secundum Seminarii necessitatem, sed quinas quotannis centesi-

12 S. C. C., Feb. 14, 1594; March 3, 1594 (Richter, Trid., p. 212, n. 87); Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., IX, 7.

13 S. C. C., June 8, 1595; March 3, 1597 (Richter, Trid., l. c., n. 10 f.).

14 S. C. C., Aug. 1586; Aug. 31, 1600 (Richter, l. c., n. 13).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mas partes (5%) reditus vectigalis non excedens, minuendum prout reditus Seminarii augentur.

§ 3. Reditus tributo obnoxius is est qui, deductis oneribus et necessariis expensis, supersit in anno; nec in eo reditu computari debent distributiones quotidianae, vel, si omnes beneficii fructus distributionibus constent, tertia earundem pars; nec fidelium oblationes, nec, si omnes paroeciae reditus coalescant fidelium oblationibus, tertia earundem pars.

Can. 1356 more precisely determines those persons, either physical or corporate, who are obliged to pay the seminary tax (taxa seminaristica).

It starts with three clauses, the first of which is "quavis appellatione remota. The principal effect of this clause is that no appeal is admitted in devolutivo, though a recourse or restitutio in integrum is not prohibited. Another effect of this clause is that, even if the seminary tax would be only a side issue in another cause, it would affect the entire cause, at least as long as the secondary one remained unsettled.

The second clause is: "reprobata qualibet contraria consuetudine." This clause abrogates any custom which already exists, or has existed, i. e., whether present or past. As to this there is no controversy, but the question has been raised whether this clause intends to annul future customs.[15] This seems to us to be settled by can. 27, § 1, which says that every custom explicitly reprobated in the Code is unreasonable. Therefore even a future custom is made impossible with regard to the seminary tax, because it would lack the consent of the legislator.

The last clause reads: "abrogato quolibet contrario

15 Cfr. Barbosa, Tractus Varii, Clausulae, nn. IX, 87 (ed Lugd., 1660, p. 260 f., 450 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

privilegio." Each and every privilege, therefore, whether obtained directly or indirectly (by way of communication), must be considered as abolished and void of effect because contraries cannot be comprised under the same subject.[16] Hence if exempt religious have obtained a privilege of not paying the seminaristicum, this privilege is now void.

The following are obliged to contribute to the seminary:

1.° The mensa episcopalis, which comprises the whole income or salary of the bishop and is administered by him.[17] Hither belong the cathedraticum and that part of the pew-rent of the cathedral church that is reserved for salary. In countries where there are endowments these too are included, with due regard, however, to § 3.

2.° All benefices, including those of regulars and such as are of lay or ecclesiastical advowson.[18]

3.° All parishes and quasi-parishes, even though they have no other income than the offerings of the faithful. Parishes not yet organized as such are probably exempt from paying the seminaristicum because rights and duties are correlative terms.

4.° Hospitals erected by ecclesiastical authority and provided with funds of their own, for instance, by endowment. Hospitals founded and governed by the civil authority or by private persons (Sisters, etc.), cannot be taxed. The term ecclesiastical authority comprises the Ordinary, the superior major of exempt religious, and the Holy See. Hospitals which subsist on the generosity of voluntary contributors or alms, are not taxable.[19]

16 Barbosa, l. c., p. 38, n. 4.

17 Idem, De Officio et Potestate Episc., P. III, alleg. 95, n. 67.

18 S. C. C., Dec. 17, 1836, ad II (Richter, Trid., p. 213, n. 27).

19 S. C. C., July, 1588 (Richter, Trid., p. 213, n. 22); "loca pia non e bonis ecclesiasticis facta non tenere."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5.° Canonically erected confraternities and ecclesiastical fabricae, provided they have their own income. The term fabrica comprises the administrators of a church building, or the counselors. Thus, for instance, the Reverenda Fabrica S. Petri, means the whole administration of St. Peter's Basilica. The underlying idea is that such a building is (by fictio iuris) an artificial person, or, rather, an ecclesiastical institution. This also applies to confraternities which possess corporate property of their own, either movable or immovable, such as the guilds or confraternities in some parts of Europe. In this country, as far as we are aware, this law does not apply to confraternities or sodalities, because the monthly fees of the members do not constitute reditus or income in the proper sense.

6.° Every religious house, even though exempt. This includes every religious community, whether formata or not, whether belonging to men or to women. Exceptions to this rule are: (a) the houses of mendicant orders and others who live from alms,[20] but not the parishes which are entrusted to the care of mendicants; (b) all religious who actually maintain a college of pupils or professors which promotes the common welfare of the church. The latter clause appears ambiguous, but its meaning can be determined from certain official decisions. Thus it has been declared that a monastery which supports a college for monks and professors, or maintains a seminary of its own, is not bound to pay the seminary tax.[21] This was the case in former times at the universities of 20 Among these are the orlers of St. Dominic, St. Francis (all three branches), the Hermits of St. Augustine, the Carmelites, the Servites, the Minimi, the Society of Jesus; Barbosa, De Off. et Potest. Episc., P. III, alleg. 77, nn. 14 f. (Vol. II, p. 315).

21 S. C. C., Sept. 9, 1594 (Richter, l. c., p. 213, n. 18).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Paris and Bologna, where the relgious orders maintained their own colleges.

A doubt may perhaps arise as to colleges conducted by religious in their own name, which are not seminaries in the technical sense. However, our text does not say "seminary," but collegium, and the only condition is that such a collegium promotes the common welfare of the Church. This, we believe, is verified in any Catholic college worthy of the name, which is open to all Catholic youths without discrimination, for such institutions greatly promote the welfare of the Church at large. A different answer must be given if the college is intended only for members of the respective religious family, a so-called scholasticate, for such institutions are primarily destined for the benefit of the respective order or congregation, not of the Church at large. The fact that a scholasticate was educating boys without means would not free it from the seminary tax.[22] Nor would the circumstance that the school or scholasticate was instituted in the monastery with some grammar school for its members.[23] Lastly, although a monastery may have to contribute to a seminary of its own order or congregation, it is not exempt from the diocesan seminary tax.[24]

§ 2 rules that the seminary tax must be general, equal, and proportionate. It must be general, that is to say, no exception may be made in favor of anyone who is obliged to contribute. It must be equal, i. e., all are to be taxed to the same extent, without subjective or personal consideration, according to the objective standard laid down in § 3. The tax must be proportionate to the needs of the seminary, i. e., it must be diminished if the revenues of

22 S. C. C., Jan. 3, 1594 (ibid., n. 20).

23 S. C. C., April 24, 1723 (Richter, l. c., n. 19).

24 S. C. C., Sept. 7, 1714 (ibid., n. 21).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the seminary increase, and the maximum rate cannot exceed 5% of the net income or capital taxed.

§ 3. The seminary tax can be levied only on the income which is left after all obligations and expenditures have been deducted. This is a general principle, which must be applied to the various contributors mentioned in § 1.

(a) As to the mensa episcopalis or episcopal income, it must be observed that former decisions cannot be fully adapted to modern exigencies because they apply to real benefices with immovable property. Still these decisions afford at least a clue as to what may be included in deducting obligations and expenditures. An obligation may burden the mensa in the form of an ecclesiastical pension which the bishop has to pay, for instance, to a disabled priest. Yet a decision says that the bishop would be allowed to charge it to the pensioner.[25] However, this is a rather complicated case. The term expenditures covers the total expense of collecting the income, the wages of hired hands and all other employees occupied in harvesting the produce of estates.[26] Applying these rules to modern notions we may say, salvo meliore iudicio, that the mensa episcopalis is taxable on what is left after the obligations and expenditures accruing from pastoral visits and professional occupations have been duly deducted. Household expenses are not to be deducted.[27] For the rest it is left to the bishop's own conscience to tax himself in a fair amount. The idea of the law is that no one should exempt himself.

(b) The same rules, according to the decision quoted, apply to the holders of ecclesiastical benefices. Mass stipends are not taxable.

25 S. C. EE. et RR., Eugubina, March 1, 1805 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 405).

26 S. C. C., 1673 (Bizzarri, ibid.); Dec. 17, 1836, ad VII, XI (Richter, l. c., p. 214, n. 27).

27 S. C. EE. et RR., l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) Hospitals, confraternities, and fabricae as well as religious houses are subject to the same rule. Hence, for instance, if the obligation of maintaining a number of patients or wards free of charge, or keeping sick or sickly clergymen free of charge, burden a hospital, this expense may be deducted, plus the interest to be paid on capital or mortgage. Thus also confraternities would be justified in deducting the expenses of Masses imposed by legacies and of alms imposed by their statutes.[28] Religious houses may subtract from the taxable sum the amount which they have to spend on their own seminaries or colleges.[29] In fact a religious house burdened with heavy debts and bound to meet its obligations, could claim either exemption or mitigation, for the terms are general in our text. This of course only in case they have no incorporated benefice or parishes.

(d) Not taxable are the daily distributions which the beneficiaries of cathedral and collegiate churches receive for actual and active assistance in choir, if they have an income besides these distributions. But if their income consists entirely of daily distributions, the third part of these distributions is liable to the tax.[30]

(e) Not taxable are the offerings of the faithful if the whole income of a parish consists of such offerings. This is the case in most of our parishes, since by offerings are understood not merely the plate collections, but also pew-rent, subscriptions, and house collections. Of these, then, only two-thirds are to be taxed. However, the general rule stated at the beginning of this section must also be applied to these two-thirds. Therefore the debts and the

28 S. C. C., June 23, 1640 (Richter, l. c., p. 213, n. 23).

29 S. C. C., Sept. 2, 1714 (ibid., n. 21).

30 S. C. C. EE. et RR., March 1, 1805 (Bizzarri, l. c.); S. C. C., June 23, 1640 (Richter, l. c., n. 23).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

necessary current expenses for the priests' salary, the maintenance of buildings and persons (organist, janitor, housekeeper) may be deducted. There will remain very little to be taxed in a good many churches of our country, and no other means is left except what is first stated in can. 1355, viz., the taking up of a collection.

It may be noted that our pastors and curates not being beneficiaries in the canonical sense of the word, are exempt from the seminary tax.

THE BISHOP'S DUTIES IN REGARD TO THE SEMINARY

CAN. 1357

§ 1. Episcopi est omnia et singula quae ad rectam Seminarii dioecesani administrationem, regimen, profectum necessaria et opportuna videantur, decernere, eaque ut fideliter observentur, curare, salvis praescriptionibus a Sancta Sede pro casibus peculiaribus latis.

§ 2. Potissimum studeat Episcopus frequenter Seminarium ipse per se visitare, in institutionem quae alumnis traditur sive litterariam et scientificam sive ecclesiasticam sedulo vigilare, et de alumnorum indole, pietate, vocatione ac profectu pleniorem sibi comparare notitiam, maxime occasione sacrarum ordinationum.

§ 3. Unumquodque Seminarium suas leges habeat ab Episcopo approbatas, in quibus quid agere, quid observare debeant, doceantur tum qui in eodem Seminario in spem Ecclesiae instituuntur, tum qui in horum institutionem operam suam impendunt.

§ 4. Seminarii interdioecesani vel regionalis regimen universum et administratio regitur normis a Sancta Sede statutis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. The bishop shall, with due respect to the particular regulations given by the Holy See, decide what is necessary and profitable for the proper administration, government, and progress of the seminary, and enforce his regulations.

§ 2. Above all the bishop shall try to visit the seminary frequently, watch over the mental and moral training of the students, and, especially on the occasion of sacred ordinations, acquaint himself more fully with the character, piety, vocation, and progress of the pupils.

§ 3. Each seminary must have its statutes, approved by the bishop, in which the rules for the conduct of students and teachers are laid down.

§ 4. Interdiocesan or provincial seminaries are entirely governed by the statutes issued by the Holy See.

For Italy special rules have been issued, which may serve as models for other interdiocesan seminaries.[81]

SEMINARY OFFICIALS

CAN. 1358

Curandum ut in quolibet Seminario adsint rector pro disciplina, magistri pro instructione, oeconomus pro curanda re familiari, a rectore distinctus, duo saltem confessarii ordinarii et director spiritus.

In every seminary there shall be a rector to maintain the discipline, professors to teach the students, a procurator to provide for the temporalities, who must be an official distinct from the rector, at least two ordinary confessors, and a spiritual director.

81 Cfr. Micheletti, Constitutiones Seminariorum Clericalium, 1919, p. XVIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:30 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DIOCESAN SEMINARY BOARD

CAN. 1359

§ 1. Diocesanis Seminariis bini constituantur coetus deputatorum, alter pro disciplina, alter pro administratione bonorum temporalium.

§ 2. Utrumque deputatorum coetum constituunt bini sacerdotes, ab Episcopo, audito Capitulo, electi; sed excluduntur Vicarius Generalis, familiares Episcopi, rector Seminarii, oeconomus et confessarii ordinarii.

§ 3. Munus deputatorum per sexennium durat, nec electi sine gravi causa amoveantur; sed rursus eligi poterunt.

§4. Episcopus debet consilium deputatorum in negotiis maioris momenti petere.

§ 1. Every diocesan seminary must have two boards, one for discipline, the other for the administration of temporal affairs.

§ 2. Each board consists of two priests, appointed by the bishop with the advice of the chapter or diocesan consultors; excluded are the Vicar-general, members of the bishop's household, the rector of the seminary, the procurator, and the ordinary confessors.

§ 3. The term of each board member lasts for six years, during which he should not be removed from office without a serious reason; he may also be reappointed.

§ 4. The bishop is bound to ask the advice of these boards in important matters.

Such matters of importance are, e. g., the drawing up of statutes, the admission of pupils, the appointment of the rector, confessors and teachers, etc., the selection of text-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

books, and the punishment and dismissal of unruly and incorrigible students.[32]

By familiares episcopi must here be understood his commensales, i. e., those who partake of the episcopal table or household and live in the episcopal residence as dependants,[33] and since, according to § 2 only priests can be elected deputati, they will be the bishop's chaplains, secretaries, or chancellors, provided they live together with the bishop.

The reason for excluding these and the Vicar General, the rector of the seminary, etc., is their dependence; these officials should be as independent as possible.

It may not be superfluous to state that the bishop is in duty bound to have such a seminary board and that he is not allowed to substitute another, made up of other persons, for instance, the rector, or the professors, or other persons prohibited by law.[34]

QUALIFICATION OF THE CHIEF SEMINARY OFFICIALS

CAN. 1360

§ 1. Firmo praescripto can. 891, ad munus rectoris, directoris spiritus, confessariorum et magistrorum Seminarii eligantur sacerdotes non doctrina tantum, sed etiam virtutibus ac prudentia praestantes, qui verbo et exemplo alumnis prodesse possint.

§ 2. Rectori Seminarii in propriis muneribus implendis obtemperare omnes debent.

§ 1. For the positions of rector, spiritual director, confessors, and professors in the seminary, only such priests should be chosen as are distinguished not only by learn-

32 S. C. C., 1585; July, 1589; Jan. 19, 1595 (Richter, l. c., p. 211, n. 1 ff.).

33 Barbosa, De Off. et Potest. Episc., P. II, alleg. 5, n. 2 ff. (Vol. I, 212 f.).

34 S. C. C., Aug. 27, 1864 (A. S. S., I, 657 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing, but also by virtues and prudence, so that they may serve as examples to the students in word and deed.

§ 2. All must obey the rector in the discharge of their duties.

As to the qualities of a rector, St. Charles Borromeo demanded that he be of advanced age (aetate provectus), of a serious disposition (auctoritate gravis), of tried integrity (speciali probitate).

With regard to his external canonical status the rector is (1) exempt from the parish organization, as per can. 1368. If a church is connected with the seminary, he is the canonical rector of the same (see can. 480, § 3). (2) He is obliged and entitled to attend the diocesan synod, as per can. 358, § 1, 3; (3) he is obliged to make the profession of faith according to can. 1406.

Concerning the internal affairs of the seminary; the rector (1) depends in everything and at all times on the Ordinary; (2) he is the supreme authority in the seminary, whom all others, of whatever degree, including the professors and the œconomus and other officials, must obey in matters that pertain to discipline, study, and ordinary administration; (3) he is not allowed habitually to hear the confessions of the students who live under the same roof with him, as per can. 891; (4) he may arrange and change things of minor importance according to his good judgment. (5) In urgent and extraordinary cases, (a) he may expel a student guilty of a grievous public transgression, but must inform the bishop immediately; (b) make changes of a serious nature after due deliberation with the Ordinary; (c) in serious cases which brook no delay he shall consult with the other officials, but not with the spiritual director or the confessors, act upon their advice, and afterwards report to the bishop.[35]

35 Micheletti, l. c., p. 14 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SEMINARY CONFESSORS

CAN. 1361

§ 1. Praeter confessarios ordinarios, alii confessarii designentur ad quos libere alumni accedere possint.

§ 2. Si ii confessarii extra Seminarium degant, et alumnus aliquem eorum acciri postulet, illum rector arcessat, nullo modo petitionis rationem inquirens neque se aegre id ferre demonstrans; si in Seminario habitent, ipsos alumnus libere adire potest, salva Seminarii disciplina.

§ 3. Quando agitur de alumno ad ordines admittendo vel e Seminario expellendo, nunquam confessariorum votum exquiratur.

§ 1. Besides the ordinary confessors, others should be appointed, whom the students may freely approach.

§ 2. If these extraordinary confessors live outside the seminary, and a student desires to approach one of them, the rector shall call him, without in any way asking the reason or showing signs of displeasure. If these extraordinary confessors live in the seminary, the students may freely approach them, with due regard, of course, to the discipline of the house.

§ 3. When a seminarian is to be promoted to sacred orders, or expelled, the opinion of the confessors must never be asked.

The rule for religious communities,[36] that they may have extraordinary confessors at least four times a year, may also be applied to seminaries.

A confessor may be offered salva disciplina, means that the granting of such a petition should not constitute a custom detrimental to good order, e. g., withdrawing from the lecture room, or study hall, or common exercises. In exceptional cases, of course, a relaxation may be justifiable.

[36] See can. 566, § 2, 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SCHOLARSHIPS

CAN. 1362

Reditus legati pro clericis instituendis tribui possunt alumnis in Seminarium sive maius sive minus rite receptis, licet nondum clericali tonsura initiatis, nisi aliud in tabulis fundationis expresse caveatur.

Legacies or bequests left for the training of clerics may be applied to students of the clerical or little seminary, even though they have received tonsure, provided the foundation does not forbid it.

This ruling is substantially taken from a letter of Pius X to the Cardinal Vicar of Rome. There are some scholarships in the Roman Seminary (near the Lateran) reserved for aspirants of the diocese of Rome. Pius X ordered that these be reserved for students of theology, and only in case there be none such may they be given to students of the lyceum (or college). This also holds for such as are Romans not by birth, but by domicile.[37] Our text is somewhat broader, leaving the choice free between clerical and collegiate students, provided, of course, they have entered the college with the intention of becoming priests, and provided that the terms of the bequest do not ordain differently. It is, therefore, important that such documents be carefully kept. If a scholarship is intended only for students of a certain diocese or parish, it cannot be applied to those of another diocese or parish. If the bequest is for university students, the scholarship cannot be applied to college students. If it is [37] Pius X, May 5, 1904, n. 2 (Anal. Eccl., XII, 235).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to be given to one student only, it cannot be divided or distributed among several. On the other hand, if the bequest is made in general terms "for a clerical student," without qualification, the president of the college or seminary may give the scholarship to any one attending the college, the petit seminaire, or the clerical seminary proper.

ADMISSION TO SEMINARIES

CAN. 1363

§ 1. In Seminarium ab Ordinario ne admittantur, nisi filii legitimi quorum indoles et voluntas spem afferant eos cum fructu ecclesiasticis ministeriis perpetuo inservituros.

§ 2. Antequam recipiantur, documenta exhibere debent de legitimitate natalium, de susceptis baptismate et confirmatione ac de vita et moribus.

§ 3. Dimissi ex aliis Seminariis vel ex aliqua religione ne admittantur, nisi prius Episcopus etiam secreto a Superioribus aliisve notitias requisierit de causa dimissionis ac de moribus, indole et ingenio dimissorum, et certo compererit nihil in eis esse quod sacerdotali statui minus conveniat; quas notitias, veritati conformes, eorum conscientia graviter onerata, suppeditare Superiores debent.

§ 1. The Ordinary shall admit into the seminary only boys of legitimate birth, whose character and inclination justify the hope that they will devote themselves forever to the ecclesiastical ministry.

§ 2. These, before they are received, must submit proofs of legitimate birth, certificates of Baptism and Confirmation, and testimonials of their life and conduct. These documents, to which a medical certificate might

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

profitably be added, are to be presented to the rector, who shall submit them to the Ordinary. The latter, as stated above, must consult with the seminary board.[38]

§ 3. Such as have been dismissed from another seminary or from a religious institute can be admitted only under the following conditions:

(a) The bishop must ascertain, if necessary even by way of secret information from the superiors and other persons, the reasons why they were discharged;

(b) He must satisfy himself about their moral standing, character, and intellectual capacity, and

(c) He must be morally certain that there is nothing in them that would not be compatible with the sacerdotal state.

The superiors who are called upon for such information are bound in conscience to tell the truth as far as they are able. Untruthful recommendations have often done great damage.

PLAN OF STUDIES FOR LITTLE SEMINARIES

CAN. 1364

In inferioribus Seminarii scholis:

1.° Praecipuum locum obtineat religionis disciplina, quae, modo singulorum ingenio et aetati accommodato, diligentissime explicetur.

2.° Linguas praesertim latinam et patriam alumni accurate addiscant;

3.° Ea in ceteris disciplinis institutio tradatur quae conveniat communi omnium culturae et statui clericorum in regione ubi alumni sacrum ministerium exercere debent.

38 Micheletti, l. c., p. 90 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The first place in the study plan of the petit seminaire belongs to religious instruction, which should be carefully given and adapted to the intellectual capacity and age of the hearers. Here it may not be amiss to state what is prescribed for the Italian schools. Each week, one period or hour for catechism and one for Bible History in the high school or academic grades; one hour for higher catechism and apologetical instruction in the college, at least in the higher grades.[39]

2. Especially the Latin language as well as the vernacular should be learned correctly. Nothing is prescribed as to the number of hours to be devoted to each; but it goes without saying that the language of the Church should be given such a prominent place that the pupils realize its importance as a main branch.

A difficulty may arise in regard to mixed schools, i. e., such as are partly secular and partly ecclesiastical. In these, says Leo XIII as well as the above-quoted Circular of the Consistorial Congregation, the Ordinaries should see to it that the plan of studies be adapted as closely as possible to that prescribed by the civil government.[40] In other words, the colleges conducted by and for ecclesiastics should not fall below the standard prescribed by the State.

Should it be necessary to supplement the instruction in certain branches in keeping with ecclesiastical tradition, certain periods or hours may be added for those who follow the ecclesiastical course. This is a very wise ruling.[41]

3. As to the other branches, everything should be taught that is required by the intellectual standard of the country in which the students expect to exercise the sacred 39 S. C. Consist., Litterae Circulares, July 16, 1912, n. 8 (A. Ap. S., IV, 495).

40 Leo XIII, "Depuis le jour," Sept. 8, 1879; Litt. Circ., n. 6 (l. c.).

41 Litt. Circ., l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ministry. This standard differs in different countries, but everywhere a priest is looked upon as a man of culture and the Catholic clergy in general as the "light of the world." To conform to this ideal students for the ministry must acquire the knowledge and learning expected of them and necessary to enable them to exercise a wholesome influence on their fellowmen. This can only be accomplished by a comprehensive and thorough training in those branches which society at present considers the sine qua non of culture. This is more efficaciously and palpably achieved by obtaining the usual academic degrees.[42] This does not mean that all clergymen are called upon or expected to excel in secular learning, but that some at least should be first-class all-around scholars. All, however, are obliged to acquire such a degree of even worldly science as is necessary to their state, in order that there may be no prejudice and unfounded accusations.[43]

PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY

CAN. 1365

§ 1. In philosophiam rationalem cum affinibus disciplinis alumni per integrum saltem biennium incumbant.

§ 2. Cursus theologicus saltem integro quadriennio contineatur, et, praeter theologiam dogmaticam et moralem, complecti praesertim debet studium sacrae Scripturae, historiae ecclesiasticae, iuris canonici, liturgiae, sacrae eloquentiae et cantus ecclesiastici.

§ 3. Habeantur etiam lectiones de theologia pas-

42 Leo XIII, "Officio sanctissimo," Dec. 22, 1887; "Depuis le jour," Sept. 8, 1899.

43 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:31 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

torali, additis practicis exercitationibus praesertim de ratione tradendi pueris aliisve catechismum, audiendi confessiones, visitandi infirmos, assistendi moribundis.

§ 1. The philosophical course must last at least two continuous years and comprise, besides philosophy proper, also the allied branches.

Philosophy is here understood in its proper sense, as the knowledge or science of things in their ultimate principles.[44] The disciplinae affines are officially described as follows: mathematics, natural or physical science, literature, Latin and Greek, history. The number of lessons to be devoted to each is stated as one hour per day. However, it must be observed that this plan was drawn up for the Italian lyceum, which has a three years' course. Counting five periods a week (they have one full holiday every week) this would be fifteen hours per week for three years. Distributing these lessons over two years, we have about 7 to 8 hours for each per week. To these must be added, according to the same Circular, one hour for review or repetition each week, and one hour for debate or disputation every two weeks.[45] Thus about 8 or 9 periods of philosophy proper are required to do justice to this important branch.

§ 2. The theological course should last at least four full years and comprise, besides dogmatic and moral theology, the study of Holy Scripture, Church history, Canon Law, liturgy, sacred eloquence, and ecclesiastical chant.

The number of hours to be devoted to dogmatic theology, according to the Circular,[46] is one a day, i. e., five hours per week, plus one hour for disputation and one 44 Cfr. Turner, History of Philosophy, 1903, p. 1.

45 Litt. Circul. S. C. Consist., July 16, 1912, n. 9.

46 Ibid., nn. 11 f. (A. Ap. S., IV, 496 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for review, in all, seven hours a week for dogmatic theology.

For moral theology no definite number of hours is assigned, but it is added that lectures on sociology and the elements of Canon Law should be given as supplementary to moral theology.

For Holy Scripture four periods per week are assigned throughout the four years' course. The first two years are to be devoted to introduction and the last two to exegesis.

Church History has no definite number prescribed, neither have the secondary branches of Biblical Greek, Hebrew, sacred eloquence, patrology, liturgy, sacred archaeology, sacred art, and Gregorian Chant.

It may be noted that this programme, as outlined in the Circular, is to be taken as directive only, not as a law in the strict sense. Details may be left to the seminary board. Note that the same Circular[47] says that there should not be more than four, or at most four and one-half hours school a day, and these should not follow one another consecutively, but should be divided up. Too many lessons are incompatible with the discipline of the seminary, the necessary exercises of piety, and the physical well-being of the students.

§ 3 rules that pastoral theology should also be taught. Practical exercises should be added. These should consist in pedagogic instructions, in order that the candidates may learn how to teach catechism, to hear confessions, to visit the sick, and to assist the dying.

47 Ibid., n. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

QUALIFICATION OF SEMINARY PROFESSORS

CAN. 1366

§ 1. Ad magisterii munus in disciplinis philosophicis, theologicis et iuridicis, ii, ceteris paribus, iudicio Episcopi et deputatorum Seminarii, praeferantur, qui laurea doctorali potiti sint in Universitate studiorum vel Facultate a Sancta Sede recognitis, aut, si agatur de religiosis, qui simile testimonium a suis Superioribus maioribus habeant.

§ 2. Philosophiae rationalis ac theologiae studia et alumnorum in his disciplinis institutionem professores omnino pertractent ad Angelici Doctoris rationem, doctrinam et principia, eaque sancte teneant.

§ 3. Curandum ut saltem sacrae Scripturae, theologiae dogmaticae, theologiae moralis, et historiae ecclesiasticae, totidem habeantur distincti magistri.

§ 1. For the teaching of philosophy, theology, and canon law, other qualifications being equal, those should be preferred who have obtained the doctor's degree from a university or faculty recognized by the Holy See. The decision lies with the bishop and the seminary board. The phrase ceteris paribus is easily understood in the light of can. 1360, § 1, which demands not only learning, but also virtue and prudence, as necessary qualities of a professor. Teachers taken from the rank of religious should have testimonials from their superiors testifying to their doctor's degree or recognized capacity and scholarship.

§ 2. Mental philosophy and theology must be taught according to the method, teaching, and principles of the Angelic Doctor, to which the professors should religiously adhere.

The method here understood is the scholastic form in which the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas and, in fact, all the great Summae of the thirteenth century are composed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The term doctrina in this connection is not so easily defined, but, taken as a whole, no doubt means the teaching of St. Thomas, more especially his metaphysics,[48] though not each and every sentence laid down in his works need be accepted.

The principles of the Angelic Doctor are the rules or theses around which his system clusters, and upon which it more or less hinges, especially in metaphysics.[49]

It was but natural that the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas should be prescribed as the text-book for theological seminaries. This does not mean that no other systematic text-book may be used for recitation purposes, but only that the Summa must be used and explained for the scholastic part, i. e., in the treatment of purely speculative questions.[50] Of modern erudition there is but little in the Summa, and yet dogmatic theology now-a-days must be treated with the aid of history and Holy Writ.[51] That it will not be easy for a Scotist or a Molinist to feel at home in the Thomistic system goes without saying; but no other system is condemned by the preference given to St. Thomas.

§ 3. Care should be taken that at least Holy Scripture, dogmatic theology, moral theology, and Church history be taught by different professors.

48 Pius X, "Doctoris Angelici," June 29, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 338).

49 See the 24 theses proposed by S. C. Stud., July 27, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 383 ff.).

50 Cfr. the documents already quoted and S. C. Sem., March 7, 1916 (A. Ap. S., VIII, 157).

51 S. C. Consist., Lit. Circul., n. 11.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE RELIGIOUS TRAINING OF SEMINARISTS

CAN. 1367

Current Episcopi ut alumni Seminarii:

1.° Singulis diebus communiter matutinas et serotinas preces recitent, per aliquod tempus mentali orationi vacent, sacrificio Missae intersint;

2.° Semel saltem in hebdomada ad sacramentum poenitentiae accedant et frequenter, qua par est pietate, Eucharistico pane se reficiant;

3.° Dominicis et festis diebus, sacris Missarum et Vesperarum sollemnibus adsint, altari inserviant sacrasque caeremonias exerceant, praesertim in ecclesia cathedrali si id, iudicio Episcopi, sine disciplinae et studiorum detrimento fieri possit;

4.° Singulis annis per aliquot dies continuos exercitiis spiritualibus vacent;

5.° Semel saltem in hebdomada adsint instructioni de rebus spiritualibus quae pia exhortatione claudatur.

The bishops shall see to it that the students of the Seminary:

1.° Recite their morning and evening prayers in common, make a short meditation, and assist at Mass;

2.° Go to confession at least once a week and frequently receive holy Communion with proper devotion;

3.° Assist at solemn Mass and Vespers on Sundays and holy-days of obligation, serve at the altar, and perform the sacred ceremonies, especially in the cathedral church, provided the bishop thinks it can be done without disadvantange to discipline and study;

4.° Make a retreat once a year for several successive days;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5.° At least once a week attend a spiritual lecture, which may be followed by a pious exhortation.

We hardly believe that this canon applies to "little seminaries" in globo. At most some of its prescriptions may serve as a directive norm for these, as far as circumstances permit. The practice or exercise of sacred ceremonies is certainly only intended for seminarians in the strict sense. Weekly confession for academic and collegiate students cannot be prescribed as a rule. Where there are day scholars, not even 1° can be enforced. Therefore we believe that this canon is primarily intended for clerical seminaries, but may, as stated, serve as a directive norm for high schools and colleges.

To superintend the pious exercises is the special duty of the rector,[52] who should see to it that genuine and solid piety be fostered in the candidates to the sacred ministry. Hence he must combat hypocrisy and watch over the freedom of conscience. This presupposes free choice of confessors, according to can. 1361. The rector should be cautious and circumspect in inquiring into the frequentation of the Sacraments, and use no compulsion or moral persuasion in this matter. He shall also inculcate this mode of acting in his officials.

The spiritual director conducts the daily, weekly, and monthly devotions of the seminarists, but under the supervision of the rector (can. 1360, § 2). He should be ready to hear confessions whenever asked by the students. But he, too, must leave the freedom of conscience intact, scrupulously abstain from restricting the choice of confessors, and be specially careful about the seal of confession.

It may be asked: If perfect liberty of conscience is 52 Micheletti, l. c., p. 26 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

guaranteed, how can the discipline, and especially the rule laid down in our canon, be observed? We answer as follows: The rector as well as the spiritual director should give warning in their conferences and spiritual lectures as to the obligation in general of observing this rule, a protracted violation of which can not long remain hidden from the eyes of a vigilant rector or spiritual director. The rector, then, when perceiving any case of palpable negligence, must correct the culprit, and, like a religious superior, is bound to correct even apparently slight faults if a serious relaxation of discipline is to be apprehended therefrom.[53] As to individuals, the matter must first be settled with the confessors who are the judges of conscience. It may be that in cases of scrupulosity the confessor would advise less frequent confession. Should a penitent say that he has nothing to confess, the rules of materia sufficiens and necessaria must be applied. Giving scandal by not going to confession would seem to form a materia sufficiens. At least the penitent should present himself to hear the confessor's advice and receive his blessing. Thus freedom can be safeguarded as well as discipline. What goes on between the confessor and the penitent is a matter entirely subtracted from public discipline.

Our canon says that the Ordinary must see to the enforcement of this rule. This can be done especially on the occasion of his visits, when the bishop may interpellate the rector as to its observance. The rector is bound to answer his questions truthfully. Of course, neither the spiritual director nor the confessors may reveal anything that they know from confession only. However, the spiritual director, who has every opportunity to watch 53 Cfr. Marc, Institutiones Morales, II, n. 2170, q. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the students, may express his judgment in general terms, without mentioning any individual, as to the general observance of our canon. The Ordinary may give weight to the rule by threatening injunctions or penalties, against which no appeal is admitted.[54]

EXEMPTION

CAN. 1368

Exemptum a iurisdictione paroeciali Seminarium esto; et pro omnibus qui in Seminario sunt, parochi officium, excepta materia matrimoniali et firmo praescripto can. 891, obeat Seminarii rector eiusve delegatus, nisi in quibusdam Seminariis aliter a Sede Apostolica constitutum.

The seminary is exempt from the jurisdiction of the pastor, whose place is taken by the rector or his delegate for all who live in the seminary in all things except marriage and matters concerning which the Holy See may have differently provided. But the rule laid down in can. 891, that the rector should not habitually hear the confessions of boarding pupils, must not be set aside.

This canon, though quite clear in itself, raises more than one doubt. First of all, there is the very term seminary. Does it comprise every seminary, the little as well as the clerical? In view of the definition given above, in the introduction to this title, we believe exemption may be claimed by any seminary which is such in the proper sense of the word. For as the bishop may exempt some religious families and charitable institutions from parish organization,[55] so does the Code exempt the seminaries

54 Bened. XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 34.

55 Can. 464, § 2. But the definition of seminary cannot be eo ipso applied to colleges of a promiscuous character; the clerical character from the same. Besides, the general rule that, where the law makes no distinction, neither should the interpreter, may here be safely applied, as the law is favorable to the seminaries. But only such seminaries, either little or clerical, as are under the control of the local Ordinary, or interdiocesan and pontificial seminaries, must be understood. Hence seminaries governed by religious cannot claim this privilege, unless the Ordinary should see fit to apply can. 464, § 2, as mentioned above.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:32 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The next question is: Who are "all those who are in the seminary"? No doubt the officials as well as the professors and pupils who habitually live in the seminary, and as long as they live there, even during vacation, should they spend their vacation there. And we believe that this rule may also be applied to the so-called villeggiatura, or summer resort, which is a desideratum for all seminaries.[56] This privilege doubtless also applies to laymen working for, and living as boarders in, the seminary, for the text admits this extension. But concerning these laymen it must be understood that, if they want to get married, they must do so in the parish church, according to the law established in can. 1094 ff. All other sacraments, including baptism and confirmation, these laymen may receive in the seminary.

But what about the Sisters in the seminary? Their presence there is necessary for more than one reason, and is now tolerated by Roman practice. They are subject to the following rules:[57]

1. They may be called or dismissed by the local Ordinary according to his discretion.

must certainly be prevalent, otherwise any school might be called a seminary.

56 S. C. Consist., Litt. Circul., July 16, 1912, n. 3 (A. Ap. S., IV, 493).

57 Micheletti, l. c., p. 40.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. The appointment of the superioress and the selection of sisters for service in the seminary is left to the superioress general, who, however, should comply with the wishes of the local Ordinary.

3. The interior government of the Sisters employed in the seminary must be left to the local superioress and neither the rector nor any other official should interfere therewith.

4. A private oratory should be assigned to the Sisters for their spiritual exercises.

5. Their habitation should be entirely separate from the other parts of the seminary, and no one, except the rector, vicerector, and procurator, shall be allowed to communicate with the Superioress or the Sisters.

6. As to confessions the common law, as stated in can. 520, must be applied.

From these observations the question with regard to the rector's rights is easily settled. The Sisters' chaplain must be assigned by the local Ordinary, according to can. 529. Their confessors must have the requisite faculties from the Ordinary; and for the rest, especially for their "peace of conscience," the Sisters may avail themselves of the favors granted in can. 522–523.

SEMINARY DISCIPLINE

CAN. 1369

§ 1. Seminarii rector et alii omnes moderatores sub eius auctoritate curent ut alumni statuta ab Episcopo probata studiorumque rationem adamussim servent ac spiritu vere ecclesiastico imbuantur.

§ 2. Saepius eis verae et christianae urbanitatis leges tradant, eosque exemplo suo ad illas colendas excitent; hortentur praeterea ut praecepta hygienica,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vestium et corporis munditiam et quandam in conversando comitatem cum modestia et gravitate coniunctam, iugiter servent.

§ 3. Sedulo vigilent ut magistri suo munere rite fungantur.

§ 1. The rector and all other officials subject to his authority shall take care that the students closely observe the statutes approved by the bishop as well as the plan of studies, and that they be imbued with the true ecclesiastical spirit.

If the students are bound to follow the programme laid down for the various courses, it naturally follows that the professors too should follow it (§ 3). Therefore, says the oft-quoted Circular, the professors should not waste time in long discussions on some particular subject — perhaps a "hobby"— but finish their pensum within the period assigned for the same. Ordinaries are exhorted to see to it, that the lectures on dogmatic and moral theology, and, as far as possible, also those on philosophy, at least the general outlines, are given in Latin.[58] This, of course cannot mean that the vernacular is to be banished. For the positive parts of dogmatic theology and sociological questions are certainly more easily and profitably treated in the vernacular language. But the speculative parts should be treated in the accurate and precise Latin terminology handed down by tradition.

§ 2. The seminary officials should insist upon the rules of genuine Christian politeness and excite the students to imitation by their example. They should also exhort them to observe the rules of hygiene, be cleanly in dress and appearance, and practice courtesy joined with modesty and gravity.

58 Lit. Circul., n. 13.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

STUDENTS OUTSIDE THE SEMINARY

CAN. 1370

Quoties alumni ob quamlibet causam extra Seminarium morentur, servetur praescriptum can. 972, § 2.

When students, for whatsoever reason, live outside the seminary, they should be placed under the care of pious and worthy persons, who shall watch over them and lead them on to piety, as stated under can. 972, § 2.

DISMISSAL OF STUDENTS

CAN. 1371

E Seminario dimittantur dyscoli, incorrigibiles, seditiosi, ii qui ob mores atque indolem ad statum ecclesiasticum idonei non videantur; itemque, qui in studiis adeo parum proficiant ut spes non affulgeat eos sufficientem doctrinam fore assecuturos; praesertim vero statim dimittantur qui forte contra bonos mores aut fidem deliquerint.

Disorderly, incorrigible, and rebellious students, such as appear unfit for the ecclesiastical state on account of their conduct and character, and those who make so little progress in their studies that there is no hope that they will acquire a sufficient knowledge, should be dismissed. Those who offend against faith and good morals — by which latter term the praeceptum contra sextum is chiefly meant — should be expelled at once.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXII

SCHOOLS

This title sounds more restricted than its contents bear out. Education comprises Christian training of every kind and degree, no matter in what place or form it is given, whereas the term school has, at least in common parlance, a narrower meaning, to wit, a place or building where education is imparted; or an institution of learning or training, especially when the latter is carried on in a systematic form. Education in general means mental and moral development of the faculties of man; school means a systematic education offered in a place or building assigned for that purpose. Thus we also speak of compulsory education and compulsory schooling, which terms differ widely, since the former does not necessarily include the latter, as shall be seen under can. 1375. The first of the following canons refers to Christian education in general.

THE DUTY OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

CAN. 1372

§ 1. Fideles omnes ita sunt a pueritia instituendi ut non solum nihil eis tradatur quod catholicae religioni morumque honestati adversetur, sed praecipuum institutio religiosa ac moralis locum obtineat.

§ 2. Non modo parentibus ad normam can. 1113, sed etiam omnibus qui eorum locum tenent, ius et

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gravissimum officium est curandi christianam liberorum educationem.

§ 1. All the faithful must from childhood be educated in such way that not only are they taught nothing that is contrary to faith and morals, but that religious and moral training takes the first place.

§ 2. Not only parents, but all those who take their place, have the right and the solemn duty to provide a Christian education for their children.

It seems superfluous to add anything to this pregnant text, which is the concrete embodiment of the many solemn documents which the Holy See issued against the liberalistic tendencies of the last century. One was directed especially to the bishops of the U. S. by the Holy Office.[1] It says that the tender age is most susceptible to the seeds of vice as well as virtue. Experienced teachers and priests could tell a thrilling story of the difference between children brought up in the atmosphere of faith and piety, and those who come from homes where religion has little or no influence.[2]

The right of parents and guardians under God is inalienable and inviolable because the child belongs primarily and before others to the parents. This natural right has its foundation in the very fact of procreation and involves the right of the parent to feed, clothe, and educate his children physically, intellectually, and morally.[3] These rights involve their corresponding duties, which parents may neither evade nor ignore.[4] For by doing so they would violate their natural duties towards their God-

1 S. O., Nov. 24, 1875 (Coll. P. F., n. 1449).

2 Cfr. Becker, S. J., Christian Education or The Duty of Parents; 1899, p. 128 ff.

3 See can. 1113.

4 See the excellent paper of Cardinal O'Connell in Catholic Educational Association Bulletin, Aug. 1919; Cavagnis, Instit. Iuris Pub. Eccl., 1882, Vol. IV, p. 14 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

given protegés, for whom they are responsible and accountable to the Creator.

From this follows that the parents are entitled and obliged to provide, either themselves or through others, the necessary moral and religious training and to keep their children away from everything and every person that would be dangerous to faith or morals.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN SCHOOLS

CAN. 1373

§ 1. In qualibet elementaria schola, pueris pro eorum aetate tradenda est institutio religiosa.

§2. Iuventus, quae medias vel superiores scholas frequentat, pleniore religionis doctrina excolatur, et locorum Ordinarii curent ut id fiat per sacerdotes zelo et doctrina praestantes.

§ 1. In every elementary school religious instruction should be given the children according to their age.

These elementary, popular or grade schools are especially destined for the building up of good character, and since an education which guarantees public peace and tranquillity cannot be solid and lasting without the principles of Christian truth, moral as well as intellectual, it follows that no schooling without religious training is able to produce the desired effects. These words of Pius IX to the Archbishop of Freiburg (Baden) [5] need no further proof than a glance at the present social condition of the world. The programme of the so-called "Liberals," who propose to take the schools away from the influence of the Church, and to limit education to the pursuit of worldly happiness,[6] has never received a more ter-

[5] "Quum non sine," July 14, 1864 (Coll. P. F., n. 1260).

[6] Syllabus of Pius IX, prop. 48 (Denz., n. 1596).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:33 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rible shock than in the late war. Unfortunately, the enemies of Christian education have eyes but see not. Rationalism and materialism clings to their bones and often has its principal nerve in the pocket.

§ 2. Youths who frequent the secondary or higher schools should be given fuller instruction in Christian doctrine, and the local Ordinaries should see to it that this instruction is given by zealous and learned priests.

Such fuller instructions are contained in the larger catechism as well as the so-called evidences of religion, which should be imparted so that they may be easily grasped and assimilated by the pupils.[7]

NON-CATHOLIC SCHOOLS

CAN. 1374

Pueri catholici scholas acatholicas, neutras, mixtas, quae nempe etiam acatholicis patent, ne frequentent. Solius autem Ordinarii loci est decernere, ad normam instructionum Sedis Apostolicae, in quibus rerum adiunctis et quibus adhibitis cautelis, ut periculum perversionis vitetur, tolerari possit ut eae scholae celebrentur.

Catholic children should not frequent non-Catholic, neutral, or mixed schools, i. e., such as are open also to non-Catholics. It is for the local Ordinary to decide, according to the instructions of the Apostolic See, in what circumstances and with what precautions attendance at such schools may be tolerated, without danger of perversion to the pupils.

There is a term used in this canon which recalls the famous controversy waged about the parochial schools in 7 Pius IX, "Acerbo nimis," April 15, 1905, n. V.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this country a generation ago. It is "tolerari possit," which was given only for particular cases and in view of special circumstances, and may be called an equitable arrangement departing from the letter of the law.[8] The instructions of the Holy See for our country were contained in a document issued by the Holy Office,[9] Nov. 24, 1875. Others of a similar tenor were given for Canada, Ireland, England and missionary countries.[10] All of them revolve around the question whether the influence of the Church is entirely excluded from the public schools and the Catholic pupils are exposed to danger to the faith; if so, the bishop shall provide for their instruction as far as lies within his power, and at the same time warn the faithful and announce to them that they cannot in conscience permit their children to frequent schools opposed to the Catholic Church.[11]

The circumstances in which attendance at non-Catholic schools may be permitted are expressed in the above-named Instruction to the bishops of the U. S. as follows: "Generally speaking, such cause will exist if there is no Catholic school in a place, or if the one that is there cannot be considered suitable to the conditions and circumstances of the pupils." This suitability must not be identified with mere fashionableness, for there is no proportion between the danger to faith and "stylishness." Hence said instruction continues: "Parents who neglect to give this necessary Christian training and instruction to their children, or who permit them to go to schools in 8 See the excellent work of Burns, C. S. C., The Growth and Development of the Catholic School System in U. S., 1912, chs. XI f.

9 Coll. P. F., n. 1449.

10 S. C. P. F., March 14, 1895; Sept. 18, 1819; Jan. 16, 1841; April 7, 1860; Aug. 6, 1867 (Oxford and Cambridge); 1659; July 19, 1838; March 20, 1865; April 25, 1868 (Coll., nn. 1890; 738, 1190; 1312, 1329).

11 Pius IX, "Quum non sine," July 14, 1864 (Coll. P. F., n. 1260),

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which the ruin of their souls is inevitable, or, finally, who send them to the public schools without sufficient cause and without taking the necessary precautions to render the danger of perversion remote, and do so while there is a good and well-equipped Catholic school in the place, and while they have the means to send them elsewhere to be educated; — such parents, if obstinate, cannot be absolved, as is evident from the moral teaching of the Church." [12]

THE RIGHT OF THE CHURCH TO ESTABLISH SCHOOLS

CAN. 1375

Ecclesiae est ius scholas cuiusvis disciplinae non solum elementarias, sed etiam medias et superiores condendi.

The Church has the right to establish schools of every kind, not only elementary, but also secondary and higher schools. Note well, the Church does not claim the exclusive right to establish schools, as she does with regard to seminaries for the education of the clergy (can. 1352). Our canon claims for her the right of establishing schools of every kind, (cuiusvis disciplinae). By disciplina is generally understood what we call a branch or department of learning. Hence the term includes elementary, secondary, and higher schools, colleges and universities, even the special faculties of theology, philosophy, medicine, and law. Among the secondary schools figure training and professional schools and high schools for boys and girl (academies), whatever name they may go by in different countries, for the terminology varies.[13]

To establish a school means to furnish the means

12 Coll. P. F., n. 1449.

13 See Cath. Encycl., Vol. XIII s. v. "Schools."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

wherewith to commence and continue it. Such an act does not exclude the coöperation of other persons, either public or private, who may participate in the administration or regulation of a school.

A school is a building or other place where education is given in a more or less systematic manner. Now-a-days education is concentrated in schools; hence the "fight for the schools" waged in nearly every civilized country. Yet it cannot be denied that there is not a purely mental or abstract, but a real and well-founded distinction between education and school. For education comprises the development of the moral and mental faculties in the whole range of science and moral principles. Schools on the other hand are differentiated by the higher and lower degrees of studies, these being divided into various grades, as the appellations elementary, secondary, etc., clearly indicate. Besides, schools are localized and attached to state and municipal machinery, whilst education may and should be the common good of all.

The Code, then, by claiming the right of establishing schools for the Church, leaves aside the question of education in general. Whence this claim to establish schools? Whatever has reference to the purpose or end for which the Church was founded, belongs to her domain. Now schools, as the universal and ordinary means of conveying a Christian education, undoubtedly have a natural connection with the end of the Church. Consequently the Church has the right of establishing and conducting schools.[14] The major premiss follows from the fact that the Church is an autonomous, an independent, and a perfect society endowed with the right of procuring the means necessary to attain its end. It will not do to say that the State offers to the Church these means, because one sovereign society cannot be at the mercy of another,—the Church subject to the State. As to the minor, viz., that schools are closely connected with the end of the Church, the following observation may suffice. In itself a school may have a merely temporal purpose, and thus be referred to the State, the end of which is to procure temporal prosperity and order, but a systematic separation between scientific training and moral development results in a one-sided education which can bear no solid and lasting fruits, because the unity of man requires an even evolution of all his faculties, intellectual as well as moral. And since true morality cannot exist without religious principles, it naturally follows that the whole business of education is closely bound up with religion. To provide a religious and moral training for her subjects certainly appertains to the Church, whose proper end is spiritual, religious, binding man's temporal to his eternal destiny. Neither is there any danger that religious schools will breed disloyalty or disturb the peace among citizens. The very fact that religion teaches submission and obedience to lawful authority and love of fellowmen should be sufficient to dispel any misgiving in that direction. This is acknowledged by honest non-Catholic politicians,[15] and the late war has amply proved that Catholics are as loyal as the members of any other denomination.

14 Cfr. Cavagnis, Institut. Iuris Eccl. Pub., Vol. III, p. 69 f., l. IV, n. 117 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here we may recall the law of prescription. The Church it was who in the turmoil of barbarous invasions held high the torch of civilization and preserved it against the assaults of savage hordes. To her most of the higher, cloistral and cathedral schools and universities, are indebted for their very existence and endowments. Many of those very chairs that have been made the catapults

15 Thus Treitschke, Vorlesungen über Politik, I, 350.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from which poisonous missiles are hurled against the Catholic Church, owe their foundation to ecclesiastical benefices and persons.

This may suffice to illustrate can. 1375. It is not our task to outline what the State may justly claim. This would require an extensive investigation. Only one statement may be permitted. What is said in the heat of controversy cannot always be accepted as objective truth. Cavagnis[16] vindicates the following functions to the State: (1) It should establish schools when private citizens, or other agencies, neglect to do so; (2) It should see to it that the social and civic relations and good order are not disturbed or subverted in private schools; (3) It should repress and punish rebellious disturbances and dangerous machinations. Similar views are expressed by many other Catholic authors,[17] viz., that compulsory education, but not compulsory schooling, may be vindicated to the State, which, as Cavagnis also admits, has the greatest interest in the adequate training of its citizens. It may be quite true that these ideas are imported from the Old World, as Cardinal Manning observed,[18] and that the conditions of the New York are different; but the underlying principles must be as true here as they are there.

UNIVERSITIES, FACULTIES, AND DEGREES

CAN. 1376

§ 1. Canonica constitutio catholicae studiorum Universitatis vel Facultatis Sedi Apostolicae reservatur.

§ 2. Universitas vel Facultas catholica, etiam religiosis familiis quibuslibet concredita, sua debet habere statuta a Sede Apostolica probata.

16 Instit. Iuris Publ. Eccl., Vol. III, p. 64, l. IV, n. 107; for the rest we refer to Burns, l. c., ch. IX.

17 Th. Meyer, S. J., Institutiones Iuris Nat., 1900, Vol. II, 703 ff.

18 Burns, l. c., p. 220.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1377

Gradus academicos qui effectus canonicos in Ecclesia habeant, nemo conferre potest, nisi ex facultate ab Apostolica Sede concessa.

The canonical establishment of Catholic universities and faculties is reserved to the Holy See.

These, even when entrusted to religious institutes, must have their statutes approved by the Apostolic See. No academic degree produces any canonical effect unless it has been conferred in virtue of the power granted by the Apostolic See.

The difference between a university and a faculty consists in this, that a university includes a so-called studium generale, or, in concrete words, the faculties of theology, philosophy, law, and medicine, while the term faculty, in its restricted and technical sense, means only one of these. If we say studium generale we are aware that this term was first used to signify a school which admitted students from all parts, and then was transferred to the corporate body of teachers and students. To-day a university in the full sense of the word means the total of the four faculties mentioned above.[19] The term "faculty" was originally used in the more general sense of science or knowledge; later it came to indicate some department of study, as the faculty of arts,[20] or theology, or Canon Law. In this sense it is used in our text. Universities and faculties, then, which enjoy the privilege and power of conferring degrees and are acknowledged as Catholic universities or faculties, can be established

19 See Cath. Encyc., Vol. XV, 188, s. v. "Universities."

20 See New International Encyc., 1904, Vol. XIX, s. v. "Universities," p. 738.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

only by the Holy See and must have their statutes approved by the S. C. of Seminaries and Universities.[21]

Can. 1377 is to be understood both of degrees conferred after examination and of so-called honoris causa degrees. It would seem that the mere acknowledgment and approval of an institution of learning by the Holy See does not convey the right of conferring academic degrees, but this right must be specially mentioned in the petition and the grant. If the Holy See grants the honorary title of doctor, this gives the recipient the same rights and privileges as the degrees conferred by a Catholic university after examination.[22]

RIGHTS ATTACHED TO THE DEGREE OF DOCTOR

CAN. 1378

Ius est doctoribus rite creatis deferendi, extra sacras functiones, annulum etiam cum gemma, et biretum doctorale, firmo praeterea praescripto sacrorum canonum, qui in collatione quorundam officiorum et beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum statuunt eos, ceteris paribus, iudicio Ordinarii, esse praeferendos, qui lauream vel licentiam obtinuerint.

Duly created doctors are entitled to wear, outside of ecclesiastical functions, a ring studded with a gem and the doctor's biretta, and the ruling of the sacred canons remains effective which says that all other things being equal, doctors and licentiates should be preferred in the appointment to ecclesiastical offices and benefices.

The doctor's ring may be worn on the same finger on which prelates wear theirs.[23] The biretta here intended is 21 Pius X, "Sapienti Consilio," June 29, 1908, § 1, n. 11.

22 S. C. Stud., Dec. 19, 1903.

23 S. Rit. C., May 23, 1846, ad 5 (Dec. Auth., n. 2907).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the four-cornered ecclesiastical headgear,[24] not the so-called doctor's hat. These paraphernalia may not be worn at ecclesiastical functions, especially not while saying or singing Mass.[25]

By the way it may be stated that our text grants the right to such distinctions to all duly created doctors, whether of the secular or religious clergy.

CATHOLIC SCHOOLS TO BE ESTABLISHED

CAN. 1379

§ 1. Si scholae catholicae ad normam can. 1373 sive elementariae sive mediae desint, curandum, praesertim a locorum Ordinariis, ut condantur.

§ 2. Itemque si publicae studiorum Universitates doctrina sensuque catholico imbutae non sint, optandum ut in natione vel regione Universitas catholica condatur.

§3. Fideles ne omittant adiutricem operam pro viribus conferre in catholicas scholas condendas et sustentandas.

§ 1. Where there are no Catholic schools in the sense of can. 1373, the church authorities, especially the local Ordinary, should take care to establish such.

§ 2. Catholic universities should also be founded in provinces or countries where the existing universities are not imbued with Catholic teaching and feeling.

§ 3. The faithful should not omit to lend their aid, according to their ability, in the establishment and support of Catholic schools.

This has been a maxim of the Church ever since univer-

24 S. Rit. C., Dec. 7, 1844, ad 1 (16 n. 2877).

25 S. Rit. C., l. c., and June 30, 1883, ad VII (n. 3580).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sities and schools have taken an unchristian turn, as especially the letters of the Holy See to the Irish hierarchy emphasize.[26]

CLERICS TO PURSUE HIGHER STUDIES

CAN. 1380

Optandum ut locorum Ordinarii, pro sua prudentia, clericos, pietate et ingenio praestantes, ad scholas mittant alicuius Universitatis aut Facultatis ab Ecclesia conditae vel approbatae, ut inibi studia praesertim philosophiae, theologiae ac iuris canonici perficiant et academicos gradus consequantur.

It is desirable that the local Ordinaries should, with prudent judgment, send clerical students who excel in piety and talent, to a university or faculty either founded or approved by the Church, that they may there complete their studies, especially in philosophy, theology, and Canon Law, and obtain the academic degrees.

Honorius III already advised prelates and chapters to send talented clerics to universities for at least five years, during which teachers as well as students should be supported from ecclesiastical funds, i. e., benefices, by authority of the Apostolic See.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION UNDER CHURCH AUTHORITY

CAN. 1381

§ 1. Religiosa iuventutis institutio in scholis quibuslibet auctoritati et inspectioni Ecclesiae subiicitur.

§ 2. Ordinariis locorum ius et officium est vigilandi ne in quibusvis scholis sui territorii quidquam contra fidem vel bonos mores tradatur aut fiat.

[26] Leo XIII, "Officio sanctissimo," Dec. 22, 1887 et pluries.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Eisdem similiter ius est approbandi religionis magistros et libros; itemque, religionis morumque causa, exigendi ut tum magistri tum libri removeantur.

§ 1. The religious instruction of the young in all schools is subject to the authority and inspection of the Church. This law, it would seem, should need no special stressing, yet it is a sad fact that the Apostolic See had more than once to complain of encroachments on its rights by the civil authorities. Pius IX in his Syllabus proscribed the proposition that the direction of the schools in which the Christian youth are educated, should be entirely withdrawn from the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical authority and given to the civil government. This is a confusion of the sphere of the two societies, Church and State, since religious instruction belongs without a shadow of doubt to the teaching office of the Church by divine right.[27]

§ 2 ascribes to the local Ordinaries the right and duty to watch that in the schools of their territory nothing contrary to faith and morals be taught or done.[28]

There may be a difficulty concerning national or government schools, such as existed in Ireland in the middle of the last century,[29] or as our American public schools, which are under municipal or State authority, entirely withdrawn from the influence of any religious denomination. Here much depends upon the local school board, the directors, and the superintendents, but also upon legislation. Catholic citizens have a powerful weapon in their hands in their vote. The ecclesiastical authorities should prudently draw attention to obnoxious teachers

27 Syllabus Pii IX, nn. 45, 47 (Denzinger, nn. 1593, 1595).

28 Ibid., Pius IX, "Quum non sine," July 14, 1864; cfr. Math. 28, 19 f.

29 S. C. P. F., April 7, 1680 (Coll., n. 1190).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and books. The pastors may counteract the bad influence by alertness and the intensified teaching of religion. But all these remedies are insufficient and the necessity of having Catholic schools of our own is imperative.

Of general interest is an instruction of the Holy Office [30] given Aug. 22, 1900, to the bishop of Jassy in Roumenia. There, on account of peculiar circumstances, Catholic schools were permitted to receive schismatic pupils, but only on several conditions, namely: (a) that no danger to faith or morals arise from the practice to the Catholic and schismatic students; (b) that Catholic school boards shall not employ schismatic catechists, though they may permit the schismatics to maintain such at their own expense; (c) that neither Catholic nor schismatic catechists teach the "interdenominational" catechism, i. e., a doctrine which is acceptable to both; (d) that non-Catholics must not be admitted as teachers of metaphysics, ethics, and allied branches; though they may be permitted to teach languages, mathematics, and natural sciences under the supervision of the Catholic schoolboard; (e) that no textbooks, even of profane sciences, written by non-Catholics may be used unless they are known to contain no error, or have been corrected. These rules, as stated, concern only schools governed by Catholic school boards; but they contain some hints which may be applied to our public schools.

§ 3. The local Ordinaries also have the right to approve the teachers and text-books of religion and to demand that teachers or books that offend against faith and morals, be removed.

The underlying principle is always the same: the teaching of religion belongs to the Church, and the State cannot usurp it without infringing upon a divine right.

30 Coll. P. F., n. 2093.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SCHOOL INSPECTION BY THE LOCAL ORDINARIES

CAN. 1382

Ordinarii locorum sive ipsi per se sive per alios possunt quoque scholas quaslibet, oratoria, recreatoria, patronatus, etc., in iis quae religiosam et moralem institutionem spectant, visitare; a qua visitatione quorumlibet religiosorum scholae exemptae non sunt, nisi agatur de scholis internis pro professis religionis exemptae.

The local Ordinaries are entitled, either personally or through a delegate, to inspect any school, oratory, asylum,[31] orphanage, etc., in all things concerning religious and moral education. This right of inspection includes the schools of religious with the sole exception of purely internal schools intended for the members of exempt religious institutes.

The Council of Trent vindicated to the bishops the right of visiting all hospitals, colleges, and religious or charitable institutions, except those placed under royal protection.[32] No appeal was or is allowed from this law,[33] but our text, because it concerns schools only, restricts this right of visitation to moral and religious instruction. Our canon covers all schools, elementary, secondary, academic and collegiate, all faculties and universities; none may claim exemption, for the text says: "quaslibet scholas." The reason is because the bishops are the judges in all matters of faith and morals. Theirs is a doctrinal superintendence which they cannot divide with the civil government.

31 Recreatoria, from the Italian ricreatori, means asylums for the poor or the aged; also conservatories for boys and girls; patronatus is generally understood of orphanages, but it may also mean any institution of advowson.

32 Sess. 22, c. 8, De Ref.

33 Bened. XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Universities which are under the immediate protection of the Holy See, cannot be canonically visited by bishops, but only by the Sovereign Pontiff or his legitimate representative.[34]

The domestic or internal schools of exempt religious, established for the sole use of professed members, are not subject to episcopal visitation; but all other schools, as well as orphanages,[35] colleges and faculties conducted by these religious, including the scholasticate, may be inspected by the local Ordinary in the points mentioned, and none other.[36]

CAN. 1383

In religiosa alumnorum alicuius collegii institutione servetur praescriptum can. 891.

In regard to the religious training of college students, can. 1383 recalls the rule laid down in can. 891, namely, that the rector should not habitually hear the confessions of the students.

34 S. C. C., Aug. 1, Sept. 1, 1888 (A. S. S., XI, 674 ff.).

35 S. C. EE. et RR., May 14, 1872 (Coll. P. F., n. 1386).

36 Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXIII

THE CENSORSHIP AND PROHIBITION OF BOOKS

RIGHT OF THE CHURCH

CAN. 1384

§ 1. Ecclesiae est ius exigendi ne libros, quos ipsa iudicio suo antea non recognoverit, fideles edant, et a quibusvis editos ex iusta causa prohibendi.

§ 2. Quae sub hoc titulo de libris praescribuntur, publicationibus diariis, periodicis et aliis editis scriptis quibuslibet applicentur, nisi aliud constet.

The Church has the right to demand that the faithful shall not publish books which she has not previously approved by her judgment; she also has the right to forbid for a just reason books published by whomsoever.

The first refers to preventive censorship (praevia librorum censura) which touches Catholics only; whereas the second vindicates to the Church the right of prohibiting any and all books which she considers objectionable. The wording of the former clause is rather broad, for it would seem to include all kinds of books, even such on mathematics, agriculture, etc. However this law must be understood in the light of, and by comparison with, the canons of chapter 1, infra.

The text says that the Church has the right to censor and forbid books. As to previous censorship there can be no doubt, because the faithful, as well as the matter itself, are subject to the authority of the Church, to whom all Catholics owe obedience in whatever refers to their salvation. Nevertheless the censorship has often been made the target of violent attacks. These attacks are unfounded. Paternal as well as political authorities have the natural right to ward off anything that may endanger the moral and physical welfare of their subjects, and to protect them against bad surroundings, company, literature, etc., in fact anything that is apt to cause insubordination, anarchy, or moral decay. The Church, being an autonomous society, with subjects for whom she is responsible within her own sphere cannot be destitute of the authority and power which enables her to keep her children uncontaminated and to safeguard them against the danger of perversion. Of all the dangers that imperil man's salvation bad literature is perhaps the most destructive. Hence the right to control the reading of her children cannot be denied the Church even from the purely natural point of vantage. Historical facts amply confirm the necessity of preventive censorship in Church and State.[1]

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Church, by divine right, is the guardian and teacher of faith and morals, the shepherd who must lead his sheep upon wholesome pasture and point out the poisonous weeds that endanger their welfare. This office requires repressive and preventive remedies which the Church is certainly allowed to apply in teaching and preserving the deposit of faith. One of these remedies is the censorship of books.[2] This has been always exercised by the Church, not indeed to the same extent and in

1 Cfr. the classical work of J. Hilgers, S. J., Der Index der verbotenen Bücher, 1904.

2 Hilgers, l. c., p. 15 ff.; see also The Ave Maria, Notre Dame, Ind., Jan. 31, 1920, pp. 148 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the same way, but in various ways and by different methods according to the exigencies of the times.[3] The Apostles frequently warned the faithful against the baneful influence of a too intimate intercourse with the enemies of Christianity either in word or writing.[4] The first express prohibition of a book is that of Arius' Thalia, which was forbidden by the Council of Nicaea (325). Then followed the lists, which look like incipient indices, of Popes Innocent I and Gelasius I, in which, besides the authentic books of the Old and New Testament, certain "apocryphal" books are enumerated.[5] Gregory the Great (590–604), Martin I (649–654), and Zachary (741–752) drew up new lists, and the practice was continued in the Middle Ages.

It goes without saying that the invention of printing called for more extensive and severer measures. Innocent VIII, Alexander VI, and Leo X commanded printers to submit all books to be printed to the ecclesiastical authorities for approval. An index of forbidden books in the modern sense of the word was that of Paul IV, published in 1559. It was followed by that of 1571, under the pontificate of St. Pius V, and others, which later were made superfluous by the more comprehensive index issued in 1758. This, together with the Constitution "Sollicita ac provida" of Benedict XIV (July 9, 1753) remained in force with scarcely any modification until Leo XIII issued his well-known Constitution "Officiorum ac munerum," Jan. 25, 1897.

3 Hilgers, pp. 3 ff.; Hurley, A Commentary on the Present Index Legislation, 1908, p. 23 ff.

4 I Tim. 6, 20; II Tim. 2, 16; Acts 19, 19.

5 Innocent I, Ep. 6, ad Excep., c. 7 (Migne P. L., 20, 501 f.); Gelasius' decree, see in c. 3, Dist. 16; the authenticity has given rise to doubts (Zahn, Geschichte des Neutestam. Kanons, 1890, II, i, 259 f.), which, however, are not borne out by solid critical research.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This constitution, as such, is now superseded by the Code insofar as it does not agree with the latter. At the same time it is well to remember that the wording, and sometimes even the substance, of the old law will assist us in determining the nature and extension of the new rules.[6]

§ 2 extends the meaning of the term books so as to include newspapers and other periodical publications as well as all other published writings, unless the contrary is manifest.[7]

Strictly speaking a book is a volume[8] consisting of a number of sheets of paper, now-a-days generally printed, and either bound or stitched together, which treats of one subject in a more or less coherent and systematic manner. It is generally held that a book must have some bulk (aliqua moles), that is, it should have at least 160 pages. Our text as well as the Constitution of Leo XIII draw a distinction between books and leaflets, etc. The unitas objecti is an essential feature of a book. Magazines, as a rule, do not treat of only one subject and hence, even if they are bound, do not constitute a book in the technical sense. But if a treatise is published in loose numbers (fasciculi), so as to form one whole, the term "book" applies to it. As to the manner of publication it must be observed that now-a-days by book we generally mean a printed volume, when we use the term without any further attribute. But a book need not necessarily be printed to be a book, else the manuscript treatises published before 1600 could not have been prohibited as books. Our text quite consistently applies the general

6 Hurley, l. c., p. 51.

7 This is a decidedly new regulation for which Card. Gasparri could give no quotation.

8 Noldin, Theol. Moralis, Vol. II, 1914, n. 701, p. 726 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prohibition to all writings, no matter how published, so they be but published, i. e., made accessible to all. As long as a manuscript or book remains the exclusive private property of the author, it cannot be called editus. A printer is not eo ipso a publisher (editor). An author may write a book for his own pleasure and have it printed; as long as he keeps it entirely to himself, it is not "published."

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

PREVIOUS CENSORSHIP

Previous censorship consists in the submission of a book to the proper authority for inspection, examination, and approval (or rejection). The law binds the author as well as the publisher, placing both under the obligation of submitting an intended publication to the proper authority. If the imprimatur, or permission to have the book published, is given, this means not an approval of its contents, but only the judgment of the respective authority that the book may, under present circumstances, be read without detriment to faith or morals.[1]

CAN. 1385

§ 1. Nisi censura ecclesiastica praecesserit, ne edantur etiam a laicis:

1.° Libri sacrarum Scripturarum vel eorundem adnotationes et commentaria;

2.° Libri qui divinas Scripturas, sacram theologiam, historiam ecclesiasticam, ius canonicum, theologiam naturalem, ethicen aliasve huiusmodi religiosas ac morales disciplinas spectant; libri ac libelli precum, devotionis vel doctrinae institutionisque religiosae, moralis, asceticae, mysticae aliique huiusmodi, quamvis ad fovendam pietatem conducere videantur; ac generaliter scripta in quibus aliquid sit quod religionis ac morum honestatis peculiariter intersit;

1 Noldin, l. c., n. 708, p. 734.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:36 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Imagines sacrae quovis modo imprimendae, sive preces adiunctas habeant, sive sine illis edantur.

§ 2. Licentiam edendi libros et imagines de quibus in § 1, dare potest vel loci Ordinarius proprius auctoris, vel Ordinarius loci in quo libri vel imagines publici iuris fiant, vel Ordinarius loci in quo imprimantur, ita tamen ut, si quis ex iis Ordinariis licentiam denegaverit, eam ab alio Ordinario petere auctor nequeat, nisi eundem certiorem fecerit de denegata ab alio licentia.

§ 3. Religiosi vero licentiam quoque sui Superioris maioris antea consequi debent.

This canon first lays down a general rule as to what books must be submitted to ecclesiastical censorship, and then designates the authority competent to grant the imprimatur.

§ 1. The following books, even though published by laymen, must be submitted to ecclesiastical censure:

1.° The Books of Holy Writ and annotations to and commentaries on the same.

Hence the original text of each and every one of the forty-five books of the Old Testament and the twenty-eight books of the New Testament must be submitted to ecclesiastical censorship. Also parts of the same (pericopes) and translations or versions, whether old or new. Old versions are the Latin Vulgate as well as the Itala, the Oriental versions of the Septuagint, the Syriac, Coptic, and Armenian. New versions are those made into modern languages. These translations must be submitted, even if only parts or pericopes are to be published, for instance, the Epistles and Gospels for Sundays and holy days. For the text simply says "libri sacrarum Scripturarum," and can. 1384, § 2 finds its application here.

Adnotationes are short explanations or glosses, either

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

continuous or partial, such as were made on single words between the lines or in the margin, and are now generally placed at the foot of the page (foot-notes). It does not matter whether these notes are printed separately from, or together with, the text, whether they are original or translated, as our canon simply says, vel. Nor are foot-notes on the pericopes exempt from this law.

Commentaries are treatises in the form of annotations or explanations of the books of the Old and New Testament, altogether or severally. What was said concerning annotations also holds with regard to commentaries.

2.° The second paragraph of § 1 mentions three classes of books as subject to ecclesiastical censorship, namely, scientific, devotional, and general, especially,

(a) Books treating of Holy Scripture, sacred theology, Church history, Canon Law, theodicy, ethics, and other religious and moral disciplines.

"Books on Holy Scripture" here means the treatises called introductions, not works of exegesis proper, for the latter, being in the nature of a commentary, falls under no. 1. Introduction includes hermeneutics and "higher criticism," so-called.[2]

"Sacred theology" embraces treatises on dogmatic as well as moral theology, either single tracts, or the whole, written in any language, and published in any form.

"Church history," which is the scientific knowledge of the internal and external development of the Society founded by Jesus Christ, may be written as chronicles or in the form of general accounts, biographies, monographs, etc. It is true that the Church is distinct from the individuals that compose it,[3] but if any individual, for instance, St. Augustine,[4] is treated as the representative of a period

2 Pius X, "Lamentabili," July 4, 1904, prop. 1.

3 Hurley, l. c., p. 209.

4 See Von Hertling's Augustinus

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or school of thought, the biography becomes part and parcel of ecclesiastical history. Therefore such a book must be submitted to censorship. The law does not, however, apply to purely secular or political history. The scope, then, or purpose of a book marks the dividing line.

As to Canon Law, we all know that this is a distinctly ecclesiastical discipline.

Natural Theology, or Theodicy is that part of philosophy which treats of God and His relations to His creatures from the standpoint of reason unaided by Revelation.

Ethics or moral philosophy, has for its object the moral rectitude of human acts in accordance with the ultimate principles of reason. To this discipline belong books on sociology, unless they are written from the merely economical or political viewpoint.

It would be difficult to explain the phrase, "other such religious or moral disciplines," since the sciences expressly mentioned seem to exhaust the subject. Treatises on Spiritism, hypnotism, astrology (formerly also alchemy) must find a place here because they usually touch religion and morals.

(b) Liable to censorship are furthermore: large and small prayer-books and devotional, catechetical, moral, ascetical, mystical, and the like books and pamplets, even though they seem to foster piety. To this class belong Bible histories, missals with vernacular translation, catechisms, lives of Saints, the Imitation of Christ, and similar books.[5] Of a mystic character are "The City of God"

("Weltgeschichte in Karakterbildern") Mainz, 1902, without episcopal imprimatur.

[5] S. C. P. F., Jan. 3, 1777 (Coll. n. 519); S. Rit. C., Aug. 4, 1877 (Dec. Auth., n. 3427); also the translations of the Officium Parvum B. M. V.; S. Rit. C., April 24, 1896, ad 1 (n. 3827).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by Mary of Agreda, the writings of Anne Catherine Emmerich, St. Catharine of Genoa, and others. Devotion is not always piety and devotional writings require particular vigilance. We may also place in this class all prophesies, private revelations, visions, etc., as well as new devotions of every kind.

(c) The law finally subjects to ecclesiastical censorship "all writings which contain anything that particularly concerns religion and morals." No distinction is made between books, but all are comprised that deal in any way with religion or morality. The phrase "peculiariter intersit" must be referred to the manner in which the subject is treated. "Peculiariter" is opposed to "obiter" or "perfunctorie." The manner of treatment must be measured by the length of the article or treatise. A long treatise would not savor peculiarly of religion or morality, if it contained only one or the other sentence bearing on those subjects.

A question has been raised regarding so-called temperance leaflets.[6] We will state our opinion fairly and squarely. If these leaflets advocate absolute prohibition, they should be forbidden, for prohibition is opposed to the natural law and clearly touches ethics. If they are merely intended to promote temperance, such leaflets come under the category of moral writings, because temperance is one of the four cardinal virtues which in the natural order belong to ethics, and in the supernatural order, to moral theology. From every viewpoint, therefore, these leaflets are subject to the censorship of the Church.

3.° Sacred images, no matter how printed, and whether with or without prayers, fall under ecclesiastical censor-

6 Cfr. Hurley, l. c., p. 214 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:37 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ship. It is evident that only stamped or printed images are intended here, because the text refers only to books or things published in the form of printed matter. But of these all kinds, new and old,[7] are included,— engravings, photographs, chromos, lithographs, etc., etc. Not included are oil or water-colors and statues. If an image belong to the class of printed matter, it is immaterial how customary or unusual it be; for here not the insolita imago of can. 1279 is intended, but the image as such, provided, of course, it be sacred. Sacred images are all representations of the Blessed Trinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ, of the Blessed Virgin, of the Angels, Saints, and Blessed. Also images which represent a religious mystery, or a sacred scene, or groups of biblical events, or emblems representative of mysteries. The text says it matters not whether such images are printed with or without prayers. If a prayer is added, either at the bottom or on the back, the picture also falls under no. 2 of our canon.

§ 2 and § 3. The permission to publish books and images mentioned in § 1 may be granted by the local Ordinary of the author, or by the local Ordinary of the place of publication, or, finally, by the local Ordinary of the place where the books, etc., are printed. However, if any one of these Ordinaries refuses the imprimatur, the author is not allowed to ask it of another, unless the latter has been informed of the refusal.

Religious must obtain the permission of their superiors before applying for the episcopal imprimatur.

7 The text does not contain the adjective "novae" found in the "Officiorum ac munerum," n. 15; hence Vermeersch's view that new designs only must be submitted (Comm., n. 20), no longer holds. Not included are medals, because these are not printed, but struck; see Vermeersch, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Our text is wider than that of the Leonine constitution [8] in admitting three Ordinaries as competent to give the imprimatur. It is also more liberal in regard to Bible editions, as will be seen under can. 1391. The local Ordinary of course is the bishop or the vicar-general, or whoever goes by that name. Since superiors of exempt religious are not local Ordinaries in the meaning of the Code, it would be evident, even if it were not mentioned in § 3, that such religious are not exempt from the obligation of asking the imprimatur of the diocesan bishop; but they may do so through their publisher or printer.

If the local Ordinary himself wishes to publish a book, he needs no imprimatur, even though the book were printed and published outside of his diocese.[9] The reason is that the author's Ordinary may give the imprimatur, who, in our case, is the author himself.

Which of the three Ordinaries mentioned should be asked to give the imprimatur is left to the judgment of the author. But in order to prevent deception and to uphold ecclesiastical authority, it is required that in case one of the three Ordinaries has refused the imprimatur, this fact must be stated to the other who is asked for the imprimatur. The latter will probably demand the reasons for the refusal either from the refusing Ordinary or from the author.

Religious, exempt as well as non-exempt, also need the permission of their superiors, who ought to subject every book that is to be published to an examination by competent scholars.[10]

8 "Officiorum ac munerum," nn. 7, 35.

9 Formerly, as Noldin states (l. c., n. 710), an Ordinary needed the imprimatur of another Ordinary if his book was published outside his own diocese.

10 Trid., Sess. 4, De Editione et Usu SS. Librorum; the superiors may abide by the verdict of the censors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Whether rule 37 of the "Officiorum ac munerum" still holds, may well be doubted. This rule prescribed that if an author residing in Rome wished to have a book printed elsewhere than in the City, he needed only the approval of the Cardinal Vicar and the Master of the Sacred Palace. This rule rather restricts liberty and is not in accord with § 2 of can. 1385. Therefore we hardly believe that one would be obliged to abide by it, unless a local custom or written particular law would be superadded to said § 2.

OBLIGATIONS OF CLERICS AND LAYMEN

CAN. 1386

§ 1. Vetantur clerici saeculares sine consensu suorum Ordinariorum, religiosi vero sine licentia sui Superioris maioris et Ordinarii loci, libros quoque, qui de rebus profanis tractent, edere, et in diariis, foliis vel libellis periodicis scribere vel eadem moderari.

§ 2. In diariis vero, foliis vel libellis periodicis qui religionem catholicam aut bonos mores impetere solent, nec laici catholici quidpiam conscribant, nisi iusta ac rationabili causa suadente, ab Ordinario loci probata.

§ 1. The secular clergy without the consent of their Ordinary, and religious without the permission of their higher superior and of the local Ordinary, are forbidden to publish books on secular subjects and to write for newspapers or other periodicals, publications, or to act as editors of such. The consent of the Ordinary is here clearly distinct from censorship proper, which requires a scientific examination, whereas the consent only means a judgment connected with the manifestation of an act of the will. However this does not take away from the bishop the right of demanding specimen copies of a publication or the title thereof; nor does it prevent the bishop from refusing his consent if he thinks the author or editor incapable of treating the subject correctly and creditably.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This consent is required even for literary products of a purely worldly or technical character, no science or topic being excepted.[11] The reason is given in the above-mentioned Constitution of Leo XIII, to wit, "to give an example of ready obedience." Prompt submission is also required in two other cases; viz.: when clerics wish to contribute to periodic publications or if they desire to act as managers or editors of such publications as diaria, folia, libelli periodici. Diaria are newspapers, daily, weekly, or biweekly. Folia are publications published more or less irregularly, of undetermined size or number of pages, be they leaflets or brochures. Libelli periodici are quarterly, monthly, fortnightly, weekly, etc., magazines or reviews.

To write for such publications, therefore, the secular clergy need the permission of the bishop to whom they are subject, regardless of where the paper or magazine is printed or published. For the text simply says, "suorum," which refers to the clergy, not to the publication. If we say, "to whom they are subject," we mean habitually or legally, by virtue of incardination. Therefore a clergyman on his vacation, who wishes to contribute to a periodical publication, must obtain permission from his own bishop, not from the Ordinary in whose diocese he is sojourning.[12]

11 S. C. pro Negot. Eccl. Extraord., June 27, 1902, n. 3 (Anal. Eccl., X, 73).

12 The local Ordinary of religious is the bishop in whose diocese their house is located; but we believe that

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:38 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The question naturally arises whether clergymen and religious need the simple or double permission for each and every article they contribute to any periodic publication. From former legislation it would seem that regular correspondence or contributions are intended. Such at least is the tenor of the "Sacrorum Antistitum," of Sept. 1, 1910, from which our text is evidently taken: "Ad sacerdotes quod attinet, qui correspondentium vel collaboratorum nomine vulgo veniunt, etc." We would not press the term "scribere" in our text, though this, too, would seem to involve habitual writing. Hence we hardly believe that a brief occasional article would need episcopal consent. To say that the publication of a notice of a church festival, or parish event, or funeral required the special consent of the Ordinary or religious superior, would render the law ridiculous. On the other hand, a treatise or an elaborate article on any important subject, especially if it touches faith and morals, or ecclesiastical discipline, no doubt falls under the law. Also any important manuscript which religious would like to publish. Nor may religious with either simple or solemn vows publish their writings anonymously or under an assumed name, even with the local Ordinary's permission, if their superior has refused to give his imprimatur.[13]

It may be added that female religious, too, must abide by this law.

"Eadem moderari," to direct or manage periodical publications, also requires a double permission for religious, and the permission of the ordinary for secular clerics. This prohibition concerns the management or directorship of all newspapers, pamphlets, and periodicals without ex-the local Ordinary of any diocese in which a religious lives for some time, may give the required permission, especially in the case of exempt religious.

13 Hurley, l. c., p. 228.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ception. The canon here is somewhat stricter, at least in its wording, than the old law, but more logical and consistent.

Are college papers included? The text does not make a distinction, and hence they, too, need the permission of the local Ordinary in whose diocese the board of managers live, and of the religious superior, if religious are on the board of directors. But if lay students constitute the board, they need no permission from the local Ordinary. Female religious, however, do, no matter how pious the title of their magazine may sound.

What if the Ordinary refuses to consent to the publication of a book treating of secular matters only? In that case the author would do well to abide by the bishop's decision, provided there is no reason to assume personal spite. He may, however, demand the reason of the refusal. For although the Holy Office does not need to state its reasons, this prerogative cannot be extended to the bishops, and the S. Congregation of the Index decided that bishops must give their reasons for refusing the imprimatur in case a book is susceptible to correction.[14]

The author has another expedient, namely that offered in can. 1385, § 2; which allows him to seek another publisher or printer. In doing so an author would only be claiming a natural right.

§ 2. Not even Catholic laymen — much less clergymen and religious — may write for newspapers, pamphlets or other periodical publications which are accustomed to at-

14 S. C. Ind., Sept. 3, 1898, quoted by Hurley, who, in a circuitous way, concludes that the bishop is not bound to state the reasons (l. c., p. 200, 224 f.); if he is bound to give his reasons in matters of faith and morals, he is surely also obliged to state his reasons for refusing to permit the publication of books of a profane nature; the contrary opinion is frivolous and unworthy of the episcopal office.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tack the Catholic faith or good morals. An exception to this rule may be made only for a just and valid reason, acknowledged to be such by the local Ordinary.

The publications to which even Catholic laymen should not contribute by way of correspondence or collaboration have been named above. Here a special class is singled out which is distinguished by its wicked purpose, i. e., those which habitually attack the Catholic faith or good morals. Is our so-called yellow press included in this class of publications? It would be difficult to give a positive answer to this question. For we cannot say that they make it a practice to attack the Catholic faith, though, on the other hand, their scandalous reports on suicides, divorces, etc., are anything but favorable to good morals. Yet as these reports are not strictly attacks on morality, the solution depends on the general tendency of these publications. We think it must be admitted that regular contributions from Catholic pens might promote the sale of an objectionable paper and thereby further religious indifferentism. The law expressly permits extraordinary or occasional contributions for solid reasons. Thus, for instance, if a prelate or prominent priest is interviewed on an important public question, it might be permissible, nay even desirable, that he explain the Catholic position. Again a correction, or the defence of Catholic teaching against an attack might prove useful for the reason that it would reach parties which a Catholic paper could not reach.

VARIOUS EXCEPTIONS

CAN. 1387

Quae ad causas beatificationum et canonizationum Servorum Dei quoquo modo pertinent, sine licentia Sacrorum Rituum Congregationis edi nequeunt.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1388

§ 1. Indulgentiarum libri omnes, summaria, libelli, folia, etc., in quibus earum concessiones continentur, ne edantur sine licentia Ordinarii loci.

§ 2. Requiritur vero expressa licentia Sedis Apostolicae ut typis edere liceat, quovis idiomate, tum collectionem authenticam precum piorumque operum quibus Sedes Apostolica indulgentias annexuit, tum elenchum indulgentiarum apostolicarum, tum summarium indulgentiarum vel antea collectum, sed nunquam approbatum, vel nunc primum ex diversis concessionibus colligendum.

CAN. 1389

Collectiones decretorum Romanarum Congregationum rursus edi nequeunt, nisi impetrata prius licentia et servatis conditionibus a Moderatoribus uniuscuiusque Congregationis praescriptis.

CAN. 1390

In edendis libris liturgicis eorumque partibus, itemque litaniis a Sancta Sede approbatis, debet de concordantia cum editionibus approbatis constare ex attestatione Ordinarii loci in quo imprimuntur aut publici iuris fiunt.

Matters pertaining to the canonization and beatification of servants of God may not be published without the permission of the S. Congregation of Rites. Urban VIII already ordered that the lives, deeds, and miracles of the venerable servants of God should not be published without the approval of the Ordinary, who had to report each case to the Apostolic See, i. e., the S. Congregation of Rites, in order that frauds, mistakes, and novelties might be avoided.[15]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:39 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1388 refers to books, summaries, booklets, leaflets, etc., containing grants of indulgences. These may not be published without the permission of the local Ordinary. The express permission of the Holy See is required for publishing, in any language, authentic collections of prayers and good works enriched with indulgences by the Apostolic See. The same express permission is required for publishing lists of papal indulgences, and summaries of indulgences, either already collected but not yet approved, or to be made from various grants. Concerning this we refer to can. 919, § 2.

Can. 1389 demands the permission of the respective officials for the republication of collections of the various Roman Congregations. If such permission is granted, the conditions laid down by the heads of the respective congregations must be faithfully complied with. What those conditions are is not explicitly stated. One of them is that the original text must be reproduced ad literam. Another one undoubtedly will be that a copy of the reprint shall be forwarded to the Cardinal Prefect or Secretary of the respective Congregation, provided permission for republication is given.

Notice the phrase, "rursus edi"; it supposes that a collection has already been made and published, as those of the S. Rit. C. and the Propaganda.

Can. 1390 concerns the publication of liturgical books, or parts thereof, and litanies approved by the Holy See. Reprints of these must agree with the approved text, and the Ordinary of the place where they are printed or published must testify to such conformity. Of this enough has been said under canons 1257, 1259, and 1264.

15 "Coelestis Hierusalem," July 5, 1634, § 1; S. Rit. C., July 31, 1821 (n. 2617).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

BIBLE VERSIONS

CAN. 1391

Versiones sacrarum Scripturarum in linguam vernaculam typis imprimi nequeunt, nisi sint a Sede Apostolica probatae, aut nisi edantur sub vigilantia Episcoporum et cum adnotationibus praecipue excerptis ex sanctis Ecclesiae Patribus atque ex doctis catholicisque scriptoribus.

Translations of Holy Scripture into the vernacular may not be printed, unless they are approved by the Apostolic See or published under the supervision of the bishops, and are provided with notes taken chiefly from the Holy Fathers and learned and orthodox writers.

By Holy Scripture here is understood the text of the Old and New Testament. The plural seems to indicate that parts of Holy Writ are also intended. Hence even a portion of the Old Testament, say the Law, the Prophets and Ketubim, separately taken, fall under this rule; also the Gospels and the Epistles of St. Paul, when translated into the vernacular. Old versions, like the Syriac and Latin, which cannot be called vernacular in the proper sense, are excluded. But Arabic, English, French, German, Indian, Italian, Spanish, and the modern Slavic languages, also Chinese and Japanese, are vernacular, and translations of the Bible or any part thereof into any of these languages fall under the present canon, no matter whether the translators are Catholics or non-Catholics.

The approving authority is twofold: the Apostolic See and the bishop, the latter under certain conditions only.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(a) The Holy See may approve any versions with or without notes; it may even — which is, however, not likely to occur — approve translations made by non-Catholics;

(b) The bishop may approve any translation made under his supervision. "Vigilantia episcoporum" here has a special meaning, namely, that the translation must be carefully compared with the original text approved by the Church, or, at least, must substantially agree with a translation already approved.

Of course, a difficulty may arise from the fact that, with the exception of the Latin Vulgate, there is no approved original text,— the Greek text, and much more so the Hebrew-Massoretic text, being subject to many variants. The episcopal censor, therefore, had better keep to the Latin text, but he may make use of the original in doubtful cases. The translator as well as the censor must keep in mind the following canon, 1392.

But supervision is not enough; notes are also required. These notes should be taken from two sources, the writings of the Fathers and learned Catholic authors. The period of the "Fathers," as is generally assumed, ends with the death of Isidore of Seville, A. D. 636. After that time we speak of Catholic writers. The prescribed annotations may be taken from the original works of the "Fathers" or from the current "Catenae," so they be but genuine. The Catholic authors here intended are not only those of the Scholastic period, but also of modern times, provided only they be really Catholic and learned. Purely mystic or devotional writings, where the allegorical sense of the text is unduly emphasized, should be entirely discarded, or at least used sparingly.

Our text employs a term which is not to be found in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Pope Leo's Constitution; it is the word praecipue, signifying that the notes should be taken chiefly from Catholic authors. This seems to imply that non-Catholic writers need not be entirely neglected. The historical and archaeological explanations and the critical readings of non-Catholic scholars may therefore find a place in the translations approved by the bishops.

WHEN A NEW APPROBATION IS DEMANDED

CAN. 1392

§ 1. Approbatio textus originalis alicuius operis, neque eiusdem in aliam linguam translationibus neque aliis editionibus suffragatur; quare et translationes et novae editiones operis approbati nova approbatione communiri debent.

§ 2. Excerpta e periodicis capita seorsim edita novae editiones non censentur nec proinde nova approbatione indigent.

§ 1. The approbation of the original text of a work does not imply approbation of translations into other languages or of new editions; therefore translations as well as new editions of a work already approved need a new approbation. Thus, for instance, a translation of the Little Office of the B. M. V. into the vernacular needs a new approbation every time it is republished. The Ordinary may grant this approbation if the text agrees with that approved by the Church, which agreement is left to the conscientious judgment of the bishop[16] to determine. The same rule applies to translations of the Roman Missal.[17]

16 S. Rit. C., Sept. 4, 1875 (n. 3373).

17 S. Rit. C., Aug. 4, 1877 (n. 3427).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

One remark must, however, be added. Our text speaks of editions and translations. From this it must be concluded that mere reprints, either phototyped or lineotyped, accurately reproduced, require no new approbation. For it is evident that the purpose of the law is to prevent fraud or corruption of the original text.

§ 2. Extracts or excerpts from periodicals, published separately, are not new editions and therefore require no new approbation.[18] If these so-called reprints (in French tirages à part) cover a series of articles and develop into a book and are published in book form, do they require ecclesiastical approbation? We believe with Noldin[19] that they do, for the reason that the text mentions only excerpta capita, single extracts or chapters. Besides, there is always danger that such a reprinted book may contain substantial changes from the original text as published in the periodical.

Reprints of single articles, or, if the same subject was treated in two or three issues of a periodical, of several articles forming one chapter or treatise, need no new approbation.

DIOCESAN CENSORS

CAN. 1393

§ 1. In universis Curiis episcopalibus censores ex officio adsint, qui edenda cognoscant.

§ 2. Examinatores in suo obeundo officio, omni personarum acceptione deposita, tantummodo prae oculis habeant Ecclesiae dogmata et communem catholicorum doctrinam quae Conciliorum generalium decretis aut Sedis Apostolicae constitutionibus seu praescri-

18 S. C. Ind., May 23, 1898, ad 3 (Coll. P. F., n. 2000).

19 De Praeceptis, 1914, ed. 11, n. 706, p. 732 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ptionibus atque probatorum doctorum consensu continetur.

§ 3. Censores ex utroque clero eligantur aetate, eruditione, prudentia commendati, qui in doctrinis probandis improbandisque medio tutoque itinere eant.

§ 4. Censor sententiam scripto dare debet. Quae si faverit, Ordinarius potestatem edendi faciat, cui tamen praeponatur censoris iudicium, inscripto eius nomine. Extraordinariis tantum in adiunctis ac perquam raro, prudenti Ordinarii arbitrio, censoris mentio omitti poterit.

§ 5. Auctoribus censoris nomen pateat nunquam, antequam hic faventem sententiam ediderit.

These rules are chiefly taken from the Motu proprio of Pius X, "Sacrorum Antistitum," of Sept. 1, 1910, which was directed against Modernism.[20] They are:

§ 1. Every diocese must have officially appointed censors, for the examination of writings that are to be published. Ex officio means that there should be a regular censor, not merely one chosen for an emergency. The diocesan censors should be mentioned in the Catholic Directory.

§ 2. The examiners in discharging their office, should set aside all human respect and guide themselves solely by the dogmatic teaching of the Church as contained in the decrees of the general councils, in papal constitutions and decisions, and in the consent of approved doctors. This does not mean, however, that any opinion or system tolerated by the Church is to be condemned if it does not fit in with the views of the censor.

20 Of course, these rules are not entirely new, having been to a great extent, embodied in former documents like that of Clement VIII on the Index, Benedict XIV, "Sollicita ac provida," July 8, 1753, etc., see Hilgers, l. c., p. 12, p. 59 f.; p. 535 ff.; A. Ap. S., II, 661.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. The censors should be taken from both the secular and the regular clergy, and be men of mature age, distinguished by learning and prudence, who can safely keep the golden mean in approving or rejecting doctrines.

§ 4. The censor must give his verdict in writing. If the verdict is favorable, the Ordinary shall give his permission to publish (i. e., the imprimatur), which must be preceded by the censor's verdict (the "Nihil obstat") and his signature. Only in very rare cases and under extraordinary circumstances, if the Ordinary deems it prudent, may the name of the censor be omitted.

§ 5. The censor's name must not be made known to authors before he has given a favorable opinion. This rule clearly presupposes that more than one censor is appointed in each diocese, as § 1 insinuates by using the plural number (censores).

We may quote here a remark taken from the "Sacrorum antistitum," namely, that the title of censor has no juridical or canonical value and contributes no weight to the private opinion of the official entrusted with this duty. Therefore if the censor makes a mistake the author has no guaranty in the "Nihil obstat" that his book will not be put on the index.

THE IMPRIMATUR MUST BE GIVEN IN WRITING

CAN. 1394

§ 1. Licentia, qua Ordinarius potestatem edendi facit, in scriptis concedatur, in principio aut in fine libri, folii vel imaginis imprimenda, expresso nomine concedentis itemque loco et tempore concessionis.

§ 2. Si vero licentia deneganda videatur, roganti auctori, nisi gravis causa aliud exigat, rationes indicentur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. The imprimatur should be given in writing and be placed either in the beginning or at the end of the book, leaflet or image, together with the name of the grantor, and the place and date of the grant. It is strongly advisable to print the year of publication on the title page,— a practice which is neglected by some, especially English, publishers.

§ 2. If the imprimatur is denied, the reasons should be given to the author upon demand, unless a weighty motive counsels the contrary. (See can. 1386.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE PROHIBITION OF BOOKS

Whilst previous censorship chiefly affects authors, and the faithful at large only indirectly, this second chapter is directly intended to safeguard the faith and morals of all Christians. We purposely say all Christians, not merely Catholics, because morality is something universal and common to all who believe in Christ. Of course, the legislator does not concern himself with those outside the Church; but Christians of all denominations ought to be grateful for this directive norm, which, as law, binds all Catholics. The censorship with which we now deal is called repressiva, because it aims at suppressing bad literature.[1]

WHO HAS THE POWER TO FORBID BOOKS

CAN. 1395

§ 1. Ius et officium libros ex iusta causa prohibendi competit non solum supremae auctoritati ecclesiasticae pro universa Ecclesia, sed pro suis subditis Conciliis quoque particularibus et locorum Ordinariis.

§ 2. Ab hac prohibitione datur ad Sanctam Sedem recursus, non tamen in suspensivo.

3. Etiam Abbas monasterii sui iuris et supremus religionis clericalis exemptae Moderator, cum suo Capitulo vel Consilio, potest libros ex iusta causa suis subditis prohibere; idemque, si periculum sit in mora, possunt alii Superiores maiores cum proprio Consilio, ea tamen lege ut rem quantocius deferant ad supremum Moderatorem.

1 S. C. Ind., Aug. 24, 1864 (Coll. P. F., n. 1264).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 1. The right and duty to forbid books for a just cause belongs to the supreme ecclesiastical authority for the whole Church, and to particular councils and local Ordinaries for their respective subjects.

§ 2. Recourse from this prohibition may be had to the Apostolic See, but only in devolutivo.

The act of forbidding books is an exercise of jurisdiction, part of which is the teaching office of the Church, which belongs to those who are judges in matters of faith and morals. The supreme authority of the Church exercises its influence over the entire Church, whilst the bishops exercise theirs only over those who are subject to them. Therefore the text properly says: "pro suis subditis." From this we naturally conclude that exempt religious are not juridically bound to obey the episcopal injunction, that is to say, no penalty can be pronounced against them for not observing the Ordinary's edict. Morally they may be obliged to abide by the bishop's order because of scandal or the danger of weakening the episcopal authority, especially among laymen.[2]

If a particular council forbids a book, are the exempt religious living within its jurisdiction obliged to heed that prohibition? If the council is a diocesan synod, the exempt religious are not obliged to obey, since the sole legislator is the local Ordinary, to whom they are not subject. If, however, a provincial or plenary council is understood, its decrees, we believe, are binding on the whole territory,

2 Thus Vermeersch, De Prohibitione et Censura Librorum, n. 12 (ed. 1); Noldin, De Praeceptis, ed. 11, n. 704, p. 729.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

especially if they are approved by Rome, and therefore also oblige exempt religious.[3]

§ 2 admits recourse, not appeal, to the Holy See, but such recourse has no suspensive character. Therefore the prohibition remains in force until the Apostolic See decides otherwise.

§ 3. Abbots of autonomous monasteries and the superiors general of exempt clerical institutes also may, for just reasons, forbid books to their subjects; but they must proceed together with their chapter or consultors. There is a juridical difficulty in this clause, because, as said above, the act of forbidding books rests on jurisdiction. This text is entirely new, and seems strange, as these superiors are not ordinarily considered to be judges in matters of faith.[4] Yet it is only the logical consequence of § 1, because the local Ordinaries have no jurisdiction over exempt religious. Therefore the reason advanced by the S. C. of the Index for extending the authority to forbid books to local Ordinaries and delegates of the Apostolic See — which extension is now antiquated — may be here applied. The "pravorum librorum colluvies," the flood of perverse literature which is daily increasing in volume, clearly made it imperative to act promptly and efficaciously for the protection of the faithful, and this could be accomplished only by instructing the domestic authorities to stop the danger at the very beginning and, as it were, on the spot.[5]

Whether the chapter or the counsellors have a decisive, or merely an advisory vote, is not explicitly stated in the 3 This seems to follow from can. 291, § 2, because such decrees would affect also religious, and we hardly believe that exemption could be claimed in this case, although we readily grant that can. 291, § 2 only mentions territorial, not personal, obligation.

4 Can. 501, § 2.

5 S. C. Ind., Aug. 24, 1864 (Coll. P. F., n. 1261).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

text. This would seem to be a matter for the Constitutions to decide. To us it appears that a decisive vote is intended, to be given at the regular meeting, for the matter is of great importance. If there is a regular chapter, such as an independent monastery generally has, it is not enough that the abbot call the consultors; he must convene the chapter. Capitulum refers to the abbot of an autonomous monastery, consilium to the superior general.

The text continues: "If delay should be dangerous, the other higher superiors may, with the coöperation of their counsellors, also forbid books, but they are obliged to report the matter immediately to the superior general." The alii superiores maiores here intended are the provincials, etc., as explained under can. 488, n. 8. However, note the difference between the first and the second clause. The sentence of the abbots and superiors general is final and no further report is required, whereas that of inferior superiors is only provisional and requires the sanction of the superior general.

The reader may perhaps inquire whether the second clause applies to female congregations. No, because they lack a fundamental condition, viz., jurisdiction. But we do not mean to say that a superioress would not be entitled to forbid a book to one of her religious, for this would be an exercise of domestic authority. But she could not forbid it to all as dangerous to faith and morals. Her prohibition would be a merely precautionary measure, and she would have to act according to can. 1397, § 1.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

BOOKS FORBIDDEN BY THE APOSTOLIC SEE

CAN. 1396

Libri ab Apostolica Sede damnati ubique locorum et in quodcunque vertantur idioma prohibiti censeantur.

Books condemned by the Apostolic See must be considered as forbidden everywhere and in whatsoever language they may be translated.

The term "Apostolic See" comprises the Sovereign Pontiff as well as the S. Congregations, especially those directly concerned with the proscription of books.

(a) The Pope himself may forbid a book either by an "Apostolic letter," or without such a letter. There are on record four examples of books forbidden by Apostolic letter and without the coöperation of any congregation.[6]

(b) The Holy Office has issued about 900 decrees forbidding books from 1600 to 1900.[7] To this congregation our Code (can. 247, § 4) has affiliated the famous Congregation of the Index, which has the special duty of examining and prohibiting books.

(c) Other Congregations whose decrees figure in the new Index are that of S. Rites and that of Indulgences (the latter now incorporated with the S. Poenitentiaria). Besides, all other S. Congregations may take cognizance of and condemn books having special reference to their respective departments.[8]

As to the authority of the decisions rendered in regard to books the following may safely be stated:

The decisions given either by the Pope himself, or by 6 Cfr. Hilgers, l. c., p. 89; Genovesi, Langeois des Chatellier, De Potter, Siegwart Müller.

7 Ibid., p. 88.

8 Ibid., p. 89.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a congregation of the Roman Court do not, per se, contain a dogmatic or an ex cathedra definition, i. e., an infallible verdict as to the doctrine defended or proposed in the forbidden book. It goes without saying that the Pope may issue a decree condemning a book with infallible authority, but in that case his intention must be apparent from the wording of the decree. The Thursday sessions of the Holy Office, on account of the personal presence of the Sovereign Pontiff, are regarded as more weighty than the others; but even the decrees issued at these sessions cannot be called infallible or irreformable.[9]

It need not be added that these decisions must be received with the greatest respect and obedience and with internal as well as external submission.

Our canon says that the books condemned by the Apostolic See must be considered forbidden everywhere. The reason is because the Holy See is the supreme tribunal in matters of faith and morals. Books of purely local interest usually are left to the local Ordinaries. This also explains why translations of forbidden books are also forbidden, for the difference of language is merely accidental. The poison is the same, although the channel may differ.

THE OBLIGATION OF DENOUNCING BOOKS

CAN. 1397

§ 1. Omnium fidelium est, maxime clericorum et in dignitate ecclesiastica constitutorum eorumque qui doctrina praecellant, libros quos perniciosos iudicaverint, ad locorum Ordinarios aut ad Apostolicam Sedem deferre; id autem peculiari titulo pertinet ad Legatos

[9] Ibid., p. 74 f.; p. 88.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Sanctae Sedis, locorum Ordinarios, atque Rectores Universitatum catholicarum.

§ 2. Expedit ut in pravorum librorum denuntiatione non solum libri inscriptio indicetur, sed etiam, quantum fieri potest, causae exponantur cur liber prohibendus existimetur.

§ 3. Iis ad quos denuntiatio defertur, sanctum esto denuntiantium nomina secreta servare.

§ 4. Locorum Ordinarii per se aut, ubi opus fuerit, per sacerdotes idoneos vigilent in libros, qui in proprio territorio edantur aut venales prostent.

§ 5. Libros qui subtilius examen exigant vel de quibus ad salutarem effectum consequendum supremae auctoritatis sententia requiri videatur, ad Apostolicae Sedis iudicium Ordinarii deferant.

Denunciation savors of sycophancy, yet it may become an official duty. A prosecuting attorney, for instance, has to denounce crimes and criminals. Every society which cares for the observance of its laws must have custodians and guardians of the public welfare. Protestant sects promoted sycophancy by giving part of the fine imposed upon the guilty to their denouncers.[10] The Catholic Church does not hold out any material gain, but imposes a strict obligation on all concerned. However, there is a gradation of duty in regard to denouncing. Those who are bound ex officio, i. e., the official guardians and judges in matters of faith and morals, are obliged in justice to denounce transgressors. The obligation is grave, as a rule, when the matter is serious, and the damage resulting from negligence would be great. Ordinary Christians on the other hand are as a rule bound to make 10 Cfr. Hilgers, l. c. pp. 70, 270 (in "free" Switzerland denunciation flourished), p. 304 (Hungary) and elsewhere, for inst., the Netherlands.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

denunciation only when the matter is very important, as when a book causes great injury to faith and morals, or if a positive law imposes denunciation. Besides, it is evident that less educated persons are as a rule exempt from the obligation of denouncing books, unless their conscience raises an irresistible scruple, in which case they may refer the matter to the confessor. But cultured Catholics who move in the higher circles of society most certainly are bound to perform this duty. It is a natural duty enforced by positive law.[11] Hence our canon rules:

1. That it is the duty of all the faithful, especially of clergymen, ecclesiastical dignitaries and persons distinguished by learning to denounce books which they deem pernicious, to the local Ordinaries or to the Apostolic See. More especially is this duty incumbent on papal legates, local Ordinaries, and the rectors of Catholic universities. The last named organizations in the Middle Ages always were conspicuous for their zeal in maintaining orthodoxy, as is proved by their statutes, which forbade the professors as well as librarians to publish or sell manuscripts that had not been corrected and examined by the faculty.[12] Now-a-days, too, on account of the number of students as well as by reason of extensive literary acquisitions and communications, the Catholic universities are favorably situated for watching scientific productions.

2. When denouncing a book it is expedient that not only the title of the book be indicated, but also the objectionable passages be singled out which call for a prohibition. Such coöperation facilitates the work of the consultors and censors, who are usually overburdened, and, besides, guarantees the acumen and sincerity of the denouncing person.

11 Cfr. "Officiorum ac munerum," n. 27 ff.
12 Hilgers, l. c., p. 404.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. Those who receive the denunciation, i. e., usually the officials of either the Roman or the diocesan court, are strictly bound to keep the name of the denouncer secret. This is a grievous obligation, enhanced for the officials of the Sant' Uffizio by their sacred oath. The Secretary of the S. Congregation, however, is authorized to communicate to the author the objections made to his book, but he may not divulge the name of the denouncer or censor.[13]

4. The local Ordinaries, either personally, or, if necessary, through capable priests, should watch the books that are published and sold in their territory. This was the duty of the so-called vigilance commissions prescribed by Pius X against the Modernists.[14] Although the Code does not enforce this law, the Holy Office has decided that it remains in force until the Apostolic See orders differently.[15]

The members of the diocesan vigilance commission may perform their duty at regular sessions, to be held every other month, or by written communication.[16] It is clear that an effective control can be exercised only over Catholic firms, who may be deprived of their title of Catholic book-sellers if they refuse to obey episcopal orders. Even if a book has the imprimatur, but is proved to be infected with modernism, it must be withdrawn from sale or exhibition.[17] Priests, especially pastors and confessors, should watch over the reading of the faithful, particularly over circulating libraries and also public libraries. Much can be accomplished by prudent vigi-

13 Benedict XIV, "Sollicita ac provida," July 9, 1753, § 12.

14 "Sacrorum Antistitum," Sept. 1, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 664).

15 S. O., March 22, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 136).

16 S. C. Consist., Sept. 25, 1910, ad II, III (A. Ap. S., II, 740 f.).

17 "Sacrorum Antistitum," n. III (A. Ap. S., II, 660).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lance in keeping these institutions free from objectionable books.

5. Books which require a more thorough examination or call for the judgment of the supreme tribunal, should be referred to the Holy See by the Ordinaries — by all Ordinaries, not only the diocesan bishops. Sometimes the matter at issue may not be delicate or difficult, but the author's name and reputation require an emphatic and more solemn sentence, to produce the desired effect.

THE EFFECTS OF PROHIBITION

CAN. 1398

§ 1. Prohibitio librorum id efficit ut liber sine debita licentia nec edi, nec legi, nec vendi, nec retineri, nec in aliam linguam verti, nec ullo modo cum aliis communicari possit.

§ 2. Liber quoquo modo prohibitus rursus in lucem edi nequit, nisi, factis correctionibus, licentiam is dederit qui librum prohibuerat eiusve Superior vel successor.

§ 1. The prohibition of books has this effect that a forbidden book may not be published, nor read, nor kept, nor sold, nor translated into another language, nor communicated to others in any way.

The term edere (to publish) concerns the author, the editor, and the printer: the author of the book is forbidden to have it printed and published; the editor may not sell it, and the printer may not print and bind it, either personally or through others. Accessory helpers and remote coöperators are hardly affected, as otherwise there would be an indefinite number of persons included.

Reading a book means the operation by which the contents of a book are conveyed to the mind through the senses of vision or hearing. If one would employ another to read a forbidden book to him, he would certainly read it himself and would incur the penalty of the law.[18]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

To keep a book (retinere) means to possess it permanently as one's personal property or to have it in one's possession temporarily or transiently so as to be able to make free use of it. Librarians are not said to keep, but rather to guard the books entrusted to their care. The length of time is immaterial, but must amount to a somewhat protracted action, as the reduplicative particle re indicates.

Books may be sold in stores or at auction, at wholesale or retail, of which more under can. 1404.

What translations are is generally known. Here we will only observe that it does not matter whether the objectionable passages or parts of a forbidden book are omitted or explained in the translation; as long as the original text is forbidden, the translation is also forbidden, unless expressly approved.

Communicare aliis means to loan a book to others or to exchange it for another. It may also imply making the contents known to others. In this latter sense the reading of a forbidden book to others, for instance, by a teacher to his pupils, is forbidden.[19]

18 To read a book means to assimilate a considerable part thereof (Vermeersch, l. c., n. 32, n. 11); the opinion of St. Alphonsus, referred to by Noldin (l. c., n. 702, p. 728), and opposed to what we say in the text, is contrary to Reg. Iuris 72 in 6°. Of course, if one would hear some parts of a forbidden book read by mere chance, he would not fall under the law. Readers are also those who read the proofsheets of a book.

19 Under this heading as well as under that of "retaining" fall restaurants, hotels, boarding houses, etc., which keep objectionable papers and magazines and place them at the disposal of their guests. The owners of these places are certainly not allowed to keep literature which is manifestly contrary to faith and morals.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Here may be added some explanations given by the Holy Office. A book may not be read, even if the contents are not understood or the errors are not accepted. This applies also to Protestant Bible translations: they may not be read even if the missionaries, for instance, have corrected the erroneous passages.[20] Neither may a forbidden book be read or retained for a good and holy purpose.[21]

Books which are forbidden with the clause, "donec expurgentur," may not be retained until they have been corrected.[22]

§ 2. A book forbidden no matter how, may not be republished until after it has been corrected and the one who forbade it, or his superior or successor, has granted permission to republish it. Therefore, if the bishop has forbidden a book, and recourse was had to the Roman Congregation, who granted the imprimatur, the book may be published. Note also the term quoquo modo, in whatever manner forbidden. The Constitution of Leo XIII (n. 31) applied that rule to books prohibited by the Apostolic See. But our text says in a general way, no matter how and by whom forbidden, whether by general rules or special prohibition, whether by the Ordinaries or by the Apostolic See. The latter is always ready to accept corrections made by the author, provided he has duly submitted himself and his corrections are accepted by the examiners.

20 S. O., July 26, 1848 (Coll. P. F., n. 1030).

21 S. O., June 29, 1817 (ibid., n. 718).

22 Prop. 45 damn., March 18, 1666 (Denzinger, n. 1016).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

LIST OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS

CAN. 1399

Ipso iure prohibentur:

1.° Editiones textus originalis et antiquarum versionum catholicarum sacrae Scripturae, etiam Ecclesiae Orientalis, ab acatholicis quibuslibet publicatae; itemque eiusdem versiones in quamvis linguam, ab eisdem confectae vel editae;

2.° Libri quorumvis scriptorum, haeresim vel schisma propugnantes, aut ipsa religionis fundamenta quoquo modo evertere nitentes;

3.° Libri qui religionem aut bonos mores, data opera, impetunt;

4.° Libri quorumvis acatholicorum, qui ex professo de religione tractant, nisi constet nihil in eis contra fidem catholicam contineri;

5.° Libri de quibus in can. 1385, § 1, n. 1 et can. 1391; itemque ex illis de quibus in cit. can. 1385, § 1, n. 2, libri ac libelli qui novas apparitiones, revelationes, visiones, prophetias, miracula enarrant, vel qui novas inducunt devotiones, etiam sub praetextu quod sint privatae, si editi fuerint non servatis canonum praescriptionibus;

6.° Libri qui quodlibet ex catholicis dogmatibus impugnant vel derident, qui errores ab Apostolica Sede proscriptos tuentur, qui cultui divino detrahunt, qui disciplinam ecclesiasticam evertere contendunt, et qui data opera ecclesiasticam hierarchiam, aut statum clericalem vel religiosum probris afficiunt;

7.° Libri qui cuiusvis generis superstitionem, sortilegia, divinationem, magiam, evocationem spirituum, aliaque id genus docent vel commendant;

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

8.° Libri qui duellum vel suicidium, vel divortium licita statuunt, qui de sectis massonicis vel aliis eiusdem generis societatibus agentes, eas utiles et non perniciosas Ecclesiae et civili societati esse contendunt;

9.° Libri qui res lascivas seu obscenas ex professo tractant, narrant, aut docent;

10.° Editiones librorum liturgicorum a Sede Apostolica approbatorum, in quibus quidpiam immutatum fuerit, ita ut cum authenticis editionibus a Sancta Sede approbatis non congruant;

11.° Libri quibus divulgantur indulgentiae apocryphae vel a Sancta Sede proscriptae aut revocatae;

12.° Imagines quoquo modo impressae Domini Nostri Iesu Christi, Beatae Mariae Virginis, Angelorum atque Sanctorum vel aliorum Servorum Dei ab Ecclesiae sensu et decretis alienae.

By law (i. e., common law) are forbidden:

1.° Editions of the original text and of ancient Catholic versions of Holy Scripture, also of the Oriental Church, which have been published by non-Catholics; also translations of the same into any language made or published by non-Catholics.

The original text of the O. T. is in Hebrew, except portions of the Book of Esdras and about half of Daniel, which are written in Chaldean. The Books of Judith, Tobias, Baruch, Ecclesiasticus, I Machabees and parts of Daniel were written either in Hebrew or in Chaldean, but are preserved only in translations, of which the Greek Septuagint is the oldest. The book of Wisdom, II Machabees and the whole of the N. T. were composed in Greek, and have come down to us in that language.

Ancient translations are several Greek and Chaldean translations of the O. T.; a Samaritan version of the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Pentateuch, some Syriac versions (especially the Peshitto of the Ist century), several Arabic (mainly made in the Xth century by a Jewish rabbi), one Armenian (IVth century) one Coptic (IIIrd century) one Ethiopian (IVth century), one Slavonic, one Gothic (by Wulfilas, IVth century); and especially the Latin versions called Itala and Vulgate.[23] All these texts and versions, if published by non-Catholics, are forbidden, for the reason that there is danger of perversion and hypercriticism, which may lead to the elimination of genuine texts or wrong punctuation, etc. By issuing this prohibition, of course, the Church does not wish to slur well-deserving non-Catholic editors or their work. She merely desires to safeguard the text of S. Scripture and the faith of her children.

More liable to carelessness and perversion than the ancient versions are the translations into modern languages, of which the King James Bible furnishes an example. Most of them entirely omit the so-called deutero-canonical books and thus offer a mutilated Bible.

2.° The books of writers defending or championing heresy and schism, or attempting in any way to undermine the very foundations of religion.

The text omits the term "apostates," found in the Leonine legislation, for the reason, apparently, that they are included either in this paragraph or the following two. Propugnare means an argumentative defence. Heresy and schism have been defined in can. 1325, § 2.

The foundations of religion are the fundamental truths of both the natural and the supernatural, i. e., revealed, order,— the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, the possibility and reality of miracles, etc., as generally set forth in handbooks of fundamental theology or [23] Seisenberger, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, (Engl. Transl.) 1911, p. 213; p. 235.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

apologetics.[24] The undermining, evertere, may be done by casting ridicule upon these fundamental truths; hence satirical, also sceptical writings would suffice.

3.° Books which purposely attack religion or good morals. Data opera appears to mean the same as ex professo, and is opposed to such expressions as perfunctorie and obiter. It may be, however, that data opera is intended to signify the intention. This would have to manifest itself in some way, whereas ex professo rather refers to the way and style of handling the arguments or subject. Practically the two phrases are hardly to be distinguished from each other.

What is understood by religion is not expressly determined, but there can be no doubt that the term here denotes first and above all the true religion of Christ, and secondarily natural religion, which governs the relations between God and His creatures.

"Good morals" comprise the principles laid down by ethics as well as moral theology, not only the system as a whole, but any part of it. Thus, for instance, a book defending "race suicide" or profiteering would no doubt be opposed to good morals.

Impetere means not only to make incoherent statements, as is done in newspapers, but to launch an elaborate or a systematic attack.

4.° Books by non-Catholics which professedly treat of religion, unless it is certain that they contain nothing contrary to the Catholic faith.[25]

The author must be a non-Catholic,—i. e., a pagan, Jew, [24] Thus Wernz, Ius Decret., Vol. III, ed. 1, p. 119, n. 111. Vermeersch (l. c., n. 13) excludes "praecipua dogmata ipsius fidei" and seems to insist too much on the distinction between scientific and religious foundations; it is not true that all these are included in heresy and schism, for not all heretics and schismatics attack them.

[25] Wernz, l. c.; Hurley, l. c., p. 62.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Moslem, heretic, schismatic, or an apostatized Catholic, for our Code always uses the term non-Catholic in this wide sense.

The phrase "ab acatholicis quibuslibet" in no. 1 of the present canon shows that, as in the Constitution of Leo XIII, so here also the term "non-Catholic" must be interpreted in the widest sense.[26]

The subject is religion, without any further determination, therefore natural as well as supernatural religion, for in the final analysis all religion affects the attributes of God.

The mode of treating religion must be ex professo, which, as stated before, signifies not a mere transient or cursory statement, but a formal and developed argument dealing with at least a notable and considerable part of the subject in question. Such, for instance, are sermons or discourses written by non-Catholics, histories of religion, etc.

The restrictive clause "nisi constet . . ." permits the reading of such books if it is morally certain that they contain nothing against the Catholic faith, either by way of assertion, innuendo, or induction. The word nihil is a wide term, as it marks a universal negation and generally admits of no restriction. Still stronger would be the expressions, "nihil penitus," or "nihil omnino," which absolutely exclude everything and anything.[27] But since the simple term "nothing" is used here, we may admit the adage "parum pro nihilo putatur," and say that one or the other sentence of little importance against the Catholic faith might be overlooked, especially if there is a palpable absence of malicious intent.

It is said that one must be morally certain that the book

26 Wernz, l. c., p. 119 f.

27 Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Dictio 214 (ed. Lugdun., 1660, p. 725).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google contains nothing objectionable. This certainly may be obtained by reading the book, either privately or officially, on the part of persons who are capable of judging it and possess a conscientious disposition.

5.° Bibles and Biblical annotations and commentaries, modern translations of the Bible, i. e., into the vernacular, and all books mentioned in can. 1385, § 1, n. 2, books and booklets which narrate new apparitions, revelations, visions, prophecies, miracles or aim to introduce new devotions, even though they pretend to be purely private, if published without regard to the rules prescribed, i. e., without complying with the law of previous censorship (can. 1393).

Note the word narrare, which is historical rather than theological or scientific. However, a mere report in a newspaper or magazine could hardly be intended, because the term appears to require a longer treatise.[28] This rule also applies to " war prophesies," of which we heard so much of late. It does not matter whether the facts narrated are objectively true or not.

New devotions are such as have not yet been approved by ecclesiastical authority. In regard to new devotions, as well as to apparitions, for instance, of the Blessed Virgin Mary, observe that, if they were believed and tolerated for a long time, and never disapproved by the Holy See, they may continue to be tolerated by the local Ordinary, who may also approve them and thus render them permissible. In case of episcopal approbation, the Ordinary should add a declaration to the effect that the respective devotion is tolerated on account of immemorial custom.[29]

28 Thus also Vermeersch, l. c., n. 14. This seems also evident from the opposition: books and booklets. Their chief purpose must be the narration of such things, no matter whether the narrator himself believes the story or not.

29 S. Rit. C., Feb. 6, 1875; May 12, 1877 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3336, 3419).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The previous censorship, therefore, is required for all these books, and without the Ordinary's imprimatur no one may read them, even for private devotion.

6.° This number contains several classes of books which are best kept separate, namely:

(a) Books which attack or ridicule any dogma of the Catholic Church. Dogma here means an article of divine or Catholic faith. The attack may be made by argument or in the form of a simple statement. Ridicule may be contained in one sentence.

(b) Books which defend errors that have been proscribed by the Apostolic See, i. e., by the Pope himself, or by one of the S. Congregations.[30] This law refers principally to formally condemned errors of heretics, e. g., Jansenius, Bajus, Molinos, etc., also to the propositions censured in the Syllabus of Pius IX and the so-called New Syllabus of Pius X.

(c) Books which disparage divine worship. Cultus divinus is here evidently to be taken in the same sense in which the Code uses the term in can. 1255 ff., i. e., the worship paid to God and His Saints as well as the liturgical functions of the Church, which are nothing else but visible manifestations of internal worship.

Detrahere signifies a kind of slander of a person or disparagement of some object connected with that person. Thus the worship of relics and sacred images is disparaged by iconoclastic propositions.

(d) Books which seek to undermine ecclesiastical discipline. To this class belong writings directed against the Canon Law and the divine liturgy. Ecclesiastical discipline comprises all the measures taken by the Church to preserve and develop the society founded by Christ. The 30 It is not necessary that any specific qualification (erronea, temeraria, scandalosa, piarum aurium offensiva, etc.) be added.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

term includes the holy seasons, the sacred liturgy, the duties and privileges of clergy and laymen,[31] etc.

(e) Books which of set purpose insult the ecclesiastical hierarchy or the clerical or religious state. The term insult is liable to a more or less subjective interpretation. Essentially it means an undeserved affront or indignity offered to one's self-respect. The insult, to bring a book within the prohibited class, must strike at the hierarchy as such, not at single persons. The same is true of the clerical or religious state. Therefore an insult hurled against a clergyman, or several clergymen, or against a religious, or one house or congregation of religious, or even a whole order could not be called an affront against the religious state.[32]

7.° Books which teach or approve any kind of superstition, fortune-telling, divination, magic, the evocation of spirits, and other similar practices.[33]

Superstition seems to be here taken as a distinct and coordinate, not as a comprehensive term, and hence means a specific form of belief, which manifests ignorant or abnormal credulity, such as the belief in omens, charms, etc. The other terms include the whole broad field of occultism or Spiritism, witchcraft, sorcery, clairvoyancy, and so forth. Hypnotism and somnambulism, if superstitious, are also included. Books teaching or approving such practices are forbidden, not, of course, books written for the purpose of combatting them.

8.° Books which defend the lawfulness of duelling or suicide or divorce; or which try to prove that Freemasonry

31 However, this must be understood, not of single canons or rubrics, but of the law and liturgy as a whole, or at least some compact part thereof.

32 Thus the commentators generally; see Wernz, l. c., p. 123.

33 Somewhat different appears to be the meaning in "Officiorum ac munerum," art. 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and other similar sects are useful and not detrimental to Church and State.

Statuere, in the first clause, means literally to establish, determine, pass judgment or demonstrate. To do this requires no ex professo treatise, but the tendency to make duelling, etc., appear lawful, must be manifest. Law books which admit divorce are excepted from this prohibition, because they are merely repositories of laws. But a pamphlet written to recommend a divorce bill would certainly be prohibited.

The second class treats of Masonic and similar sects. Masonic societies are those which have special rites, secret oaths, and advocate subversive principles. The last mentioned feature is now regarded as a characteristic feature,[34] and hence all anarchistic, Bolshevist, and extremely Socialistic societies are included.[35] However, such books or pamphlets, to fall under the prohibition of our canon, must make a serious attempt to prove the usefulness or harmlessness of these sects. This requires argumentation which is apt to convince the reader.

9.° Books which of set purpose treat of, relate, or inculcate lascivious and obscene things. Hither belongs the whole class of strictly so-called pornographic literature, as well as innumerable romances, novels, and poems. To treat of (tractare) implies a frivolous or alluring style. Narrare refers to a minute or detailed account of obscene facts, whilst docere may be taken as indicating that the reader deduces false conclusions from the description or narrative. From this it is evident that scientific treatises on medicine, surgery, pastoral medicine, and moral theology do not belong to the category of for-

34 Cfr. S. C. P. F., Sept. 24, 1867 (Coll., n. 1320).

35 Vermeersch (l. c., n. 13) doubts whether Socialists are included because they are, he maintains, neither a factio (une partie, a

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google bidden books [36] unless they are written in a style which clearly betrays the purpose of the author to be other than scientific.

The term "books" here excludes images, pictures, drawings, engravings, photogravures, etc.

10.° Editions of liturgical books approved by the Apostolic See, which have been altered so as no longer to agree with the authentic texts.

11.° Books which spread apocryphal indulgences or indulgences that have been proscribed or recalled by the Holy See.

12.° Images, however printed, of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Angels, the Saints, and other Servants of God, if not in keeping with the spirit or decrees of the Church.

These last three classes of publications have been sufficiently explained under canons 1257, 1279, 919.

EXCEPTION IN FAVOR OF THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS

CAN. 1400

Usus librorum de quibus in can. 1399, n. 1, ac librorum editorum contra praescriptum can. 1391, iis dumtaxat permittitur qui studiis theologicis vel biblicis quovis modo operam dant, dummodo iidem libri fideliter et integre editi sint neque impugnentur in eorum prolegomenis aut adnotationibus catholicae fidei dogmata.

Editions of the original text of Holy Scripture, of the ancient versions by non-Catholics, and translations into party), nor a secret (occulta) sect. But the latter characteristic is not absolutely needed, according to the preceding note; and the attribute of faction or party can certainly not be denied to such Socialist bodies as the Spartacists in Germany.

[36] Wernz, l. c., p. 122.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the vernacular made and published either by non-Catholics or by Catholics without previous censorship, are allowed to such as are in any way engaged in theological or biblical studies, provided, however,

(1) that these editions are faithful and entire, and

(2) that neither the introduction nor the annotations contain attacks on Catholic dogmas.

There is, then, a privileged class of persons, who may make use of the aforesaid forbidden books, but not of others mentioned in the preceding canon, namely those engaged in theological or biblical studies. Theology comprises first and above all dogmatic theology, but may be taken as coextensive with the theological course of can. 1365, § 2, and therefore includes all branches usually taught with theology. This interpretation is not contradicted by the declaration of the S. C. of the Index, of June 21, 1898, which (ad 2am partem) excludes from this privilege those who simply read the Hebrew or Greek text of S. Scripture without reference to theological studies.[37] Hence one purpose of using these otherwise forbidden books is theological study. Another is the pursuit of biblical studies, viz., introduction, hermeneutics, and exegesis. Now both these studies may be pursued not only by professional theologians and biblical scholars or professors, but also by students in seminaries, universities, etc. All these share in the privilege extended by can. 1400.[38]

Is the use of these editions allowed if one has to prepare a sermon or lecture? Our answer would be that for a usual Sunday or holyday sermon no special theological or biblical study is required, and therefore we could not 37 Cfr. Wernz, l. c., p. 120; mistaken is Hurley's interpretation, l. c., p. 69.

38 Cfr. S. C. Indic., May 23, 1898, ad 1 (Coll. P. F., n. 2000).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

say that these preachers are engaged in (operam dant) such studies.[39] But if one would have to deliver an elaborate lecture on a theological subject, say for instance, on creation, on the Real Presence, or on Holy Orders, he would certainly have to study his subject, and therefore would be allowed to make use of these editions.[40]

PERSONS EXEMPT FROM THE PROHIBITION

CAN. 1401

S. R. E. Cardinales, Episcopi, etiam titulares, aliique Ordinarii, necessariis adhibitis cautelis, ecclesiastica librorum prohibitione non adstringuntur.

Cardinals, residential as well as titular bishops, and other Ordinaries, provided they employ the necessary precautions, are not bound by the law of forbidden books, (but must obey the law of previous censorship).

What precautions are to be taken is not determined by the Code. They may be described as follows:

(a) The natural as well as positive law requires that one should not expose his faith and morals unnecessarily to danger (cfr. can. 1405, § 1), for no one is immune from temptations.

(b) No one is allowed to read lascivious or obscene books unless bound to do so ex officio, to examine them;

(c) If the persons mentioned retain forbidden books, they must see to it that they do not fall into the hands of those not permitted to read them. This does not mean, however, that Ordinaries, etc., may not communicate

39 If one, by way of exception, should need a critical edition, or should have no other text at hand, he would be excused.

40 The best known editions by non-Catholic authors are those of Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Westcott and Hort.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

among themselves or converse with their censors about such books.

Here it may be useful to add a word about librarians. These, being custodians, not proprietors or retainers, of the books in their care, should see to it that forbidden books are kept separate, or if this is impossible or impracticable, that a warning sign be placed on the shelves containing forbidden or dangerous books.

The prelates or superiors of exempt clerical institutes, who, according to our canon and canon 198, are free from the restrictions of the law regarding forbidden books, should take care that their libraries are so managed as to preclude danger to their subjects.

This rule may also be applied to parish libraries, though these, as a rule, will hardly keep forbidden books, with the exception perhaps of non-Catholic editions of the Bible.

What we have said is nothing but a logical deduction from can. 1403, § 2, which strictly obliges those who have obtained faculties for reading or retaining forbidden books, to guard them carefully, so that they do not fall into the hands of others.

FACULTIES

CAN. 1402

§ 1. Ordinarii licentiam, ad libros quod attinet ipso iure vel decreto Sedis Apostolicae prohibitos, concedere suis subditis valent pro singulis tantum libris atque in casibus dumtaxat urgentibus.

§ 2. Quod si generalem a Sede Apostolica facultatem impetraverint suis subditis permittendi ut libros proscriptos retineant ac legant, eam nonnisi cum delectu et iusta ac rationabili causa concedant.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1403

§ 1. Qui facultatem apostolicam consecuti sunt legendi et retinendi libros prohibitos, nequeunt ideo legere et retinere libros quoslibet a suis Ordinariis proscriptos, nisi in apostolico indulto expressa iisdem facta fuerit potestas legendi et retinendi libros a quibuslibet damnatos.

§ 2. Insuper gravi praecepto tenentur libros prohibitos ita custodiendi, ut hi ad aliorum manus non perveniant.

Can. 1402 mentions two kinds of faculties, one granted by the law itself, the other by the Apostolic See.

1. Ordinaries, i. e., all who go by that name [41] in virtue of can. 198, § 1, may grant permission to their subjects to read books forbidden either by law (i. e., by the Code) or by a special decree of the Apostolic See, but they can impart this faculty only for individual books and in urgent cases. The term "pro singulis tantum libris" means that each book must be distinctly mentioned by title and no wholesale permission may be issued. The plural form, singulis libris, permits the faculty to be given for more than one book at a time, provided they are duly specified.

Urgent cases are such as arise suddenly and unexpectedly. Thus if a writer needs a certain book for immediate use, he may apply to his Ordinary, (either the local Ordinary, if he is subject to him, or the exempt religious superior, if he is an exempt religious) and obtain the permission needed.

It may have surprised the reader to find libri lascivi vel

41 Wernz, l. c., p. 129 correctly held against Pennacchi that all ordinaries, hence also religious superiors who, according to can. 488, n. 8 and can. 501, § 1, have jurisdiction in foro externo, must here be understood.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

obscoeni mentioned under n. 9 without the restriction or mitigation found in rule 10 of the Constitution of Leo XIII, in favor of classical writers. Does the New Code abolish this mitigation? It does, though § 1 of can. 1402 permits teachers and others whose office necessitates such reading, to apply to their superiors for the faculty, if the case is urgent, as it generally is.

§ 2 mentions a general faculty granted by the Apostolic See (Holy Office).[42] If such a general faculty has been given to Ordinaries for the benefit of their subjects, it should be communicated to the latter with discretion and only for a just and reasonable cause.

The term "cum delectu" doubtless refers to the persons subject to the Ordinaries. These persons are described in the Clementine Instruction as men of learning and piety who labor for the public welfare and that of the Catholic Church. Being engaged in such work constitutes a reasonable and just cause for granting the permission.

Ordinaries who have this general (either triennial or quinquennial) faculty, before granting either perpetual or revocable permission to their subjects,[43] should carefully read the text of the grant, for it may be that some classes of books (e. g., libri obscoeni or books ex professo defending heresy and schism or undermining the foundations of religion) are excepted.

Can. 1403 rules that those who have obtained a papal faculty for reading and keeping forbidden books, are not thereby entitled to read and keep books proscribed by their Ordinaries unless the indult which they have ob-

42 Secular prelates have to petition the Holy Office if they are under the ordinary hierarchical jurisdiction; otherwise the S. C. de Propaganda Fide. Religious prelates must apply to the S. C. Relig.

43 Wernz, l. c., p. 129.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tained contains the express clause that they may read and keep books no matter by whom condemned.[44]

What was said under can. 1395, also applies here and should be compared with rule 26 of the Constitution of Leo XIII, which employs the term "local Ordinaries" (Ordinariis locorum), whereas our canon mentions Ordinaries in general. The consequence is that if the local Ordinary or bishop forbids a book, or magazine, or paper, exempt religious are not, juridically speaking, bound to heed the proscription, until their superior has approved it. On the other hand, the religious superior of an exempt clerical institute may forbid a book or pamphlet or magazine not forbidden by the local Ordinary. Therefore a religious who has obtained a papal indult to read and keep forbidden books is not allowed to read or retain a book forbidden by his (exempt) religious superior, unless the above-mentioned clause is found in the papal indult. This rule holds good even if the local Ordinary or religious superior should prohibit a book already proscribed either by common law or by a special decree of the Apostolic See; for there may be a special local or personal reason why this book should be doubly forbidden.

We may finally admit a certain epikeia when an adequate reason of utility or necessity exists for not observing the law, as far as its positive side is concerned, provided, of course, there be no danger to faith or morals.[45]

BOOKSELLERS

CAN. 1404

Librorum venditores libros de obscenis ex professo tractantes ne vendant, commodent, retineant; ceteros

44 Hurley, l. c., p. 172 f.

45 Vermeersch, l. c., n. 34.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prohibitos venales ne habeant, nisi debitam licentiam a Sede Apostolica impetraverint, neve cuiquam vendant, nisi prudenter existimare possint ab emptore legitime peti.

Catholic booksellers [46] are bound in conscience:

1.° Not to sell, loan, or keep books which treat ex professo of obscene subjects. Here again no distinction is made between classical and ordinary authors, and therefore all obscene books are included. However, it stands to reason that purged or corrected editions of classical authors may be sold.

2.° Not to offer for sale any other forbidden books, except with the permission of the Apostolic See (i. e., the Holy Office), nor to sell any such books to anyone of whom it cannot be reasonably supposed that he asks for them lawfully.

Venales habere means to exhibit or offer for sale. Since the term "retinere" does not occur in this clause, we may reasonably suppose that booksellers are allowed to keep such books in stock, but only in a hidden or secret place, not publicly. But they may not list them in their catalogues or advertise them unless they have obtained a papal indult to this effect. Even if they have such an indult, they should be careful not to sell forbidden books indiscriminately. If a customer asks for a forbidden book, they are not indeed obliged to ask whether he has permission to read and keep it, but they should be morally certain that he does not ask unreasonably.

46 A distinction between Catholic and non-Catholic booksellers was drawn in "Officiorum ac munerum," n. 46, but it is not repeated in our Code, because the Code legislates for Catholics only.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1405

§ 1. Licentia a quovis obtenta nullo modo quis eximitur a prohibitione iuris naturalis legendi libros qui ipsi proximum spirituale periculum praestant.

§ 2. Ordinarii locorum aliique curam animarum habentes opportune moneant fideles de periculo et damno lectionis librorum pravorum, praesertim prohibitorum.

§ 1. A license to read forbidden books does not in any way exempt one from the prohibition of the natural law against reading books which are to him a proximate occasion of sin. Therefore

§ 2. The local Ordinaries and all those in charge of souls should warn the faithful of the danger and injury caused by reading bad, especially forbidden, books.

It is obvious that one who disobeys the law of the Church and neglects the precautions dictated by reason, cannot expect supernatural help against temptations.

For completeness' sake we here add can. 2318.

PENAL SANCTION

CAN. 2318

§ 1. In excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae speciali modo reservatam ipso facto incurrunt, opere publici iuris facto, editores librorum apostatarum, haereticorum et schismaticorum, qui apostasiam, haeresim, schisma propugnant, itemque eosdem libros aliosve per apostolicas litteras nominatim prohibitos defendentes aut scienter sine debita licentia legentes vel retinentes.

§ 2. Auctores et editores qui sine debita licentia sacrarum Scripturarum libros vel earum adnotationes aut commentarios imprimi curant, incidunt ipso facto in excommunicationem nemini reservatam.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. Those who publish books written by apostates, heretics, and schismatics defending apostasy, heresy, or schism, incur the excommunication reserved speciali modo to the Holy See. The same penalty is incurred by those who defend such books or others nominally forbidden by Apostolic letter, or who knowingly read or retain them without due permission.

§ 2. Authors and publishers who, without due permission, print books of Sacred Scripture or annotations and commentaries thereon, incur excommunication reserved to no one.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXIV

THE PROFESSION OF FAITH

WHO MUST MAKE IT

CAN. 1406

§ 1. Obligatione emittendi professionem fidei, secundum formulam a Sede Apostolica probatam, tenentur:

1.° Coram praeside eiusve delegato, qui Oecumenico vel particulari Concilio aut Synodo dioecesanae intersunt cum voto seu consultivo seu deliberativo; praeses autem coram eodem Concilio vel Synodo;

2.° Coram Sacri Collegii Decano, Cardinalibus primis in ordine presbyterorum et diaconorum et S. R. E. Camerario, promoti ad cardinalitiam dignitatem;

3.° Coram delegato ab Apostolica Sede, promoti ad sedem episcopalem etiam non residentialem, vel ad regimen Abbatiae vel Praelaturae nullius, Vicariatus Apostolici, Praefecturae Apostolicae;

4.° Coram Capitulo cathedrali, Vicarius Capitularis;

5.° Coram loci Ordinario eiusve delegato et coram Capitulo, qui ad dignitatem vel canonicatum promoti sunt;

6.° Coram loci Ordinario eiusve delegato et coram aliis consultoribus, assumpti ad officium consultorum dioecesanorum;

7.° Coram loci Ordinario eiusve delegato, Vicarius Generalis, parochi et ii quibus provisum fuit de bene-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ficiis quibusvis, etiam manualibus, curam animarum habentibus; rector, professores sacrae theologiae, iuris canonici et philosophiae in Seminariis, initio cuiuslibet anni scholastici vel saltem initio suscepti muneris; omnes promovendi ad ordinem subdiaconatus; librorum censores, de quibus in can. 1393; sacerdotes confessionibus excipiendis destinati et sacri concionatores, antequam facultate donentur ea munia exercendi;

8.° Coram Ordinario eiusve delegato Rector Universitatis vel Facultatis; coram Rectore vero Universitatis vel Facultatis eiusve delegato, professores omnes in Universitate seu Facultate canonice erecta, initio cuiusque anni scholastici vel saltem initio suscepti muneris; itemque qui, periculo facto, academicis gradibus donantur;

9.° Coram Capitulo vel Superiore qui eos nominavit eorumve delegato, Superiores in religionibus clericalibus.

§ 2. Qui, priore dimisso, aliud officium vel beneficium aut dignitatem etiam eiusdem speciei consequuntur, rursus debent fidei professionem emittere ad normam huius canonis.

The profession of faith was generally connected with the oath of obedience imposed on prelates since the XIIth century, especially on those immediately subject to the Holy See.[1] The Pope himself used to send a kind of public profession to the patriarchs of the East soon after his accession to the papal throne[2]; and documents of the VIIth century testify that a public profession of faith was made by the Pontiff on the occasion of his election or cor-

1 Cfr. c. 4, X, I, 6; c. 13, X, I, 33; c. 4, X, II, 24. The formula for the Italian bishops in Sickel, Liber Diurnus, form 73, 75.

2 Cfr. Reg. Greg. I, ed. Ewald-Hartmann, I, 5, 28, 39, 438, 448.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

onation.[3] The Council of Trent established substantially the present discipline, and later decrees specified more closely the persons who had to make profession of faith.[4] The present prescribed form is contained in our Code and must be followed always. Besides this profession, there is no special oath prescribed in the Code, and therefore the oath demanded by Pius X in the "Sacrorum Antistitum" (Sept. 1, 1910) would be abolished (according to can. 6, n. 6) had not the Holy Office since declared that the Antimodernist Oath continues in force until the Holy See expressly abrogates it.[5] Our canon deals only with the profession of faith, which, according to § 1, must be made by the following ecclesiastics:

1.° By all those who attend a general or particular council or diocesan synod with the right to cast either an advisory or a decisive vote. These must make their profession of faith before the presiding officer or his delegate; the presiding officer himself before the synod or council.

2.° Newly created cardinals must make profession of faith before the Dean of the Sacred College, the first in rank among the cardinal priests and deacons, and the Camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church.

3.° Bishops, residential as well as titular, Abbots or Prelates nullius, Vicars Apostolic and Prefects Apostolic, before the papal delegate.

4.° The Vicar Capitular before the cathedral chapter. Since in this country the consultors supply the cathedral chapter (can. 427), our diocesan administrators must make their profession of faith before the consultors as a body.

3 Wernz, Ius. Decret., III, n. 14, p. 15 f.

4 Trid., Sess. 24, c. 1, 12, De Ref., Pius IV, "Iniunctum Nobis," Nov. 13, 1504; S. C. C., Jan. 20, 1877 (Coll. P. F., n. 1464).

5 S. O., March 22, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 136.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5.° Those who have been promoted to a dignity or canonicate must make their profession of faith before the local Ordinary or his delegate, and at the same time before the chapter. We say: "at the same time," for if the bishop or his delegate (who propter decentiam should be an ecclesiastical dignitary) is not present when the profession is made before the chapter, it would have to be made again.[6] There cannot be any doubt that canons of collegiate chapters, too, are now obliged to make the profession of faith before they take possession of their office or benefice.[7]

6.° Diocesan consultors must make their profession of faith before the local Ordinary or his delegate and, at the same time, before the other consultors, who should therefore meet together with the bishop in a convenient place, — the cathedral or another church, the episcopal residence, or a priest's house.

7.° The following must make profession before the local Ordinary or his delegate: (a) the vicar general; (b) pastors[8] and those provided with a benefice (even though manual only) to which the care of souls is attached; (c) rectors of seminaries and professors of sacred theology, canon law, and philosophy, at the beginning of each scholastic year,[9] or at least when they assume office; (d) those about to be ordained subdeacons; (e) the censors of books, as mentioned in can. 1393; (f) all priests who are to act as confessors or preachers, before they are given their appointment or faculties. Under this

6 S. C. C., Jan. 25, Feb. 9, 1726, ad III (Richter, Trid., p. 353, n. 19).

7 Although the decision just quoted (ad I) would exempt them, yet can. 405, § 2, requires it.

8 See can. 461; pastors are not obliged to make this profession of faith on the day of installation before the people; S. Rit. C., July 21, 1855 (Dec. Auth., n. 3035).

9 This rule might also be observed concerning the Antimodernist oath, for it appears very awkward—to say the least—to repeat it every year.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google heading, no doubt, also come our assistants or curates, and the confessors and chaplains of nuns [10] and religious institutions.

8.° The rector of a university or faculty must make his profession of faith before the local Ordinary or his delegate; all the professors of a canonically established university or faculty, before the rector at the beginning of each scholastic year, or at least when they assume the office of teaching; the same rule applies to all those who receive academic degrees, after they have passed their examinations. Academic degrees, in the proper sense, are the licentiate and the doctorate; the baccalaurate is regarded only as a stepping-stone to the former. The time for making the profession of faith for such graduates is between the examinations and the ceremony of conferring the degree. The profession may most properly be made in the chapel or church, before the staff, board, or faculty of the university, and in presence of the students, or in the aula academica before the rector and some professors.

9.° Superiors of clerical institutes must make their profession of faith before the chapter or the superior who has appointed them. Thus an abbot should make it before the president or vice-president of his congregation and the monastic chapter.[11] If the superior is appointed by a higher one, this latter, or his delegate, should receive the profession.

§ 2 requires that the profession of faith be repeated, according to the rules prescribed in § 1 of this canon, whenever one assumes a new office, benefice or dignity, after giving up the former, even if the new office is of the same species. If a canon or dignitary of a cathedral

10 See can. 529.

11 The profession of faith is not to be identified with the iuramentum at the benedictio abbatis; cfr. Pontif. Rom., s. h. t.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

church obtains a new benefice, office, or dignity in the same cathedral (or collegiate) church, he must renew his profession of faith; and if the change should occur during the vacancy of the episcopal see, the renewal must take place before the vicar-capitular and the chapter.[12]

This rule also applies to pastors who obtain another parish in the same diocese.

Can. 1407

Obligationi fidei professionem emittendi non satisfacit qui eam per procuratorem vel coram laico emittit.

Can. 1407 declares a profession of faith made by proxy or before a layman invalid. The validity of such an act had been sustained by canonists of note, such as Navarrus, Sanchez, Barbosa, Reiffenstuel, and Boekhn; but the S. C. C. was of contrary opinion, and its view is here espoused.[13] This is so true that if, for instance, a prelate or canon had made his profession before the Cardinal Vicar of Rome, he would nevertheless have to renew it upon his return to the benefice.

A layman cannot validly receive a profession of faith because he lacks spiritual power.

Can. 1408

Reprobatur quaelibet consuetudo contra canones huius tituli.

Every custom contrary to the canons of this title (XXIV) is hereby reprobated.

What we said under can. 1356, § 1, also applies here.

12 S. C. C., 1595, 1622 (n. 19); Nov. 23, 1630 (Richter, l. c. n. 22).

13 S. C. C., Jan. 25, Feb. 9, 1726, ad II (Richter, l. c., 19).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART V

BENEFICES AND OTHER NON-CORPORATE ECCLESIASTICAL INSTITUTIONS

Part V treats of a subject which was once of great importance for the Church at large and, therefore, lavishly discussed by canonists. We can limit ourselves to a few observations.

The term benefice, taken from the Germanic law, signifies a grant, especially of real estate or landed property, to subjects or vassals in recognition of services rendered. The practice dates back to the Vth century, and benefices were sanctioned as a permanent source of ecclesiastical revenue by civil and ecclesiastical law. The ecclesiastical benefice arose from the distribution of clerical support, which was formerly held in common, under the supervision of the bishop. The bishop was supposed, through his deacons, to distribute all the voluntary offerings into four, or three, parts, one portion of which was especially assigned for the maintenance of the clergy. With the increase of country parishes and the growth of ecclesiastical holdings, especially in land, it was but natural that the bishops should grant to the country clergy a certain portion of the land destined for their support.[1] This appor-

1 Concerning England, see Lingard, History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, ed. 2, 1858, pp. 162 ff. on benefices in general; see Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccles. Disciplina circa Bene-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tionment was made upon a precaria or petition presented by the clergyman concerned, which had to be renewed every time the place became vacant. When, in the VIth century, the revenue or grant became legally attached to the church itself, the precaria was turned into a permanent title or claim, or was attached to the property and church served by the respective cleric.

A similar development is noticeable in the property and revenues of cathedral churches. When the canons ceased to live in common, about the Xth century, each received from the common stock (massa communis) a share, which was called praebenda. When the so-called secularization set in the ecclesiastical benefice did not lose its character of a benefice, but was distributed in the form of a yearly salary from the government. Thus it is still in Italy, where the pastors, and canons, and all other priests acknowledged by the State receive their income from the public treasury.

In the U. S. benefices are almost unknown. A solitary example in New Orleans figured as a notable exception in the decrees of the Second Plenary Council. A few parochial benefices are found in the province of San Francisco. In England, also, benefices are the exception, but in Canada they are more common.[2] ficia, 1688; N. Garcias, Tractatus de Beneficiis, 1636; P. Lewienius, Forum Beneficiale 1742; U. Stutz, Geschichte des Kirchl. Benefizialwesens, 1895; Idem, Die Eigenkirche, 1895; and the commentators on X, III, 5.

2 See Cath. Encycl., II, 474; as to Canada, see Pouliot, Le Droit Paroissiale, 1918.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXV

ECCLESIASTICAL BENEFICES

DEFINITION

CAN. 1409

Beneficium ecclesiasticum est ens iuridicum a competente ecclesiastica auctoritate in perpetuum constitutum seu erectum, constans officio sacro et iure percipiendi reditus ex dote officio adnexos.

A benefice is a juridical entity permanently established or erected by competent authority, and consisting of a sacred office and the right of receiving the revenues from the endowment attached thereto.

Ens iuridicum is the genus of all institutions, with or without corporate character, having a legal foundation. We may say that the material element, the beneficium proper, is personified, inasmuch as it is presented as the subject of rights and duties. It may also be called a fictitious person, but without personal rights. It is the end (finis) alone that specifies these rights, and therefore becomes, as it were, the subject of them. The end or purpose of a benefice is spiritual, viz., the sacred office, and the revenues are granted for the sake of the service one renders (beneficium propter officium).[1]

A benefice is a juridical entity, because the ecclesiastical law[2] has, if not introduced, at least sanctioned the com-

1 C. 10, X, III, 1; c. 15, 6°, I, 3. 2 Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bination of two widely different elements, the material and the spiritual. This connection could be effected only by ecclesiastical authority, for the end being entirely spiritual, it cannot be attached to any material object except by the authority which controls the spiritual element, and this is the Church.

The revenues of a benefice are granted on account of the sacred office, but in order that they may be given, there is need of a source or treasury from whence they may be taken. This is the endowment (dos), which term has a wide significance.

Can. 1410

Dotem beneficii constituunt sive bona quorum proprietas est penes ipsum ens iuridicum, sive certae et debitae praestationes alicuius familiae vel personae moralis, sive certae et voluntariae fidelium oblationes, quae ad beneficii rectorem spectent, sive iura, ut dicitur, stolae intra fines taxationis dioecesanae vel legitimae consuetudinis, sive chorales distributiones, exclusa tertia earundem parte, si omnes reditus beneficii choralibus distributionibus constent.

The various sources of ecclesiastical endowment are:

1.° Property of any kind, movable or immovable, owned by the benefice itself as a juridical entity or fictitious person; for instance, a piece of land owned by a church, in which case the owner is the church, not the pastor, or the trustees, or the congregation;

2.° Contributions imposed on families or corporations, such as tithes to be paid by the persons themselves (decimae personales), or on goods, produce, stock (decimae praediales, reales, animalium);

3.° Voluntary offerings of the faithful, which belong

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to the rector of the benefice, such as pew-rent, at least in part, plate collections, and subscriptions;

4.° Stole fees, to be paid according to diocesan taxation or lawful custom; but never manual mass stipends, as is clear from the text;

5.° Choir distributions, except the third part of the same, if the entire revenue of the benefice consists of such distributions. This provision is manifestly intended for canons. Note that these revenues must be connected with the office permanently (in perpetuum).

This quality was styled by canonists the obiectiva perpetuitas of a benefice and constitutes an essential element of the same, but no longer of a parish.[3]

What about our parishes? The conclusion is forced upon us that the elements of a benefice may also be found in them. For there can no longer be any doubt that when the three conditions pointed out by the Code and by the decree of the S. C. Consist. of Aug. 1, 1919, are verified (viz., residence, endowment, and boundaries), the rectors of such parishes are pastors. This would mean at least objective perpetuity.

A doubt may reasonably be maintained concerning "national" parishes, because they are actually and almost necessarily more or less subsidiary and fluctuating. On the other hand, the ens iuridicum, as well as the purpose of this quasi-corporate entity, are contained in every parish. Besides, since our Code has considerably enlarged the notion of endowment, it is almost impossible to deny the character of benefices to our parishes. Yet a solid doubt remains as to the permanent and stable character of a separate or distinct juridical entity.

[3] The law of Justinian (Cod. I, 2) supposed that the Saint to whom the church was dedicated was the quasi-proprietor.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DIVISION OF BENEFICES

CAN. 1411

There are different kinds of ecclesiastical benefices, to wit:

1.° Consistorial benefices, i. e., such as are bestowed in consistory (now-a-days chiefly prelatures with dignity); all others are called non-consistorial;

2.° Secular benefices are those which may be claimed by the secular clergy, who are, by reason of legal presumption, entitled to all benefices established outside a church or house of religious, even to those which are doubtful. But if a lawful custom or the will of the founder reads differently, there can be no doubt. Religious benefices are those existing in the churches or houses of religious, as well as those existing outside these churches or houses that have been given to religious by lawful custom or the will of the founder.

3.° Double or residential are those benefices which require residence in addition to service. Those which demand no permanent residence are called simple or non-residential.

Here it may be noted that a somewhat different characteristic is assigned to double benefices, because they are said to have the care of souls or jurisdiction attached. However, since these latter functions certainly require residence, it was logical to draw the distinction from this obligation.

4.° Manual, temporary, or removable are those benefices which are bestowed subject to the will of the appointer; perpetual or irremovable those which are not only themselves perpetual, but have an incumbent who cannot be removed at will.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5.° Curata are benefices that involve the care of souls. They are sometimes united with simple benefices which oblige the holder, for instance, to recite the office or to say Mass in some chapel or on a certain altar.

CAN. 1412 AND 1413

The following do not go by the name of benefices in law, although they may resemble benefices:

1.° The office of parish vicar when not erected forever;

2.° Lay chaplaincies not established by competent ecclesiastical authority, that is to say, founded by lay persons from their own money with the obligation of saying Mass;

3.° The office of coadjutor, with or without the right of succession;

4.° Personal pensions;

5.° Temporary grants of income made from the property of a church or monastery to an ecclesiastic on condition that if he looses his claim, the revenues shall revert to the church or monastery.

Canons 147–195, unless the contrary is manifest, apply only to non-consistorial benefices that are benefices in the proper sense of the term, for these canons treat of appointment to, and loss of, offices.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

ESTABLISHMENT OR ERECTION OF BENEFICES

COMPETENT AUTHORITY

CAN. 1414

1.° Consistorial benefices are erected by the Apostolic See alone.

2.° Besides the Roman Pontiff, the local Ordinaries can establish in their respective dioceses, non-consistorial benefices, with the exception of dignitaries of cathedral and collegiate chapters (can. 394, § 2).

3.° The Vicar-General needs a special commission from his Ordinary for establishing a benefice.

4.° A Cardinal may erect non-curate benefices in his own title or diaconia, unless the church belongs to exempt clerical religious.

REQUISITES OF ERECTION

CAN. 1415–1418

These four canons sum up the conditions required for the lawful erection of a benefice, viz., the endowment, the coöperation of the persons concerned, and the necessary document; can. 1417 refers to conditions in the strict sense.

The endowment (dos) must be stable, viz., prospec-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

tively durable and sufficient for the maintenance of the building, the divine worship, and the ministers.[1]

If the endowment is made in specie or cash, the Ordinary should, in union with the board of administration, see to it that the money is safely invested in interest-bearing property or titles, i. e., stocks or bonds.

It is not forbidden to establish a parish or quasi-parish, even if a sufficient endowment is not immediately available, provided it can be reasonably foreseen that the necessary support will be forthcoming.

Can. 1416 rules that, before a benefice is erected, those who are interested in its erection should be invited and heard, to wit, the parishioners, and others who may have to contribute or who will probably suffer a detriment. But the omission of this formality does not invalidate the establishment of a benefice or parish.[2]

Can. 1417 permits the founder to lay down certain conditions in the charter with the consent of the Ordinary, i. e., the diocesan bishop or the superior of exempt clerical religious if the benefice is to be a religious one. These conditions may be contrary to common law, but they must be reasonable and compatible with the nature of the benefice. Thus, for instance, the founder may stipulate that the holder of the benefice must be of a certain nation or family,[3] or the youngest among a certain group. This may contravene the common law requiring a certain age; yet the law in our case upholds the will of the founder.[4] However, if a stipulated condition would be subversive of ecclesiastical discipline, or derogatory to divine worship, or contrary to sound morality, it would not bind.[5] Im-

1 Cfr. c. 9, Dist. 1, de cons.; c. 26, X, III, 5; c. 1, X, III, 29.

2 Cfr. c. 3, X, III, 48.

3 This was not infrequently done in monastic foundations in Ireland; see Bury, Life of St. Patrick, 1905, p. 174 ff.

4 Reiffenstuel, III, tit. V, n. 110.

5 A coniugatus is unfit, and hence this condition would be invalid; S.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

possible conditions would be looked upon as not existing. Concerning irregular persons mentioned in the conditions, a distinction should be made: if the irregularity is not plainly against the honor of the sacred ministry and is, as a rule, dispensed from by the Holy See, we believe that a dispensation should be asked for, provided the candidate is otherwise fit. For to install unfit candidates would be against the nature of an ecclesiastical benefice. If the irregularity is great and one not easily dispensed from, the condition should be treated as impossible.

Conditions once accepted cannot be validly suppressed or changed by the local Ordinary, unless the change be favorable to the Church, and even then only with the consent of the founder or patron if the benefice is one of advowson.[6] This rule also holds good if the condition is added that the benefice or beneficiary is not bound to assume other obligations, for instance, preaching, hearing confessions, etc. In this case the Ordinary has no right to compel the beneficiary to accept such obligations.

Can. 1418 requires for the establishment of a benefice a legal document, in which the place of the benefice is designated, and the endowment, rights, and obligations are described. Such a paper must be drawn up by the ecclesiastical authority, in our country with the coöperation of a notary public.

C. C., Sept. 20, 1727; Aug. 19, 1730 (Richter, Trid., p. 443); Santi-Leitner, 1898, III, tit. 5, n. 40.

6 Reiffenstuel, III, 5, n. 112 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

UNION, TRANSFER, DIVISION, DISMEMBERMENT, TRANSFORMATION, AND SUPPRESSION OF BENEFICES

UNION

CAN. 1419–1420

1°. A union of benefices is called extinctiva, or per confusionem, when out of two or more suppressed benefices an entirely new one is created, or when two or more benefices are combined with a third so that they cease entirely to exist, i. e., as a juridical entity. In both cases the new benefice assumes all the rights and obligations of the suppressed or united benefices. However, if these rights and obligations should conflict, only the more substantial and favorable ones are to be retained.

2°. A union is called aeque principalis if two or more benefices, though united, remain as before, neither one becoming subordinate to the other. In this case each benefice retains its nature, rights and obligations, but one and the same cleric may hold titles to all. Two independent dioceses held by one and the same bishop would afford an example of such a union (e.g., Viterbo-Aoscanella). Two dioceses thus united may hold their synods either separately or together, have two vicars-general, distinct revenues, feasts, etc.[1] The same rule applies to two par-

1 S. C. C., Jan. 11, 1783 (Richter, Trid., p. 35 f.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ishes united aeque principaliter: — their boundaries remain distinct, so that marriages must be performed in the respective parish churches, etc. There is no overlapping in this case, but one and the same pastor attends to both parishes and holds the titles to them.

3.° Minus principalis is a union per subiectionem or per accessionem, in which the several benefices remain distinct, but one is made subordinate or accessory to the other. In this case the accessory benefice follows the principal one, upon which it depends, so that the clergyman who obtains the principal, eo ipso receives the accessory benefice, and is bound to comply with the obligations incumbent on both. No doubt this is the meaning of the term subsidiary parishes or chaplaincies, which the S. Congregation had in view when it directed our American bishops to create such within the boundaries of existing parishes whenever lack of endowment or shifting of the population do not permit the erection of new parishes.[2]

TRANSFER, DIVISION, DISMEMBERMENT, ETC.

CAN. 1421

A benefice is transferred when its seat,— for instance, a chapel or church,— is changed from one place to another, whilst the benefice remains the same as to its nature, rights, and obligations.

A division of benefices is made if two or more benefices are created out of one; this is also applicable to our parishes.

Dismemberment takes place when a part of the territory or the revenues belonging to one benefice is taken away and united to another benefice, or to a charitable or ecclesiastical institution, as, for instance, a seminary.

2 S. C. Consist., Aug. 1, 1919 (Eccl. Rev., Vol. 61, p. 551 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Transformation is a specific change of benefices, for instance, if non curata would be turned into curata, or a collegiate into a cathedral benefice.[3]

Suppression is the extinction of a benefice; this cannot be lawfully done by the civil government.

CAN. 1422

The extinction, suppression, and dismemberment of benefices, when the revenues are withdrawn and no new benefice is erected; the union, whether aeque or minus principalis, of a religious with a secular benefice, or vice versa; and the transfer, division, and dismemberment of benefices belonging to religious, are reserved to the Apostolic See.

RIGHTS OF THE LOCAL ORDINARIES

CAN. 1423

§ 1 and § 2. Local Ordinaries may, for reasons of necessity or great and evident utility of the Church, either aeque or minus principaliter unite parish churches with one another or with non-curate benefices. However, a unio minus principalis of a parish with a non-curate benefice must be made in such a manner that the latter becomes an accessory to the parish.

This union cannot be performed by the Vicar-Capitular, on account of can. 436, nor by the Vicar-General, unless he has obtained a special commission for that purpose.

§ 3 rules that such a union must be made for good (in perpetuum), in order to avoid a cumulation or plurality of benefices.[4] Reasons of necessity or utility would be

[3] S. C. C., July 24, 1875 (A. S. S., IX, 8 ff.).
[4] Trid., Sess. 21, c. 5, De Ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

poverty, decrease of the population, the settling of quarrels, increase of divine worship, etc.[5]

Ordinaries may not unite a parish with the mensa of the chapter or of the bishop, nor with a monastery or church in charge of religious (this being reserved to the Holy See), nor with any corporation, nor with cathedral or collegiate dignities or benefices. However, they may unite a parish with the cathedral or collegiate church if the latter is located within the boundaries of the same, but in doing so must provide that the parish revenues are invested in the cathedral or collegiate benefice and the actual pastor or his substitute is paid a decent income (the congrua).

Can. 1424

Can. 1424 forbids Ordinaries to unite either curate or non-curate benefices against the will of the actual incumbents, if the latter suffer damage by that union. It also forbids them to unite benefices of advowson (iurispatronatus), either lay or ecclesiastical, with benefices of free collation, without the advowee's consent, and to unite benefices of one diocese with such of another diocese, even though both are united aeque principaliter and governed by the same bishop. Finally it forbids Ordinaries to unite exempt benefices, or such as are reserved to the Apostolic See, with others. The reason for this prohibition lies partly in the danger of alienation, partly in the confusion of rights and subsequent litigation.

[5] Wernz, Ius. Decret., II, n. 271, p. 372.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

RELIGIOUS BENEFICES

CAN. 1425

This canon distinguishes between unions semipleno iure and pleno iure, made by the Apostolic See. The latter term, according to can. 1422, must be understood of perpetual union, not merely ad tempus, for a temporary union may be made by the Ordinary, if it is only partial. The law is:

§ 1. If a parish has, by papal rescript,[6] been united to a religious house as to temporalities only, the religious house is entitled to the revenues, and the superior must present to the local Ordinary a member of the secular clergy, who is then appointed pastor and receives his salary from the religious house. This arrangement was sometimes made to support religious houses or colleges.[7] Note that the clergyman to be presented for appointment must belong to the diocesan clergy and that he obtains his spiritual jurisdiction from the local Ordinary, upon whom he is entirely dependent as to pastoral rights. The clergyman presented by the religious superior, if he has the necessary qualifications, must be appointed by the bishop, who would otherwise infringe upon the rights of the religious.[8]

§ 2. If a parish is incorporated pleno iure with a religious community by the Holy See,[9] the religious superior may designate one of his subjects to take charge of the same; but the local Ordinary has the right to subject the appointee to an examination and to give him his canon-

6 See can. 452.

7 S. C. C., Sept. 20, 1727; Jan. 30, 1740; Sept. 20, 1692 (Richter, Trid., p. 367, nn. 2 ff.)

8 S. C. C., July 18, 1761, et pluries (Richter, l. c., p. 53, n. 11 ff.).

9 See can. 456.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ical appointment.[10] Besides, the pastor religiosus is subject to the jurisdiction, coercive power, and visitation of the local Ordinary in whatever belongs to the care of souls, as explained under can. 631.

TRANSFER OF SECULAR PAROCHIAL BENEFICES

CAN. 1426

For reasons of necessity, or great and evident utility, Ordinaries may transfer the seat of a secular parochial benefice to another place within the boundaries of the same parish; but other benefices they may transfer to the mother church, or to another church of the same or a nearby place, only if the church in which said benefices were founded, has collapsed and cannot be restored. If such a transfer has to take place, the altars or chapels should, if possible, be erected in the church to which the benefice was transferred under the same titles which they had in the original benefice, and all the revenues and burdens of the former church are transferred to the latter.

DIVISION OF PARISHES

CAN. 1427

§ 1. Possunt etiam Ordinarii ex iusta et canonica causa paroecias quaslibet, invitis quoque earum rectoribus et sine populi consensu, dividere, vicariam perpetuam vel novam paroeciam erigentes, aut earum territorium dismembrare.

§ 2. Causa canonica ut divisio aut dismembratio paroeciae fieri possit, ea tantum est, si aut magna sit diffi-

10 If the religious has not obtained this appointment, the bishop may recall him at any time; S. C. C., Nov. 10, 1734 (Richter, l. c., p. 54, n. 21).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cultas accedendi ad ecclesiam paroecialem, aut nimia sit paroecianorum multitudo, quorum bono spirituali subveniri nequeat ad normam can. 476, § 1.

§ 3. Paroeciam dividens, Ordinarius debet vicariae perpetuae aut paroeciae noviter erectae congruam portionem assignare, servato praescripto can. 1500; quae, nisi aliunde haberi queat, desumi debet ex reditibus ad ecclesiam matricem quoquo modo pertinentibus, dummodo sufficientes reditus eidem matrici ecclesiae remaneant.

§ 4. Si vicaria perpetua aut nova paroecia dotetur ex reditibus ecclesiae a qua dividitur, debet matrici honorem deferre modo et finibus ab Ordinario praestituendis; qui tamen vetatur baptismalem fontem matrici ipsi reservare.

§ 5. Divisa paroecia quae ad aliquam religionem iure spectat, vicaria perpetua aut paroecia noviter erecta non est religiosa; pariter divisa paroecia iuris patronatus, nova paroecia est liberae collationis.

It is evident that this canon refers not only to benefices in the strictly canonical sense of the word, but also to parishes and quasi-parishes. We say, this is evident, because not only this canon, but also can. 476, § 8, expressly mentions parishes. Hence this canon is law also in the United States.

§ 1. Ordinaries may, for a just and canonical reason, divide parishes of any kind by establishing a perpetual chaplaincy or a new parish, or dismembering the territory of such parishes; and they may do so even against the will of the rectors of the parishes, and without the consent of the people.

This part of our canon should create no difficulty, since the right of the Ordinary to divide or dismember parishes

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was established by the Decretals as well as by the Council of Trent.[11] However, there is a canonical hitch concerning parishes which belong (pleno iure) to religious. According to can. 1425, § 2, such a parish is a "religious parish," and can. 1422 strictly reserves the division and dismembration of religious benefices to the Apostolic See. Can. 1427 speaks of quaslibet paroecias, whilst can. 1422 uses quaelibet in speaking of division or dismembration. Here, then, two canons seem to clash. However, we may apply here the juridical axiom: "generi per speciem derogatur," which finds its application whenever general and specific terms occur[12] in the same law. Taken in this light, the genus would be benefice, and the species, parish. Consequently, the general rule of can. 1422 would suffer an exception as to parishes. This is probably the mind of the lawgiver, because Ordinaries with regard to parishes have intentionem fundatam in iure. This was also the guiding principle of that passage of "Romanos Pontifices" which refers to parishes in England, subsequently applied to the U. S.,[13] and does not question the right of Ordinaries to divide parishes belonging to regulars. The necessity of abiding by all the formalities was the real point under discussion, and the Constitution decided that these are not strictly required because the missions in England (and the U. S.) are not parishes erected according to the rules of canon law. From this it may be seen that the practice of the Roman Court[14] gives free sway to our Ordinaries and those of England (and other countries, too) in the matter of dividing or dismembering parishes of religious. However, 11 C. 3, X, III, 48; Trid., Sess. 21, c. 4; Sess. 24, c. 13, De Ref.

12 Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Axioma 107 (ed. Lugd., 1660, p. 72 f.).

13 May 8, 1881; extended to the U. S. in 1885 (Coll. P. F., n. 1552).

14 See S. C. C., June 22, 1743 (Richter, Trid., p. 117, n. 5).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

since an incorporated parish of religious can only be obtained by the Holy See (can. 452; can. 1425), it would seem rather presumptuous for an Ordinary to proceed to a division or dismembration without informing the Apostolic See. This seems at least a reasonable assumption, especially since the boundaries of every religious parish are accepted and sanctioned by the Holy See.[15]

§ 2. The sole canonical reasons for dividing or dismembering a parish are: great difficulty on the part of the people to come to the parish church or impossibility of properly attending to their spiritual needs because of too great a number.

Note the expression "ea tantum"; only the two reasons mentioned are acknowledged as canonical. Hence a desire to create more parishes within a city or diocese cannot be considered a canonical reason for dividing the existing parishes. The distance has been sometimes described in Roman decisions[16] as of one or two hours (to be walked, of course), sometimes as 1500 passus (about a mile and a quarter), sometimes three Italian miles, sometimes simply a long and arduous way, especially if impeded by a torrent or river.

The phrase "too great a number" is relative; it means, if the spiritual welfare of the faithful suffers because there are too many souls to be taken care of. In 1905 and 1907 the S. Congregation[17] decided the case of a parish in charge of the Capuchins, which numbered about 6,500 souls and was well taken care of, but divided by the Ordinary. The S. Congregation first refused to sanction the 15 This information, of course, is not required ad validitatem.

16 S. C. C., June 22, 1743; Sept. 27, 1732; Jan. 29, 1735, etc. (Richter, Trid., 117, nn. 5 ff.); a distance of 30 miles would certainly be sufficient; S. C. C., March 28, 1903 (Anal. Eccl., XI, 116 ff.).

17 S. C. C., Jan. 21, 1905; July 27, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., XIII, 23 ff.; XV, 338 ff.); a legacy of 30,000 lire was promised to the newly erected church.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

decree, but new reasons advanced by the episcopal court finally led to a ratification of the same. However, neither the distance [18] from church nor the number [19] of parishioners has ever been definitely settled by the Roman authorities, and it would be futile, therefore, to try to determine either. Local circumstances must be considered and the welfare of souls looked to as the supreme law. The latter does not, however, demand that a flourishing congregation, say of four or five hundred or more families be broken up for the sake of a few "kickers" or to make a vain display of parishes. The fact that old parishes are sometimes loaded down with debts and new parishes often require heavy sacrifices should be duly taken into account.[20] The faithful should not be needlessly burdened, especially in critical times such as ours. A parish with 300 or 400 families who live within a radius of about one mile and a half with good roads or streets, and sometimes street railways and automobiles, can easily be taken care of by the pastor with the aid of one or two assistants and certainly does not call for dismembration, unless perhaps dangerous tracks, or factories, or undesirable quarters would have to be passed by a considerable number of the parishioners.

§ 3. The Ordinary, when he divides a parish, must assign sufficient revenues or provide in some other way (see can. 1500), for the new parish or chaplaincy. If no other source of revenue is available to provide the new parish with sufficient funds, these must be taken from the 18 A distance of one Italian mile has never been considered sufficient for dismembration; see Anal. Eccl., XIII, 27.

19 One parish had 26,000 souls (= about 5,000 families), which number appeared too great for one pastor with his assistants to attend to properly; S. C. C., Jan. 25, 1879 (A. S. S., XIII, 287 ff.)

20 This reason was also advanced in the petition mentioned above of 1905 and 1907.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mother church, provided, however, that a sufficient income is left to the latter. Of course, this holds also if the new parish was detached from a religious parish. Here it is not superfluous to remark that the accounts of a parish in charge of religious should be kept strictly separate from those of the monastery. If there are any accrued funds, the salary to the pastor, as well as the expenses for the upkeep of the church and divine worship must first be deducted, and if anything is then left, the old parish is bound to share it with the newly erected one.

But what if there are debts on the old parish? Here the injustice of some divisions becomes apparent. As it is entitled to a share of the revenues, the new parish has to share also the debts,[21] for it would be unjust to saddle a debt which was calculated for 400 or more families, on 150 or even less.

§ 4. If the chaplaincy or new parish is endowed from the revenues of the old, the latter, as the mother church, is entitled to certain marks of honor, which should be determined by the Ordinary, who, however, is not allowed to reserve the right of the baptismal font to the mother church. Sometimes a candle had to be offered, sometimes the baptismal water had to be gotten from the mother church,[22] but the latter practice is now forbidden, and justly so, for a parish without a baptismal font is badly handicapped. The bishop may decide what signs of honor should be paid, for instance, a procession, an invitation to preach, etc.

§ 5. A parish detached from one which belongs to religious, does not become a religious parish, and the relig-

21 See can. 1500, which confirms what is said in the text.

22 S. C. C., Sept. 20, 1879; April 24, 1880 (A. S. S., XIII, 298, 514 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google ious may not claim it, but to obtain it need the recommendation of the bishop and a papal indult.[23]

CAN. 1428

§ 1. Locorum Ordinarii uniones, translationes, divisiones, dismembrationes beneficiorum ne faciant nisi per authenticam scripturam, auditis Capitulo cathedrali et iis, si qui sint, quorum intersit, praesertim rectoribus ecclesiarum.

§ 2. Unio, translatio, divisio, dismembratio facta sine canonica causa irrita est.

§ 3. Adversus decretum Ordinarii unientis, transferentis, dividentis aut dismembrantis beneficia, datur in devolutivo tantum recursus ad Sanctam Sedem.

Can. 1428 mentions certain formalities which the local Ordinaries must observe when they unite, transfer, divide, or dismember benefices. One of these is that an authentic document be drawn up, signed, and sealed with the diocesan seal. The other formality consists in hearing the advice of the chapter; or, with us, of the diocesan consultors, which is to be given collegialiter, i. e., at a meeting.[24] Besides, the bishop must also summon all those who are interested in the transaction, viz., the parishioners or their representatives, and especially the rectors of the churches. However, if these formalities (viz., writing, obtaining the advice of the consultors, hearing the parishioners and pastors) were omitted, it would not affect the validity of the act.[25]

23 Cfr. Leo XIII, Romanos Pontifices, May 8, 1881; S. C. C., Jan. 25, 1879, (A. S. S., XII, 287 ff.).

24 Formerly the consent of the chapter was required for validity (Wernz, l. c., II, n. 267, p. 367), though in this country only the advice of the consultors and the rector of the mission needed to be obtained; Conc. Balt. III, n. 20.

25 Cfr. A. S. S., III, 396 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. A union, transfer, division, or dismembration made without a canonical reason is invalid, because every such act involves a change in the status of a church or benefice, and is therefore a species of alienation which no one inferior to the Supreme Pontiff can validly perform without a reason.[26] Therefore if neither the distance nor the number of parishioners demands a division, it is invalid.

§ 3. If the Ordinary deems the reason just and canonical, whilst the greater part of the congregation and the old pastor think it unjustified, the union, transfer, division, or dismembration takes effect, but recourse is open to the Holy See. This recourse, however, is not properly an appeal, and, therefore, does not suspend the effect of the episcopal decree, but devolves the matter on the S. C. Concilii.[27]

PENSIONS

CAN. 1429

§ 1. Beneficiis quibuslibet nequeunt Ordinarii locorum pensiones perpetuas aut temporarias imponere quae ad vitam pensionarii durent, sed possunt, dum beneficium conferunt, ex iusta causa in ipso collationis actu exprimenda, eisdem imponere pensiones temporarias, quae durent ad vitam beneficiarii, salva huic congrua portione.

§ 2. Beneficiis autem paroecialibus non possunt, nisi in commodum parochi vel vicarii eiusdem paroeciae a munere abeuntis, imponere pensiones, quae tamen ne excedant tertiam partem reditus paroeciae, quibusvis deductis expensis et incertis reditibus.

§ 3. Pensiones beneficiis sive a Romano Pontifice

26 C. 8, X, III, 5.

27 C. 3, X, III, 48; Benedict XIV, "Ad Militantis," March 30, 1742, §§ 11, 16, 32; Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sive ab aliis collatoribus impositae, cessant morte pensionarii, qui tamen nequit eas alienare, nisi id expresse concessum sit.

An ecclesiastical pension may be called an annual allowance from an ecclesiastical benefice, granted by the competent authority either to its former holder, or to a stranger, generally for some service rendered to the benefice itself, or to the beneficiary, or at least to the church.

A pension is personal if paid by the ecclesiastical beneficiary; real if incumbent on the benefice itself. If a real pension is attached to a benefice in such a way that not only the present pensionary, but after his death others are entitled to the pension, it is a strictly perpetual pension, whereas one paid during the lifetime of the pensionary only is called relatively perpetual, and one paid during the lifetime of the beneficiary, although paid from the benefice itself, is called temporary.[28]

§ 1 rules that the local Ordinaries may not impose on any kind of benefice either perpetual or temporary pensions, which last during the lifetime of the pensionary, but may, when conferring a benefice, for a just reason to be mentioned in the act of bestowal, impose a temporary pension to be paid during the lifetime of the beneficiary, provided, however, the latter's income is safeguarded.

§ 2. On parochial benefices the Ordinaries can impose pensions only in favor of a pastor or substitute (coadiutor) when he leaves his office (as rector or pastor emeritus). But the amount of this pension shall never exceed the third part of the entire parish revenues, after all expenses and uncertain revenues have been deducted.

Note the expression "parish revenues," which is not 28 Traces of pensions are found in the acts of the Council of Chalceton, A. D. 451; they were increased after separate parish and canon's benefices had been introduced; Wernz, l. c., II, n. 321, p. 433.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

synonymous with the "pastor's revenues." Hence in our country only the pew-rent, plate and house collections, sure subscriptions, and perhaps interest from money loaned out would have to be considered. From these revenues the current expenses for the pastor's salary and the upkeep of the church, etc., may be deducted.

§ 3. Pensions imposed on benefices either by the Roman Pontiff, or by other collators, cease with the death of the pensioner, who, unless expressly empowered to do so, may not alienate his pension.

TRANSFORMATION

CAN. 1430

Benefices that have the cure of souls attached to them cannot be transformed by the Ordinaries into such as have no such charge, nor can religious benefices be changed into secular ones, or vice versa. On the other hand, simple benefices may be changed into curate ones, provided there be no express stipulation to the contrary on the part of the founder.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

BESTOWAL OF BENEFICES

CAN. 1431

The Roman Pontiff, being the supreme authority and endowed with universal jurisdiction, may confer benefices in the whole Church and reserve their collation to himself. This proposition is directed against the libelous book of Eybel, which is full of invectives against the Holy See from the point of view of the Febronian and Josephinist schools.[1]

CARDINALS AND ORDINARIES

CAN. 1432

§ 1. Cardinals may confer benefices in their titular churches or deaneries, and Ordinaries in their own dioceses, because they have the priority or right in their favor (habent intentionem fundatam in iure).[2]

§ 2. The vicar general, however, cannot confer benefices unless he has received a special commission for this purpose by his bishop. The Vicar-Capitular or Administrator, however, can confer parochial benefices, but only

1 The book: Was ist der Papst? was put on the index, and Pius VI, Nov. 28, 1876, issued a special Brief, "Super Soliditate"; see Denzinger, n. 1303.

2 This is truly called a presumption in law, which has the effect that the bishop in our case is released from proving his right, and the burden of proving it against the bishop devolves on the plaintiff or the one who disputes the bishop's right; see Reiffenstuel, II, tit. 23, n. 45.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

according to can. 455, § 2, n. 3; other perpetual benefices he may not confer at all, on account of can. 436.

§ 3. If the Ordinary does not make an appointment to a vacant benefice within six months from the time when the vacancy became known to him, the right of making the appointment passes to the Apostolic See, unless (can. 458) special reasons permit a delay, and an administrator is left in the place.

Can. 1433

Can. 1433 reserves the appointment of coadjutors to beneficiaries, with or without the right of succession, to the Apostolic See. But this reservation does not apply to the temporary coadjutors and assistants mentioned in canons 475 and 476.

BENEFICES RESERVED TO THE HOLY SEE

Can. 1434–1435

Benefices reserved to the Apostolic See cannot be validly conferred by inferior prelates, for instance, bishops.

Besides all consistorial benefices and dignitaries in cathedral and collegiate chapters (can. 396, § 1) the following are reserved to the Apostolic See, even though the latter be vacant:

1.° All benefices, including curata, which become vacant by the promotion, resignation, or transfer of cardinals, papal legates, the higher officials (assessor, prefect, secretary, subsecretary, regent) of the Roman Congregations, tribunals and offices of the Roman Court and the papal household, even though they be purely honorary.

2.° All benefices which, though founded outside the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Roman Court, become vacant by the death of the beneficiary in the city of Rome.[3]

3.° All benefices invalidly conferred by reason of simony.

4.° Finally all benefices in which the Roman Pontiff, either himself or through a delegate, is interested for one of the following reasons:

(a) Because he had declared the election to the benefice null and void;

(b) Because he had forbidden the electors to proceed to an election;

(c) Because he had accepted the resignation of the incumbent;

(d) Because he had promoted, transferred, or deprived the beneficiary of his benefice:

(e) Because he had given the benefice in commendam.

No manual benefices, or such of lay or mixed advowson (iurispatronatus) are reserved, unless expressly stated.

As to the bestowal of benefices founded in Rome, the particular laws in force there must be observed.[4]

ACCEPTANCE

CAN. 1436–1437

No benefice can be validly conferred on a cleric who is unwilling to accept it, or who does not expressly declare his acceptance of the same.

No one can bestow a benefice upon himself, because the one who bestows and the one who accepts must be different persons.[5] This is true also of a clergyman whose father holds a benefice.[6] Hence, for instance, a 3 This is part of Regula XIX of the Cancellaria Apostolica.

4 S. Pius V, "Intolerabilis," June 1, 1569, § 8.

5 C. 7, X, III, 7.

6 C. 15, X, III, 38; there is not much danger of this, except in case of advowson.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 0 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bishop cannot validly bestow a benefice of his own diocese upon himself; an abbot cannot be a canon of a cathedral or collegiate chapter, even though it be a simple canonicate.[7] Consequently, too, an abbot cannot confer upon himself a parish benefice, nor could the bishop validly give it to him, even though he has all the necessary qualities.

PROVISION TO BE MADE FOR LIFE

CAN. 1438

All secular benefices must be conferred for life, unless the will of the founder, or an immemorable custom, or a special indult rules otherwise.

QUALITIES OF BENEFICIARIES

CAN. 1439

§ 1. No clergyman is capable of accepting or holding several benefices, either in his own name, or in commendam (see. can. 156).

§ 2. Benefices, the obligations of which the beneficiary cannot fulfil personally, as well as benefices of which one suffices for the decent support of the incumbent, are incompatible.

NO DEDUCTIONS PERMISSIBLE

CAN. 1440–1441

"Ecclesiastical benefices must be conferred without diminution," was the complete and authentic title of one of the Decretals (III, 12), and the commentators comprised under this heading the imposing of new burdens, [7] S. C. C., March 3, 1880 (A. S. S., XIII, 461).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

division, dismemberment and suppression of benefices.[8] Our canon exclusively intends the first only, viz., the imposition of new burdens. These may be of two kinds: spiritual and temporal. By law, then, the bishops may not impose new obligations which would burden either the office holder or the benefice, if these obligations are not mentioned in the original grant.

Such new burdens would be the duty of performing pastoral work, saying more Masses than required, etc., etc. No such burdens may be imposed, although the beneficiaries may be asked to assume them, if necessary.[9]

Temporal obligations would be the giving up of part of the revenues, of charges for certain purposes, etc. All such are forbidden and savor of simony.

Can. 1441 forbids and reprobates as simoniacal all deductions made from the revenues, all compensations and payments in the act of preferment, no matter whether they accrue to the appointer, or to the advowee, or to others.[10]

ON WHOM BENEFICES MAY BE CONFERRED

CAN. 1442

Secular benefices may be conferred on secular clerics only, religious benefices only on religious of the institute to which the benefice belongs.

Hence a benefice belonging, e. g., to the Franciscans should not be conferred on a Benedictine, and vice versa. This rule also holds with regard to prelacies,[11] and must 8 Cfr. Engel, III, 12, n. 1 f.

9 Wernz, l. c., II, n. 321, p. 430 f.

10 C. un. X, III, 12; cc. 8, 9, 41, 44, V, 3; Trid., Sess. 24, c. 14, de Ref.

11 C. 1, Clem. I, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be observed when a higher superior confers a benefice [12] by devolutive right.

INSTALLATION

CAN. 1443–1445

No one shall take possession of a benefice conferred upon him, on his own authority, or before he has made profession of faith, if the benefice requires such profession. In regard to non-consistorial benefices, the right of installation belongs to the local Ordinary, who may, however, delegate another ecclesiastic,— generally the rural dean.

The manner in which installation should take place is prescribed by particular — for instance, diocesan — statutes, or by custom, and the prescribed rite must be observed unless the Ordinary has granted a written dispensation, in which case the dispensation takes the place of the formal installation.

The installation may be performed by proxy if a special mandate to that effect has been issued by the appointee.

PRESCRIPTION AND TITULUS COLORATUS

CAN. 1446

If a cleric who possesses a benefice is able to prove that he has had peaceful possession of the same for three full years and in good faith, the benefice is his by prescription, even though his title was invalid, provided, however, that no simony was committed.

Concerning the application of prescription to benefices, there was a controversy among canonists [13]; our Code has 12 C. un. Clem. I, 5.

13 Cfr. Reiffenstuel II, 26, n. 35.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google adopted the affirmative view, under certain conditions, viz.:

(a) The possession must have been peaceful, with no suit pending;

(b) This peaceful possession must have lasted three full years, without interruption;

(c) The possessor must have been honestly ignorant of the fact that he held the benefice unlawfully; and

(d) No simony must have been committed either by him or his proxy.

All this the incumbent has to prove by witnesses or documents. If he succeeds, the benefice is his, even though his original title was doubtful for some reason, for instance, that he was appointed by the administrator or vicar-general against the common law. This benefit is granted to avoid unnecessary litigation.[14]

A LITIGANT BENEFICE

CAN. 1447

To understand this canon it is necessary to know what a petitory and a possessory trial is. A petitory trial turns about the question whether a title or claim is just and valid, whilst in a possessory trial the plaintiff claims the object or right, or asks that he be not disturbed in its possession. A "peacefully possessed benefice" is one that is not disputed, either as to title or as to actual possession (de iure et facto possessum).

The text rules that the one who claims a benefice that is peacefully possessed by another, on the supposition or pretence that it is vacant, must clearly state in his petition the name of the possessor, how long he has been in possession, and the particular reason why he has no right to the benefice. But the benefice cannot be conferred upon the plaintiff or claimant before a petitory trial has cleared up the title. For the general rule is that only benefices which are vacant by right and in fact (de iure et facto) can be validly conferred.

14 C. un. Clem. II, 6, but only ad argumenti instar.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

IUSPATRONATUS OR ADVOWSON

The iuspatronatus arose from a transfer of landlordism, plus feudalism, to ecclesiastical soil. The Church accepted the protection of the civil power as well as that of laymen who should have been her patrons (advocati, hence advowson), but frequently played the part of oppressors and robbers. In course of time certain spiritual rights were granted to lay benefactors,[1] chief among them the right of presenting candidates for ecclesiastical benefices and some honorary and material privileges. If the balance betwen advantages and disadvantages accruing to the Church from advowson were fairly drawn, we believe the latter would exceed the former. Hence we need not be surprised that the Code is not very enthusiastic in this matter, as is apparent from can. 1449, which defines, divides, and limits the iuspatronatus.

CAN. 1448

The iuspatronatus is the sum total of the privileges and obligations that belong, by ecclesiastical authority, to Catholic founders of churches, chapels, or benefices, and 1 A Latin verse comprises the reasons for admitting advowson thus: Patronum faciunt dos, aedificatio, fundus; see the commentators on the Decretats III, 38; also Wernz, Ius Decret., III, n. 401 pp. There is no mention of the iuspatronatus in the Acta Conc. Balt. III; Conc. Balt. II (n. 184) according to Prov. Balt. I (1829) rejects the iuspatronatus in this country (Coll. Lac. III, p. 27).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

also to such as have obtained a canonical title from the founders.

The ecclesiastical authority alone can connect a material right or favor with a spiritual right, such as presentation radically is. Whether this is done explicitly or implicity is irrelevant.

The founder must be a Catholic, as shall be seen from can. 1543, although it must be confessed that in Hungary, even Jews tried to obtain the iuspatronatus. The term founder must not be too strictly interpreted. It includes not only the original or first founder, endower, maintainer, but also those who have restored a church, chapel, or benefice.

"Qui ab illis causam habent," means that the iuspatronatus may be obtained not only by a direct privilege or prescription, but also by succession, donation, exchange, and sale; not directly, but indirectly, by reason of another right. That obligations correspond to the privileges is evident, because these two terms are always correlative.

CAN. 1449

The iuspatronatus is real if attached to an object or thing, as, for instance, real estate, or a building, or an office. It is personal if it inheres in a person. It is ecclesiastical if the title itself is ecclesiastical, for instance, a church, a prebend, an office. It is laical (lay patronage) if the title is secular, for instance, a civil office or right like that of inheritance. It is mixed if it springs from both an ecclesiastical and a civil title, for instance, if a pastor has the right of presentation as pastor and as a member of a certain family. It is hereditary if it is obtained through succession or by last will. It is a family patronage if it remains among, and is limited to, the next descendants.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:1 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

It is a clan patronage if it extends to all the descendants comprised by the name gens, tribe, or clan, for instance, all the O'Rourkes. It is mixed if one or more of the above-mentioned titles concur.[2]

CAN. 1450–1451

No patronage can be established validly on any title in future. Local Ordinaries may, however,

(a) Grant to those of the faithful who build churches or found benefices, either entirely or in part, a claim to spiritual suffrages in proportion to their generosity, either for a certain time, or forever; for instance, a founded Mass or office;

(b) Admit the foundation of a benefice on condition that for the first time the founder himself, if he is a clergyman, be appointed to the benefice or another clergyman presented by him.

Local Ordinaries should endeavor to induce patrons to abdicate their iuspatronatus, or at least the right of presentation, in exchange for spiritual suffrages for themselves and their families. If a patron is unwilling to cede the iuspatronatus, this can be exercised only in accordance with the following canons.

POPULAR PATRONAGE

CAN. 1452

Elections and presentations to parochial benefices by the people (i. e., congregations, as for instance, in Switzerland) can be tolerated only if the people elect one of three candidates designated by the local Ordinary. Hence

2 The distinction between familiare and gentilitium is not explained in the same way by all writers.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

neither the government, nor the municipality, nor the congregation as such, are allowed to reject all three candidates proposed by the Ordinary.

TRANSMISSION OF PATRONAGE

CAN. 1453

A personal iuspatronatus cannot be validly transmitted, either by inheritance, donation, change or sale, to infidels, public apostates, heretics, schismatics, members of secret societies condemned by the Church, or to any one who is under a declaratory or condemnatory sentence of excommunication.

That a personal iuspatronatus may be validly transmitted to others, the written consent of the Ordinary is required, with due regard to the last will of the founder, which, once accepted, must be kept sacred.

If a real patronage passes to any of the above-named persons it remains suspended, viz., until said person becomes reconciled to the Church.

AUTHENTIC PROOF REQUIRED

CAN. 1454

No iuspatronatus can be admitted unless it is established by an authentic document or other lawful proofs, as seen in Book IV.

PRIVILEGES OF PATRONS

CAN. 1455

The privileges of patrons are the following:

1.° To present a clergyman (not a layman) for a vacant church or benefice;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° To obtain support from the revenues of the church or benefice, if there are any left, should he (the patron) become reduced to poverty without his fault. This claim remains even if the patron has renounced the advowson in favor of the church, or if a pension was by mutual agreement reserved to the patron but proves insufficient for his support. However, this equitable right can be claimed only if the patron has complied with his obligations as advowee, and the beneficiary has a decent support.

3.° To enjoy certain honorary prerogatives, where these are customary. These prerogatives are:

(a) To have his family coat-of-arms placed in the church;

(b) To precede all other laymen at processions and other similar functions;

(c) To occupy a more prominent seat in the church, but outside the sanctuary and without a canopy.

Sometimes two swings of the censer at the incensation are permitted.

WIFE AND MINORS

CAN. 1456

A wife exercises the iuspatronatus herself, children who are not yet of age, through their parents or guardians; if the parents or guardians are non-Catholics, the patronage remains suspended until the minors come of age, or the parents or guardians become Catholics.

TIME OF PRESENTATION

CAN. 1457–1458

The presentation for a vacant benefice, whether lay, ecclesiastical, or mixed, must, if there be no obstacle,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be made within at least four months from the day on which the collator, i. e., generally the local Ordinary, has notified the patron of the vacancy, and from among the priests who have successfully passed the concursus, if the benefice requires a concursus.

Exceptions to this rule are:

(a) Any legitimate obstacle which prevents the patron from making the presentation, e. g., illness, or suspension, or a journey to Rome [3];

(b) The fact that a shorter time is prescribed either by the will of the founder or by lawful prescription.

If no presentation has been made within the prescribed time, the church or benefice becomes, for this time only, one of free collation, i. e., the Ordinary can appoint whom he pleases, without consulting the patron. But if a quarrel or dispute arises during the four months, concerning the right of presentation, either between the Ordinary and the patron, or between different advowees, or about the candidates, who of them should be accepted, the appointment must be suspended until the controversy is settled, and, if necessary, an administrator (oeconomus) shall be appointed by the Ordinary for the church or benefice.

COLLEGIATE PRESENTATION

CAN. 1459–1460

§ 1. If several individuals are patrons, they may agree among themselves, both for themselves and for their successors, to exercise the right of presentation alternately.

§ 2. But in order to be valid this agreement must have the written consent of the Ordinary, which consent, when once given, cannot be validly revoked against the will of

[3] C. 5, X, III, 8; formerly ecclesiastical patrons had six, lay patrons only four months for making the presentation; c. 22, X, III, 38.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the patrons either by the Ordinary himself or by his successor.

Whilst canon 1459 treats of patrons severally, can. 1460 mentions a body or college of patrons, which may be a corporation, for instance, a monastery or university which possesses the iuspatronatus. For such collegiate presentation the following rules are laid down:

§ 1. If the advowson is exercised by a college or body of patrons, the candidate who obtains the majority of votes, according to can. 101, § 1, must be considered as chosen or presented. After two ballots have been cast without result, all those are to be considered as presented who obtain a majority in the third ballot, even though they receive the same number of votes.

§ 2. The same principle is applied to a non-collegiate body, i. e., when several patrons have an individual right of presentation. If they cannot agree as to alternate presentation, the candidate who obtains at least a relative majority of the votes cast by the litigant patrons is regarded as presented, and if several candidates are selected with the same number of votes, they must all be considered as presented.

§ 3. He who is entitled to exercise a patronage on various grounds, (for instance as founder, endower, builder, or by reason of inheritance) enjoys as many votes as he has titles.

§ 4. Every patron may, before the presentation is accepted, present more than one candidate, either at once or successively, because the ius ad rem is not yet acquired; but he must present these candidates within the prescribed time and not exclude those whom he presented first.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CANDIDATES

CAN. 1461–1464

No one, even though he be a clergyman and the most worthy candidate available, can present himself, nor vote with others in order to obtain the number of votes necessary for presentation. To do this would savor of ambition, and is forbidden, even by proxy.[4]

The patron, even if he be a layman, can not present for a church or benefice a cleric who has not successfully passed the concursus, whenever this is required.

The candidate to be presented must be fit, i. e., he must have all the qualities required by common law, or particular statutes, or the charter of foundation on the day when the presentation is made, or at least on the day when he accepts the presentation. The qualities required by common law are laid down in Book II of our Code.

The presentation must be made to the local Ordinary, to whom it appertains to judge whether the candidate is fit.

To form his judgment the Ordinary shall make inquiry about the candidate,[5] and obtain information, if necessary in secret.

The Ordinary is not obliged to manifest to the patron the reasons for rejecting a candidate.

He may do so, but cannot be compelled, because compulsion might involve unnecessary odium.

4 Cc. 15, 26, X, III, 38; Reiffenstuel, h. t., n. 72.

5 See can. 149.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 2 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

REJECTION OF THE CANDIDATE PRESENTED

CAN. 1465

§ 1. If the candidate is found unfit, i. e., if he lacks the qualities required (can. 1463) and is therefore rejected by the Ordinary, the patron (no matter whether he be an ecclesiastical or a lay advowee), provided the four months have not elapsed through his own negligence or carelessness, may present another candidate within another four months. If this one, too, is found unfit, the Ordinary may, for this occasion, freely appoint one of his own choice, and we believe he not only may but should make use of this right, unless the patron has recourse to the Holy See within ten days from the day when he was notified of the rejection. If recourse is taken, this fact must naturally be communicated to the Ordinary. Pending a decision, the benefice remains vacant. In the mean time, the Ordinary shall, if necessary, appoint an oeconomus to the vacant church or benefice.

§ 2. A presentation tarnished with the stain of simony is null and void by law, and the same rule holds of the subsequent installation of the candidate by the Ordinary.

EFFECT OF ACCEPTED PRESENTATION

CAN. 1466–1468

Every candidate who has been lawfully presented and found fit, by accepting presentation, obtains the right (ius ad rem) to be canonically installed.

The right to grant canonical institution belongs to the local Ordinary, but not to the Vicar-General, unless he has obtained a special mandate to that effect.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

If several candidates have been lawfully presented, and all are proved fit, the Ordinary may choose from among them the one whom he deems most suitable or worthy.

The canonical installation for any and every benefice, even if it has no cure of souls attached to it, should take place two months from the date of presentation, unless a legitimate obstacle prevents.

If the candidate presented resigns his right or dies before the canonical installation has taken place, the patron again has the right of presentation, to be exercised, as before, within four months.

OBLIGATIONS OF PATRONS

CAN. 1469

§ 1. The burdens or obligations of patrons are the following:

1.° To notify the local Ordinary if the property of the church or benefice is suffering material damage, without, however, meddling in the administration of the same;

2.° To rebuild a church if it has collapsed, or to make the repairs that are judged necessary by the Ordinary, if the advowson was obtained by reason of having built the church and this burden of repairing or rebuilding is not incumbent on others, according to can. 1186.

3.° If the patronage is based upon the title of endowment, the patron must supply new revenues in case the old revenues of the church or benefice become so insufficient, that either divine worship cannot be properly kept up, or the benefice cannot be conferred.

§ 2. In case the church has collapsed, or is in need of urgent repair, or if the endowment has become insufficient, the iuspatronatus remains suspended until the patron is able or willing to comply with his obligation.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 3. If the patron rebuilds or repairs the church, or supplies the needed revenues, the iuspatronatus within the time set by the Ordinary, revives; otherwise it ceases ipso iure and without any declaration after the expiration of the term.

LOSS OF THE IUSPATRONATUS

CAN. 1470

§ 1. The iuspatronatus is lost, as we have seen in the preceding canon, if the patron fails to rebuild, repair, or re-endow the benefice. It may also cease for one of the following reasons:

1.° If the patron renounces his right; this renunciation may be either total or partial; but if one of several individual patrons gives up his right, no prejudice is thereby created to the others.

2.° If the Holy See revokes the right or permanently suppresses the church or benefice.

3.° If there is a legitimate prescription against the patron. This is but another form of tacit resignation.

4.° If the property or office in which the iuspatronatus inheres perishes; or the family, clan (gens) or line to whom the advowson was reserved, dies out. In this latter case the patronage does not become hereditary, nor can the Ordinary validly permit it to pass over to persons not connected by blood relationship with the patron, family, or clan.

5.° If, with the consent of the patron, the church or benefice is united with another, which is of free collation, or if it becomes elective or regular. This, too, is a kind of tacit resignation.[6]

6 Cfr. Santi-Leitner, III, 38, n. 43 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

6.° By crime, as follows:

(a) If the patron attempts, even though unsuccessfully, to transfer his iuspatronatus to another by simony;

(b) If he becomes an apostate, a heretic, or a schismatic;

(c) If he unjustly usurps or retains rights and property belonging to the church or benefice;

(d) If he, either personally or through another, kills the rector or any other cleric attached to the advowson church, or the beneficiary.

§ 2. This last-named crime affects also the heirs, whilst the three first mentioned concern only the patron himself.

§ 3. To incur privation of advowson on account of any of the four crimes mentioned, a declaratory sentence is required and suffices.

§ 4. No one is allowed to exercise the iuspatronatus, or to enjoy its privileges, who has incurred a censure or infamy by law, inflicted by a condemnatory or declaratory sentence, as long as this censure is not removed.

INDULT OF PRESENTATION

CAN. 1471

If the Apostolic See has, either by a concordat or otherwise, granted the privilege of presentation to a vacant church or benefice, this grant must not be construed as iuspatronatus, but the indult must be interpreted strictly according to its tenor. This is clearly intended for countries where the separation of Church and State is not yet in effect, either totally or partially. The interpretation must be applied in a similar manner to concordats.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF BENEFICIARIES

RIGHTS IN GENERAL

CAN. 1472–1473

Every beneficiary, after having taken canonical possession of his benefice, is entitled to all the rights, temporal and spiritual, attached to the same.

These rights are, of course, the rights specially connected with the benefice. Besides these there are the general rights arising from the clerical state, as set forth in can. 118–123, which are by no means curtailed through the fact of one's being installed in a benefice.

Of the temporal rights the foremost is that of enjoying the revenues derived from the benefice, as far as they are needed for the beneficiary's decent support. He is entitled to these revenues even though he may possess other property, but is obliged to devote the superfluous revenues to the poor or to charitable institutions.

Since this canon is undoubtedly intended also for pastors and curates who hold no strictly so called benefices, it may be well to recall the different kinds of clerical property. They are:

(1) Patrimonial, if derived from the cleric's patrimony, e. g., by inheritance;

(2) Quasi-patrimonial, or industrial, if acquired by the clergyman's own industry or diligence, from work

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which has no connection with his benefice, for instance, as a lecturer, a musician, an author;

(3) Parsimonial, if acquired from ecclesiastical or beneficiary revenues by living very frugally, so that something is left over and above the expenditures for decent support;

(4) Beneficiary, if acquired from the benefice after a decent support has been deducted, in other words from the surplus revenues.

What is a decent support must be decided according to the circumstances of time and place. It includes moderate and customary hospitality, which has always been inculcated by the Church, and suitable recreation and provision for old age and inability, for instance, by life insurance or interest-bearing investments.[1]

Our text speaks of superfluous revenues. What are they? Discarding the patrimonial and quasi-patrimonial, there can be question only of parsimonial and strictly beneficiary income. However, since the Code mentions congrua, it is not likely that parsimonial incomes are understood, and canonists generally do not apply the law to them. Hence only the strictly beneficiary revenues, which are left after one has provided for his decent support, can be understood. These are superfluous, and must therefore be applied, as the law says,[2] to the poor or to charitable institutions. Note that this is a strict obligation, not ex mera caritate, but ex iustitia. Our text is quite explicit on this point, since it calls the beneficiary only the usufructary, not the possessor or lord, of his benefice. Usufruct is the right of enjoying a thing

1 Cfr. Santi-Leitner, III, tit. 25, n. 2 f.

2 Cfr. c. 16, X, III, 5; c. 44, X, V, 3; Trid., Sess. 25, cc. 1, 9, de Ref.; Santi-Leitner, III, tit. 25, n. 7, opposes this interpretation, but without a good reason.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:3 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google which is not one's property. This law is very logical, because the right of property in case of a benefice, by a fiction of law, is invested in the juridical entity, which is the benefice itself.

ORDER AND CANONICAL HOURS

CAN. 1474–1475

If a benefice requires the reception of an order, be it minor or major, the beneficiary must receive that order before he can be installed.

§ 1. A beneficiary is obliged faithfully to fulfill the special obligations connected with his benefice, and, besides, to recite the canonical hours daily.

§ 2. If he neglects the obligation of reciting the divine office without a lawful reason, he is bound to make restitution of the revenues received, in proportion to the extent of his culpable omission, and should give the amount due to the church building, or to the diocesan seminary, or to the poor.

The obligation of reciting the divine office (Breviary) has been dealt with in Vol. II of this Commentary. From the decisions of the Holy Office we here supply the following points: One who holds either a chaplaincy or other ecclesiastical benefice cannot comply with the obligation of reciting the divine office through another, on the ground that his time is occupied with literary studies.[3] Nor is the recitation of the entire office on one day sufficient for the next.[4] Those who cannot recite Matin and Lauds, but are able to recite the little hours, are obliged to say the latter.[5]

3 Prop. 21 damn. a S. O., Sept. 24, 1665 (Denzinger, n. 992).

4 Prop. 35 damn. a S. O., March 18, 1666 (ibid., n. 1006).

5 Prop. 54 damn. a S. O., March 4, 1679 (ibid., n. 1071).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The proportion in which restitution is to be made has been declared by Pius V as follows: Those who omit the entire office, lose all their revenues corresponding to the day or days on which this duty was entirely neglected; those who neglect Matins only lose one-half of the revenues; those who omit the rest of the hours, also one-half, and for each single hour the sixth part of the revenues of the respective day.[6] These rules, however, apply only to such beneficiaries as have no other duty than to recite the divine office.[7]

OBLIGATIONS OF ADMINISTRATION

CAN. 1476–1478

§ 1. As guardian of his benefice, the beneficiary must administer the goods belonging to the same according to law.

§ 2. If he has been culpably negligent, he is bound to repair the damage, and the local Ordinary shall compel him to make up for the loss. If the beneficiary is a pastor, he can be removed (can. 2147 ff.).

§ 1. The ordinary expenses of administration and of collecting the revenues must be borne by the beneficiary.

§ 2. Extraordinary expenses incurred for repairing the beneficiary's residence must be borne by those who are obliged to make these repairs, unless the charter of the foundation or mutual stipulation and custom provide otherwise.

§ 3. Minor repairs which the beneficiary has to make at his own expense should be made as soon as possible, to avoid greater ones.

[6] S. Pius V, "Ex proximo," Sept. 20, 1571.

[7] A pastor, for instance, even supposing he were a beneficiary, receives his salary chiefly for pastoral work; and therefore the duty of

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The local Ordinary is obliged to see to it, through the rural deans, that the property belonging to benefices is preserved and properly administered.

LEASES

CAN. 1479

In leasing property belonging to benefices it is not permitted, without the consent of the Ordinary, to demand that the money be paid over six months in advance. In extraordinary cases the Ordinary should provide by appropriate precepts, that such a lease does not result in damage to a pious institution or to the beneficiary's successors.

HOW THE REVENUES ARE TO BE DIVIDED IN CASE OF THE BENEFICIARY'S DEATH

CAN. 1480

In case of death, the yearly revenues must be divided between the beneficiary's successor and predecessor, or their heirs, in proportion to the time either has served the benefice, taking into account all the revenues and expenses. If the predecessor was in office four months, for example, he or his heirs are entitled to one-third of the revenues, minus any obligations that remain unpaid.

However, legitimate custom or particular statutes may provide another mode of distribution.

restitution is reduced to a minimum. Cfr. Noldin, De Praeceptis, 1914, n. 758, f., p. 794, who justly maintains that barely the tenth part of the revenues would have to be restored.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

WHAT IS TO BE DONE IN CASE OF VACANCY

CAN. 1481–1482

All revenues accruing during the vacancy of a benefice go in equal parts to the endowment or common fund, and to the building or vestry (sacristy) of the Church. The expenses, especially the salary of the administrator, may, of course, be deducted.

Lawful custom may permit these funds to be applied to the common good of the diocese.

As to the so-called media annata, i. e., the taxes to be paid for certain benefices from the income of the first year (fructus primi anni), this should be retained wherever it is in vogue, and the peculiar statutes and praiseworthy customs of each diocese or region with regard to the media annata should be upheld.

The media annata, which originated under Boniface VIII, was never introduced into this country.

EPISCOPAL REVENUES

CAN. 1483

The property of the mensa episcopalis shall be carefully administered by the bishop. His residence must be kept in good condition, and if repairs are required, the expenses are to be paid from said mensa, unless others are obliged to defray them.

The bishop shall also take care that an accurate inventory is made of all the movable property belonging to the episcopal residence, and that everything is safely transmitted to his successor.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VI

RESIGNATION AND EXCHANGE OF BENEFICES

RESIGNATION

CAN. 1484–1486

The general principles governing the resignation of beneficiaries are the same as those laid down in can. 184–191, to which we may therefore refer the reader (see Vol. II of this Commentary). The substance of the above three canons is as follows:

1. Since sordid occupations or begging are unbecoming to the clerical state in general,[1] and more particularly to clerics in higher orders, the Ordinary is not allowed to accept the resignation of any cleric in major orders unless he is certain that the beneficiary has other means of procuring a decent support. Proof to this effect must be given before the Ordinary can lawfully accept such a resignation. The oath of the beneficiary alone would not suffice, but at least one trustworthy witness is required and he must testify under oath.[2]

2. This rule holds more especially if the benefice which a cleric wishes to resign, constitutes the title upon which he was ordained (titulus beneficii). Such a resignation would be null and void, unless the beneficiary expressly

1 Trid., Sess. 21, c. 2, de Ref.

2 S. C. P. F., April 18, 1757, ad 1 (Coll., n. 405); S. C. C., Feb. 9, 1726, ad III and IV (Richter, Trid., 113, n. 7).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

stated that he had been ordained to that title and had substituted another legitimate title with the consent of the Ordinary. Two, or rather say, three conditions are therefore required:

(a) An express statement of the title of ordination;

(b) Proof that another title has been substituted, and

(c) The consent of the Ordinary into whose hands the benefice is resigned.

An express statement is one to which no qualification (for instance, "perhaps," "I believe," etc.) is attached.

The consent of the Ordinary must be given by means of a declaration that the substitution has been lawfully made.[3]

A legitimate title is any one of those mentioned in can. 979, and, no doubt, now also one of those enumerated in can. 981, because service and mission have been legitimated by our Code.

A conditional resignation (canon 1486) may be made in favor of another (in commodum aliorum) or under some condition proper which either affects the appointment to the benefice itself, or its revenues, or burdens imposed upon the benefice. Such a resignation in favor of another is strictly forbidden by reason of the danger of introducing hereditary succession.[4] The other kind, too, is here forbidden, and Ordinaries may not accept it.

The provisio beneficii may be affected by a threefold kind of resignation, which the canonists designate by accessus, ingressus, and regressus.

A resignation by accessus is that made by a cleric who has obtained only the ius ad rem, i. e., a claim to the benefice by accepted presentation or nomination.

[3] S. C. C., Feb. 9, 1726 (l. c.).

[4] Trid., Sess. 25, c. 7 de Ref.; S. Pius V, "Quanta Ecclesiae," April 1, 1568; "Intolerabilis," June 1, 1569; this was called a resignation with the clause "non aliter."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A resignation by ingressus is that made by a cleric who has the ius in re, that is to say, the right to hold the benefice, but has not yet taken possession thereof.

A resignation by regressus is that made by a cleric of a benefice which he actually possesses.[5] This, too, is forbidden, for the reason alleged above, and also because of the restriction imposed on the bestower as well as on the patron.

But the Code admits one conditional resignation, viz., that of a benefice disputed either by a petitory or a possessory claim, provided the resignation is made in favor of one of the contestants, in order to end the quarrel.

EXCHANGE OF BENEFICES

CAN. 1487–1488

An exchange is a mutual transfer of equal interests, the one in consideration of the other[6]; and if the objects are ecclesiastical benefices, the exchange is a permutatio beneficiorum.

Such an exchange, says can. 1487, can be made only for a reason involving the necessity or utility of the Church, or for some other just cause, provided, moreover, that both beneficiaries really possess their benefice.[7] Valid exchange further requires:

(a) That no other interested persons suffer a detriment;

(b) That, if the benefice be one of advowson, the consent of the patron be obtained;

(c) That the exchange be made with the permission of the local Ordinary, i. e., the bishop; the Vicar-general

5 Santi-Leitner, I, tit. 9, n. 24.
6 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., II, 323.
7 C. 13, X, II, 25.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

needs a special mandate to ratify such an exchange and the Vicar-Capitular cannot ratify it at all;

(d) That, finally, the exchange be made either in writing or before two witnesses.

The local Ordinary must either refuse his consent or give it within a month, and the exchange is valid from the date of the consent given. But the local Ordinary cannot ratify an exchange if one or both of the benefices involved are reserved to the Holy See; because the latter's right of free collation might thereby be injured.[8]

An exchange supposes benefices of equal or nearly equal value and importance. When two benefices are unequal as to income or other value, an exchange, according to can. 1488, is not permissible if it is made by reserving part of the revenues or the payment or grant of any valuable object, because of the danger of simony. This rule, it appears, comprises all kinds of unequal exchange, between conventual as well as parish benefices, between individuals as well as corporations.[9]

An exchange of benefices cannot be made between more than two beneficiaries. Hence no triangular or quadrangular exchanges are permitted, except by special permission from the Supreme Pontiff.[10]

8 Santi-Leitner, III, 19, n. 8.

9 C. 5, X, III, 19; c. 6, X, III, 19 is antiquated.

10 Reiffenstuel, I, 9, n. 123 ff.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXVI

OTHER NON-CORPORATE ECCLESIASTICAL INSTITUTIONS

CAN. 1489–1494

§ 1. Local Ordinaries may erect hospitals, orphanages and similar institutions destined for religious or charitable (spiritual or temporal) works; they may also endow such institutions with the character of ecclesiastical corporations.

The right of the Church to found such institutions cannot be disputed. This right is set forth in Part VI, which immediately follows. The canonical nomenclature for a hospital, orphanage, or similar institution under ecclesiastical control is domus religiosa, a religious or rather ecclesiastical foundation or house. To deserve this name, an institution must be destined for works of piety or charity by the ecclesiastical authority, i. e., the local Ordinary or an exempt religious superior. An institution founded by private persons without ecclesiastical authority, even though its purpose be sacred, is called merely domus pia.

The text says: et per eius decretum persona iuridica in ecclesia constitui. The corporate character attached to such an institution by the decree of the Ordinary may be taken in a twofold sense: as a corporation proper and as an institute or juridical entity. The corporate character can only be given if the house belongs to a community or religious corporation which owns and administers it,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

either by itself or in the name of the Church. For neither patients nor orphans constitute a corporation; they are merely beneficiaries or destinatarii. In the wider sense, the object (finis) of an institute is, by a legal fiction, the carrier or subject of its rights and duties, i. e., generally the officials or representatives acknowledged by law.

§ 2. Before the local Ordinary gives his approval, or issues a decree, he must assure himself that the foundation is really useful and sufficiently endowed, or that it has prospects of obtaining sufficient funds. If he neglects this duty, the blame falls on the Ordinary, together with such undesirable consequences as debts, etc.

§ 3. In all such institutions the rector or syndic shall administer the temporalities according to the by-laws laid down in the charter. His rights and obligations are the same as those of the administrators of other ecclesiastical property.

The charter must contain an accurate description of the constitution, purpose, endowment, administration, and government of the institution, also of the use to be made of the revenues and who is to succeed to the property in case the institution goes out of existence.

Of the charter and by-laws two copies must be made, one of which is to be kept in the archives of the institution itself, the other in the diocesan court.

The local Ordinary has the right and the duty of visiting all such institutions, even though they are corporations or otherwise exempt.

If non-corporate institutions are in charge of a religious diocesan community, they are entirely (i. e., both in spiritual and temporal matters) subject to the jurisdiction of the local Ordinary; if they are in charge of a pontifical or papal religious community, they are under the supervision of the local Ordinary in whatever concerns faith and morals, pious devotions, and the administration of the Sacraments.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Although a pious or ecclesiastical institution may, in virtue of its charter, or by prescription, or by a papal privilege, have obtained exemption from the jurisdiction and visitation of the local Ordinary, the latter is entitled to demand an account of its affairs, and every contrary custom is hereby reprobated.

If a founder insists that the administrators should not be obliged to render an account to the local Ordinary, the foundation cannot be accepted as an ecclesiastical one.

The local Ordinary shall see to it that the pious desires of the faithful, as set forth in the charter of such institutions, be fully carried out.

Without the permission of the Apostolic See such institutions cannot be suppressed or incorporated with others, or converted to purposes other than those prescribed by the founders, unless the charter provides differently.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PART VI

THE TEMPORAL POSSESSIONS OF THE CHURCH

This last part of the administrative law of the Church treats first of the property-right of the Church and then of the mode of acquiring temporal goods and their administration. To this are added two specific kinds of obligation which involve some peculiarities as to form and object, viz., contracts and pious foundations.

That this part of the Code brings the Church into closer relation with the State and the world at large goes without saying, for it forms the sensible or commercial link between the two societies, but also the necessary bridge between the spiritual and the temporal domain.

RIGHT OF THE CHURCH TO POSSESS PROPERTY

CAN. 1495

§ 1. Ecclesia catholica et Apostolica Sedes nativum ius habent libere et independenter a civili potestate acquirendi, retinendi et administrandi bona temporalia ad fines sibi proprios prosequendos.

§ 2. Etiam ecclesiis singularibus aliisque personis moralibus quae ab ecclesiastica auctoritate in iuridicam personam erectae sint, ius est, ad normam sacrorum canonum, bona temporalia acquirendi, retinendi et administrandi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The first of the four introductory canons of this Part vindicates the natural and historic right of the Church to possess material property in these words:

§ 1. The Catholic Church and the Apostolic See have the inherent right, freely and independently of any civil power, to acquire, retain, and administer temporal goods for the pursuit of their own ends.

§ 2. Individual churches and other corporations established as such by ecclesiastical authority, are also endowed with the right of acquiring, retaining, and administering their own property, according to Canon Law.

To a practical American these propositions appear as evident as that two and two are four.[1]

1. The Catholic Church, being a perfect, i. e., autonomous, legal, and visible society, with its own proper end, cannot lack the means which are necessary to attain that end. Now, one of these means is the right to possess property. For the Church is founded for men who are endowed not only with a soul, but also with a body that needs support and is subject to the senses. The Church needs temples, sacrifices, and sacraments, and it needs ministers, who also are men. All these things are essential to the society founded by the Son of One, who is at the same time, God. His ministers cannot live on the word alone; they need at least some bread. Divine worship also requires material aid and support. Now, divine worship certainly belongs to the Church, in virtue of her very existence and end. Nor can we imagine that God in 1 It is not necessary to recall all the obnoxious laws of morte main which were made from the twelfth to our century; see Coulondre, Des acquisitions des biens par les Etablissements de la Religion Chrétrienne en Droit Romain et dans l'Ancien Droit Français, 1886; Mamacchi, Del Diritto Libero della Chiesa di acquistare e di possidere Beni Temporali si mobile che stabili, 1769; C. Scheys, De Iure Ecclesiae acquirendi et possidendi Bona Temporalia, Louvain, 1892; Archiv. für Kath. K.-R., 1904, 22 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

his providence should have left her destitute of the power necessary to procure these necessary means, or that He should have thrown her upon the mercy of the State, for this would involve a handicap and a dependence which would make her the mercenary and slave of a society which, as to its end, is inferior to the Church.

Neither can there be, per se, any conflict between the spiritual and the temporal society, as if the latter would be curtailed by the acknowledgment of the property right vested in the Church. For although the State has a material right to temporal goods, yet this right is neither absolute nor unlimited. It is not absolute because the State is not independent of the Supreme Governor of the universe. It is not unlimited because the State is entitled to material goods only as far as its end requires it, and as far as the rights of individuals are not trespassed upon. For the individual citizen has a right to exist, and consequently also to own what is necessary for his existence, prior to any right of the State. And if the State interferes without necessity and in violation of that natural freedom which belongs to every human being, then the individual has a natural right to resist.[2] If this is true of the individual, it is also, and a fortiori, true of the society founded by God, which is also made up of individuals. If we say that per se no conflict is possible between Church and State, we suppose, of course, that each society keeps within its own proper sphere, claiming only what is necessary for the pursuit of its specific and well defined end.

2. There is another, more specific reason for the Church's claim. The Church has the innate right and duty to establish, foster, and protect charitable works of all kinds, which are commanded by her divine Founder.[3] The most luminous pages in her history are those recording her deeds of charity. To sever these from the Church would be the same as tearing a child away from his mother. The exercise of charity, however, requires substantial means and unhampered liberty, which again is possible only if the Church is endowed with the inherent right to possess property.

2 See Fr. Cuthbert, O. S. F. C., Catholic Ideals in Social Life, 1905, p. 27.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. Not only the first Church historian, St. Luke,[4] but also many later writers [5] bear witness to the fact that the Church always possessed temporal goods. Even pagan emporers acknowledged that right. Thus Aurelian (270–275) adjusted a question of property in favor of the Church against Paul of Samosata. To mention the edict of Milan 313 is sufficient to prove that Constantine did not grant, but merely restored, the property right of the Church.[6] It is superfluous to add further proofs. It was but natural and logical that the Holy See condemned the contrary tenet, namely, that "the Church has no inherent and lawful right to acquire and possess property." [7]

The present canon vindicates this right of holding property to the Church at large and to the Apostolic See; then, with some limitation, also to single corporations.

The term Apostolic See must be understood according to can. 7 of the Code. However, here it evidently has the special meaning of the primatial See of St. Peter, and there seems to be a covert allusion to the temporal power of the Pope. To set forth the whole Roman Question, so-

3 See Matth. 25, 35 ff.; Acts II, 29 ff.; Gal. 2, 9 f.; I Cor. 16, 1; II Cor. 8 ff.; Rom. 15, 26.

4 Acts 2, 44 f.; 4, 34 ff.

5 Justin, Apol., I, nn. 14, 67; Tertull., Apologet., n. 39; Cyprian, Ep. 66, c. 16.

6 Cfr. Lactantius, De Mortibus Persecutorum, c. 12; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., VII, 13; S. Brandi, S. J., Di Chi Sono le Chiese? 1898, p. 16 ff.

7 Syllabus of Pius IX, n. 26; Heiner, Der Syllabus, 1905, p. 142 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

called, would require a treatise for itself. Let us emphasize but two points, namely, (1) that the temporal dominion of the Pope, in its limited sense, i. e., as it actually existed before 1870, cannot be said to be iuris divini, though it may justly be called providential. Providence and divine right are not identical terms, else the Church would have lacked an essential feature for about 700 years; (2) that temporal dominion is compatible with spiritual power[8]; the latter, as the superior power, may subject to itself a temporal rule or government, but not conversely, because the power of assimilation is wanting in a merely temporal factor.

The Apostolic See, then, being the Church personified or visibly vested in the Supreme Pontiff, enjoys the right to possess property to the same extent and in the same sense as the Church at large.

"Individual churches" are dioceses or organizations which have their own superiors, endowed with jurisdiction in foro externo, who act as representatives of the universal Church. Parishes are not such corporations in the ecclesiastical sense because their purpose is entirely dependent on the superior end of the diocese, of which they form a subordinate part, and, besides, the pastor is not a representative in foro externo. However, by participation, parishes may share in the nature of a corporation proper, and thus be acknowledged by the Church for the sake of convenience in administration. The State may recognize them as corporations, provided the local Ordinary is not excluded. Note that single churches or corporations (for instance, religious communities) are capable of exercising ecclesiastical property rights only so long and in so far as they belong to the body of the 8 Syllabus Pii IX, n. 75; Heiner, l. c., p. 331 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Catholic Church. The reason is that the partial end, such as pursued by single churches and corporations, necessarily follows the universal end of the Church at large, and borrows from it its juridical entity. Hence if a particular church or organization departs from unity of faith or government, or adopts a worship different from that of the universal Church, it can lay no claim to any property which it enjoyed whilst united to the entire, supremely sovereign organism. This has also been ruled by courts in the United States.[9]

These individual churches and corporations, then, are dependent upon the Church for their existence, for they cannot grow except on ecclesiastical soil, and become dead outside the pale. They depend on the universal Church also in as far as the common law of the same is binding on them concerning the acquisition, possession, and administration of property. It does not follow from this proposition that there are two subjects of such ecclesiastical property rights, one the Church universal, and the other an individual corporation. The Code is against such a splitting up of the one and indivisible property right. "Ius est," it is a right, dependent only in as far as the welfare of the whole Church requires. In a similar manner our civil corporations depend on the State, but enjoy the complete and autonomous right to possess and administer their property.[10]

Can. 1496

Ecclesiae ius quoque est, independens a civili potestate, exigendi a fidelibus quae ad cultum divinum, ad honestam clericorum aliorumque ministrorum susten-

9 Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 194.

10 Cfr. Bachofen, Summa Iuris Eccl. Publ., 1910, p. 42; Tanquery, Summa Theol. Moral., ed. 2, III, p. 85.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tationem et ad reliquos fines sibi proprios sint necessaria.

Can. 1496 is a corollary of the preceding canon, and vindicates to the Church, independently of any civil power, the right to demand of the faithful whatever is necessary for divine worship, for the support of her clergy and other servants, and for the pursuit of her proper ends. This is a corollary, or logical deduction, from what was stated above, because it follows from the inherent right of the Church to possess property sufficient for her support. The legal standing of the Church requires such an independent right, since the faithful belong to her by divine right, having been consecrated to her by baptism.

To this right, of course, corresponds a duty on the part of the faithful. What was said under can. 463, must here, proportionately, be applied to all the purposes mentioned.[11]

CAN. 1497

§ 1. Bona temporalia, sive corporalia, tum immobilia tum mobilia, sive incorporalia, quae vel ad Ecclesiam universam et ad Apostolicam Sedem vel ad aliam in Ecclesia personam moralem pertineant, sunt bona ecclesiastica.

§ 2. Dicuntur sacra, quae consecratione vel benedictione ad divinum cultum destinata sunt; pretiosa, quibus notabilis valor sit, artis vel historiae vel materiae causa.

§ 1. All kinds of church property are, according to can. 1497, called ecclesiastical, no matter whether it belongs to the universal church, or to the Apostolic See, or to an 11 See Vol. II, 539 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ecclesiastical corporation, and no matter whether it is corporeal (movable or immovable) or incorporeal.

"Right of property" is taken in the subjective sense as the moral faculty of doing something, or of holding or exacting property. Hence it is something intellectual and moral, not perceived by the senses. If a distinction is drawn between corporeal and incorporeal property it is because of the objects which these categories comprise; they are corporeal, if they fall under the senses; such are landed property, buildings, chattel, objects, etc.; incorporeal if they cannot be seen or perceived by the senses, except as far as they are asserted; such are advowsons, titles, franchises, pensions, rents, leases, etc.[12]

§ 2. If goods or objects belonging to the Church have received a consecration or blessing by which they were destined for divine worship, they are called sacred. This character, of course, adheres to corporeal things only. Precious objects are such ecclesiastical things as have a considerable value on account of the artistic skill with which they are wrought, or because of their antiquity or historical associations, or on account of the material contained in them.

Can. 1498

In canonibus qui sequuntur, nomine Ecclesiae significatur non solum Ecclesia universa aut Sedes Apostolica, sed etiam quaelibet persona moralis in Ecclesia, nisi ex contextu sermonis vel ex natura rei aliud appareat.

By the term Church in the following canons are understood not only the universal Church, or the Apostolic See, but any ecclesiastical corporation, unless the contrary appears from the context.

12 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., II, 15 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXVII

THE ACQUISITION OF ECCLESIASTICAL PROPERTY

CAN. 1499

§ 1. Ecclesia acquirere bona temporalia potest omnibus iustis modis iuris sive naturalis sive positivi, quibus id aliis licet.

§ 2. Dominium bonorum, sub suprema auctoritate Sedis Apostolicae, ad eam pertinet moralem personam, quae eadem bona legitime acquisiverit.

Can. 1499 vindicates to the Church the right of acquiring property by all just means which are permitted by either natural or positive law to other citizens or individuals, i. e., by contract, donation, inheritance, etc.

The title or ownership is vested in the corporation itself, though, of course dependently on the Holy See, i. e., on common law.

Here it may not be amiss to point out the different forms of holding church property. They are: (a) by corporation sole, which consists of one person, who transfers it to his successor in office; thus a bishop or pastor holds property in the name and as officer of the diocese or pastor; (b) by corporation aggregate, when the church members are the incorporators and whatever property they possess or acquire is vested in the body corporate;[1]

1 Cfr. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 38 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) in fee simple, which conveys absolute and direct ownership of the property, and was looked upon in former days as vested in the bishop for all diocesan property.[2]

DIVISION AND TRANSFER OF CHURCH PROPERTY

CAN. 1500

Diviso territorio personae moralis ecclesiasticae ita ut vel illius pars alii personae morali uniatur, vel distincta persona moralis pro parte dismembrata erigatur, etiam bona communia quae in commodum totius territorii erant destinata, et aes alienum quod pro territorio contractum fuerat, ab auctoritate ecclesiastica, cui divisio competat, cum debita proportione ex bono et aequo dividi debent, salvis piorum fundatorum seu oblatorum voluntatibus, iuribus legitime quaesitis, ac legibus peculiaribus, quibus persona moralis regatur.

CAN. 1501

Exstincta persona morali ecclesiastica, eius bona fiunt personae moralis ecclesiasticae immediate superioris, salvis semper fundatorum seu oblatorum voluntatibus, iuribus legitime quaesitis atque legibus peculiaribus quibus exstincta persona moralis regebatur.

If a territory, say a diocese or corporation, is divided so that part of its territory is united to another corporation, or a distinct juridical person is established out of the dismembered part, the property that belonged to the territory as a whole must be divided and the debts distributed by the competent ecclesiastical authority. This division must be made according to the principles of justice and

2 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., II, 104 f. The S. C. prefers ownership by corporation sole.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

equity, with due regard to the will of the founders or donors and to the acquired rights and the particular statutes governing the moral person who sustained the division. This is a corroboration of what was stated under can. 1427 concerning the division of parishes, to which also the note of Cardinal Gasparri refers, thus hinting that this canon must also be applied to parishes, even though they may not come up to the notion of a corporation proper. But persona moralis may also signify a juridical entity of the species of benefices, and as these may be divided or dismembered, so also parishes.

The proportion to be observed is twofold: general and particular. The general proportion is indicated by the phrase, "bonum et aequum." But since it is a maxim that equity follows the law, it is evident that justice must be the first measure, to be taken not in the arithmetical, but in the geometrical sense, for it would be next to impossible to make such an equal division that cent for cent and inch for inch would be shared. The particular proportion is to be gauged by the acquired rights (because melior est conditio possidentis), the charter and by-laws. This same proportion in can. 1501 is applied to the case where a moral or juridical person ceases to exist. For this particular proportion means that all the property left by such an extinct person passes to the immediate superior. Thus, for instance, the property of an extinct parish goes to the diocese; if a diocese were suppressed, we suppose the S. C. Consistorialis would provide. If a monastery or convent of a centralized order becomes extinct, its property passes to the province, unless the constitutions rule otherwise.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1502

Ad decimarum et primitiarum solutionem quod attinet, peculiaria statuta ac laudabiles consuetudines in unaquaque regione serventur.

As to tithes (dîmes) and first-fruits, the special statutes and praiseworthy local customs should be observed.

BEGGING

CAN. 1503

Salvis praescriptis can. 621–624, vetantur privati tam clerici quam laici sine Sedis Apostolicae aut proprii Ordinarii et Ordinarii loci licentia, in scriptis data, stipem cogere pro quolibet pio aut ecclesiastico instituto vel fine.

Private persons, whether clerics or laymen, are forbidden to collect alms for any charitable or ecclesiastical institution or purpose, unless they have the written permission of the Apostolic See or that of their own and of the local Ordinary.

Concerning religious enough has been said under can. 621–624, which must be strictly followed. It is hardly to be presumed that collectors will go about collecting alms, as they formerly did,[3] under false pretences, even promising people eternal joy. But churches are still being built, and hospitals and schools erected, which require an appeal to Christian charity. Hence this regulation, which is intended to keep order.

Who are the private persons here intended? All those who beg without official or public capacity, authority or warrant, no matter whether they belong to the ranks of the clergy or the laity. A pastor is no private person, and may therefore collect within the boundaries of his parish, but not beyond without the required permission, because outside his own district he has no official capacity. It is a wise ruling, and in keeping with our canon, if diocesan statutes forbid priests in charge of souls to collect either directly or indirectly, for instance, by selling tickets or chances.[4] The so-called chain-letters belong in the waste-basket.

[3] C. 2, Clem. V, 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:6 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Are bishops allowed to collect in another diocese than their own? If they have obtained the written consent of the respective Ordinary, they certainly are allowed to do so.

The text says, "for any charitable or ecclesiastical purpose." This means that a pastor, or any other priest, is not allowed to collect for others, say a hospital or sisterhood, unless he has the permission of the Apostolic See (S. Congregatio Concilii; can. 250), or of the two Ordinaries concerned. Of course, if the collector does not cross the boundary line of another diocese, he needs only the writter permission of his own Ordinary. If he has obtained this, he requires no permission from the pastor in whose parish he wishes to collect, although courtesy may move him to apply for it. Besides, the diocesan statutes must be observed.

THE CATHEDRATICUM

CAN. 1504

Omnes ecclesiae vel beneficia iurisdictioni Episcopi subiecta, itemque laicorum confraternitates, debent quotannis in signum subiectionis solvere Episcopo ca-

[4] Thus the diocesan statutes of Leavenworth and St. Joseph, n. 58; but the first clause must now be changed according to our canon.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

thedraticum seu moderatam taxam determinandam ad normam can. 1507, § 1, nisi iam antiqua consuetudine fuerit determinata.

In Spain and in Italy it was customary, in the sixth century, to pay two solidi to the diocesan bishop, either on his visit or otherwise, "propter honorem cathedrae."[5] This tribute was, as the Latin term shows, paid as a token or earnest of the dependence and submission of the church and clergy. After exemptions became more numerous, the monasteries paid a certain tribute to the Holy See as a sign of papal patronage and exemption from episcopal jurisdiction. Hence exempt regulars did not pay the cathedraticum to their diocesan bishop unless they held incorporated benefices or parishes.[6] Those who were wont to pay this tribute, usually offered it at the diocesan synod, whence it came to be called synodaticum.

Our canon rules that all churches and benefices subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop, as well as lay confraternities, are obliged to pay annually, as a sign of subjection, the so-called cathedraticum, a moderate tax to be levied according to can. 1507, § 1, unless some other method exists by ancient custom.

Hence, (1) all churches and public oratories subject to episcopal jurisdiction must pay the cathedraticum, even though they may not have been subject to it formerly. This certainly holds concerning all churches ruled by the secular clergy. Churches or public oratories in which exempt religious hold services for themselves only, and not for outsiders, or for these only per accidens, need not pay the cathedraticum. But if exempt religious have a [5] Cc. 1, 4, 6, C. 10, q. 3—the underlying idea being that all churches sprang from the cathedral church.

[6] C. 16, X, I, 31; c. 1, X, III, 35.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

parish church, even though it be an abbey or a convent church, or an incorporated public oratory, and even though one of their own number acts as pastor or chaplain, they are obliged to pay this tax.[7]

(2) All benefices not exempt from episcopal jurisdiction must also pay the cathedraticum. Thus canons beneficiaries, who possess a distinct benefice, also the theologus and poenitentiarius, are bound by this obligation.[8]

(3) Lay confraternities must pay the cathedraticum if they own not merely a chapel erected in honor of a saint in some church, but a church or public oratory of their own, even though no benefice is connected with that church or oratory.[9]

(4) The amount of this tribute was formerly established at two solidi (about $6.00) a year.[10] But the Code leaves it to be settled by provincial councils.

SUBSIDIUM CHARITATIVUM

CAN. 1505

Loci Ordinarius, praeter tributum pro Seminario, de quo in can. 1355, 1356, aut beneficialem pensionem de qua in can. 1429, potest, speciali dioecesis necessitate impellente, omnibus beneficiariis, sive saecularibus sive religiosis, extraordinariam et moderatam exactionem imponere.

When there is particular need on the part of the diocese, the local Ordinary may demand, besides the seminaristicum and the pension mentioned in can. 1429, a con-

7 Ibid., and the commentators; Reiffenstuel, III, tit. 39, n. 12 f.; Santi-Leitner, III, 39, n. 6; S. C. C., Feb. 26, 1707 (Richter, Trid., p. 336, n. 19); also churches iuris-patronatus laicalis; S. C. C., July 24, 1760 (Richter, l. c., n. 22).

8 S. C. C., March 18, 1775; April 7, 1742 (Richter, l. c., n. 20 f.).

9 S. C. C., May 22, 1734, July 24, 1734 (Richter, l. c., n. 24 f.).

10 See cc. 4-6, C. 10, q. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tribution from all beneficiaries, secular as well religious, but this contribution must be moderate and can be demanded only extraordinarily, not regularly. It is called a charitable subsidy, and, as such, differs from the regular diocesan taxes, though it may be demanded in justice, and therefore under threat of penalty.

The term Ordinaries here, according to the common opinion of canonists, based on the Decretals,[11] means only the bishops or Ordinaries themselves, not the Vicars-General.

Metropolitans cannot impose this tax on their entire province, but only on their own archdiocese.[12] Apostolic administrators and coadjutors appointed by the Apostolic See, also Vicars Capitular (our administrators) are entitled to demand this subsidy.[13]

Those upon whom the subsidium charitativum may be imposed are the beneficiaries, as explained under can. 1504, and to the same extent, also exempt religious if they hold a parish church or other benefice.

The reason is stated as being a special need of the diocese. Such special needs are: a large indebtedness contracted by the bishop or his predecessor for the welfare of the diocese; extraordinary support of the Apostolic See; expenses required for the visitatio ad limina or a journey to a general or provincial council.[14]

It must, however, be observed that the S. Congregation has forbidden bishops to collect this subsidy if they possess a rich income or revenues (pingues reditus habentes) or if no real and urgent reason exists, or if the beneficiaries from whom the tax is demanded have but a bare living.[15]

11 C. 6, § Prohibemus, X, III, 39.
12 Reiffenstuel, III, tit. 37, n. 20.
13 Ibid., n. 23.
14 Ibid., n. 31.
15 S. C. C., Feb. 27, 1603 (Richter, Trid., p. 336, n. 27).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1506

Aliud tributum in bonum dioecesis vel pro patrono imponere ecclesiis, beneficiis aliisque institutis ecclesiasticis, quanquam sibi subiectis, Ordinarius potest tantummodo in actu fundationis vel consecrationis; sed nullum imponi tributum potest super eleemosynis Missarum sive manualium sive fundatarum.

Can. 1506 forbids Ordinaries to impose any other tax besides those mentioned, for the benefit of the diocese or a patron (advowee), upon churches, benefices, and other ecclesiastical institutions, subject to their jurisdiction, except on the occasion of their foundation or consecration. All other taxes are against the common law (can. 1429) and looked upon as either simoniacal or as an unjust diminution of benefices. Never can a tax or contribution be imposed upon either manual or foundation masses.

Can. 1507

§ 1. Salvo praescripto can. 1056 et can. 1234, praefinire taxas pro variis actibus iurisdictionis voluntariae vel pro exsecutione rescriptorum Sedis Apostolicae vel occasione ministrationis Sacramentorum vel Sacramentalium, in tota ecclesiastica provincia solvendas, est Concilii provincialis aut conventus Episcoporum provinciae; sed nulla vi praefinitio eiusmodi pollet, nisi prius a Sede Apostolica approbata fuerit.

§ 2. Ad taxas pro actibus iudicialibus quod spectat, servetur praescriptum can. 1909.

Can. 1507 governs the manner of fixing ecclesiastical taxes. It should be done at a provincial council or meeting of the bishops, but needs the approval of the Holy See

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to have legal force. The taxes here comprised are (a) those levied for the exercise of voluntary jurisdiction, i. e., dispensations, commutations (except matrimonial dispensations; can. 1056), and funeral taxes (can. 1234); (b) the executoriae or fees for the execution of papal rescripts; (c) charges for the administration of the Sacraments and sacramentals. Not included are taxes imposed for ecclesiastical trials, which are subject to the rules laid down in can. 1909.

PRESCRIPTION

CAN. 1508

Praescriptionem, tanquam acquirendi et se liberandi modum, prout est in legislatione civili respectivae nationis, Ecclesia pro bonis ecclesiasticis recipit, salvo praescripto canonum qui sequuntur.

This canon admits for ecclesiastical property prescription, as it is current or in vogue under the civil law in each country; the following canons limit prescription.

Prescription (called in Roman law usucapio) is the mode of acquiring a title to property by long-continued and uninterrupted possession. It also means freeing oneself from an obligation due to another, for instance, tithes or pensions, in which case the term signifies the loss of a property right brought about by omission to assert the same within a given time. Finally, prescription also has the meaning of the period or time required for legal acquisition or loss of this right.

The new Code accepts prescription in the same sense and with the same conditions under which it operates according to the laws of different countries, provided the following canons are observed.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1509

Praescriptioni obnoxia non sunt:

1.° Quae sunt iuris divini sive naturalis sive positivi;

2.° Quae obtineri possunt ex solo privilegio apostolico;

3.° Iura spiritualia, quorum laici non sunt capaces, si agatur de praescriptione in commodum laicorum;

4.° Fines certi et indubii provinciarum ecclesiasticarum, dioecesium, paroeciarum, vicariatuum apostolicorum, praefecturarum apostolicarum, abbatiarum vel praelaturarum nullius.

5.° Eleemosynae et onera Missarum;

6.° Beneficium ecclesiasticum sine titulo;

7.° Ius visitationis et obedientiae, ita ut subditi a nullo Praelato visitari possint et nulli Praelato iam subsint;

8.° Solutio cathedratici.

Can. 1509 excepts from prescription the following objects and rights:[16]

1.° Things enjoined either by the natural or by divine law, for instance, the right of parents to their children, the primacy of the Roman Pontiff, the Sacraments, the constitution of the Church.

2.° Things that can be obtained only by an Apostolic privilege, for instance, exemption of persons not comprised by law.

3.° Spiritual rights of which laymen are incapable, if prescription concerns things or rights in favor of laymen, for instance, lay investiture, or election of laymen to an ecclesiastical benefice.

16 Cfr. the commentators on lib. II, tit. 26; Wernz, l. c., III, n. 298; p. 333 f.; see under can. 1701 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

4.° Certain and undisputed boundary lines of ecclesiastical provinces, dioceses, parishes, vicariates apostolic and prefectures apostolic, abbacies and prelacies nullius.

5.° Alms or mass stipends and obligations; however, although these as such cannot be prescribed against by any contrary custom, yet they may be transferred from one to another; thus if the canons or prebendaries of a church were in turn obliged to say and apply Mass for the benefactors, this obligation could be imposed upon the dean or provost of the chapter by prescription.[17]

6.° Ecclesiastical benefices obtained without title, i. e., without at least a titulus coloratus (see can. 1446).

7.° The right of canonical visitation and obedience, so that the subjects could not be visited by any prelate or would not be under obedience to any prelate. But a mere transfer of obedience or visitation from one prelate to another (translativa praescriptio) may take place by prescription.[18] The fact is that exemption rested, centuries ago, on prescription.

8.° The payment of the cathedraticum, which cannot itself be subject to prescription, although the amount is liable to prescription.[19]

CAN. 1510

§ 1. Res sacrae quae in dominio privatorum sunt, praescriptione acquiri a privatis personis possunt, quae tamen eas adhibere nequeunt ad profanos usus; si vero consecrationem vel benedictionem amiserint, libere acquiri possunt etiam ad usus profanos, non tamen sordidos.

§ 2. Res sacrae, quae in dominio privatorum non

17 S. C. C., June 17, 1879; April 27, 1901 (Anal. Eccl. IX, 201 ff.).

18 Reiffenstuel, II, 26, n. 52 ff.

19 Santi-Leitner, III, 39, n. 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:7 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sunt, non a persona privata, sed a persona morali ecclesiastica contra aliam personam moralem ecclesiasticam praescribi possunt.

Can. 1510 concerns sacred things (res sacrae) owned by private persons. These may be acquired by prescription, but not used for profane purposes, unless they have lost their consecration or blessing, and even then the purpose must not be unbecoming (sordidus). Sacred objects which are not owned by private persons cannot be acquired by prescription by a private, but only by a juridical person, against whom only an artificial person can prescribe.

Can. 1511

§ 1. Res immobiles, mobiles pretiosae, iura et actiones sive personales sive reales, quae pertinent ad Sedem Apostolicam, spatio centum annorum praescribuntur.

§ 2. Quae ad aliam personam moralem ecclesiasticam, spatio triginta annorum.

Can. 1511 reasserts the ancient privilege of the Roman Church, against which only a prescription of 100 years is admitted, no matter whether it concerns landed property, precious movable property, rights, or personal as well as real actions. Against other ecclesiastical corporations or juridical entities a term of thirty years suffices for prescription.

Can. 1512

Nulla valet praescriptio, nisi bona fide nitatur, non solum initio possessionis, sed toto possessionis tempore ad praescriptionem requisito.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

No prescription, however, is valid which is not based upon good faith at the beginning as well as throughout the whole period permitted for prescription. This rule has always been upheld by the Church against the Roman law, which required good faith only at the beginning.[20] Hence modern civil law, which follows the Roman law, cannot be accepted in this case. Good faith, which is the prudent and sincere judgment that one holds or possesses a thing by right or without infringement of another's rights, is required by natural law, because bad faith would render the possession sinful and therefore illicit, and no human or divine positive law could declare it just or lawful.

DONATIONS AND LEGACIES

CAN. 1513

§ 1. Qui ex iure naturae et ecclesiastico libere valet de suis bonis statuere, potest ad causas pias, sive per actum inter vivos sive per actum mortis causa, bona relinquere.

§ 2. In ultimis voluntatibus in bonum Ecclesiae serventur, si fieri possit, sollemnitates iuris civilis; hae si omissae fuerint, heredes moneantur ut testatoris voluntatem adimpleant.

He who, by natural and ecclesiastical law, is free to dispose of his property, may bequeath the same, either by donation or last will and testament, in favor of pious institutions or causes.

Testamentary bequests of the faithful in favor of the Church should, if possible, be made in legal form, i. e., 20 Cfr. cc. 5, 8, 17, 20, X, II, 26; 1. un. Inst., II, 6; 1. un., Cod., VII, 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

according to the rules prescribed by civil law. If this precaution has been omitted the heirs must be admonished to carry out the testator's will.

Wiclif's propositions: that it would be sinful to found convents, that to bequeath money to the clergy would be against the teaching of Christ, and that the emperors were mistaken in endowing the Church, were deservedly condemned.[21] Nevertheless, the nineteenth century revamped these impious theories.[22]

The question whether a last will or donation not drawn up in legal form is binding in conscience was decided by the S. Poenitentiaria, which said that it is the Roman practice to hold such legacies valid and binding in conscience, but the heirs are easily admitted to an agreement with the church or pious institution.[23]

Can. 1514

Voluntates fidelium facultates suas in pias causas donantium vel relinquentium, sive per actum inter vivos, sive per actum mortis causa, diligentissime impleantur etiam circa modum administrationis et erogationis bonorum, salvo praescripto, can. 1515, § 3.

Can. 1515

§ 1. Ordinarii omnium piarum voluntatum tam mortis causa quam inter vivos exsecutores sunt.

21 Propp. 31-33 (Denzinger, nn. 507-509).

22 Pius IX, "Quanta Cura," Dec. 8, 1864.

23 S. Poenit, Jan. 10, 1901 (Coll. P. F., n. 2099). As to the legal form to be observed in making wills, see Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 33, 306 ff.; also "After My Death," 1918; Jones, Legal Forms, 7th ed. Notice also that "contracts to procure a third person to make a will in favor of a particular person or object, or to use his influence to procure such testamentary disposition, are illegal;" see Harriman, The Law of Contracts, 1901, § 214.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Hoc ex iure Ordinarii vigilare possunt, ac debent, etiam per visitationem, ut piae voluntates impleantur, et alii exsecutores delegati debent, perfuncti munere, illis reddere rationem.

§ 3. Clausulae huic Ordinariorum iuri contrariae, ultimis voluntatibus adiectae, tanquam non appositae habeantur.

Can. 1514 and 1515 emphasize the great care which the Church has ever bestowed on the faithful administration and distribution of property left by donation or bequest. They are specially intended for executors, who are obliged to attend to speedy execution, according to the term permitted by civil law. In the business of execution they must chiefly attend to the wording of the will. They are not allowed to substitute one pious institution for another, unless the document permits them to do so, nor are they permitted to apply a legacy "for the poor" to one poor person only. Among the poor those of the deceased person's home town should be favored and the most needy selected.[24]

These general rules should also guide the Ordinaries, who, according to can. 1515, are the executors of all pious gifts, by donation as well as by last will (mortis causa). They may and must, at the canonical visitation, take cognizance of pious bequests, and other executors are obliged to render an account to the Ordinaries after they have discharged their office. Every clause which runs counter to this right of the Ordinary must be looked upon as non-existing.

"Ordinaries" here includes the superiors of exempt religious. Religious, too, (except Friars Minor) may 24 Reiffenstuel III, tit. 26, n. 772 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be executors of last wills, but must in each case obtain previous permission from their superiors.[25]

Can. 1516

§ 1. Clericus vel religiosus qui bona ad pias causas sive per actum inter vivos, sive ex testamento fiduciarie accepit, debet de sua fiducia Ordinarium certiorem reddere, eique omnia istiusmodi bona seu mobilia seu immobilia cum oneribus adiunctis indicare; quod si donator id expresse et omnino prohibuerit, fiduciam ne acceptet.

§ 2. Ordinarius debet exigere ut bona fiduciaria in tuto collocentur et vigilare pro exsecutione piae voluntatis ad normam can. 1515.

§ 3. Bonis fiduciariis alicui religioso commissis, si quidem bona sint attributa loci seu dioecesis ecclesiis, incolis aut piis causis iuvandis, Ordinarius de quo in § § 1, 2, est loci Ordinarius; secus, est Ordinarius eiusdem religiosi proprius.

Can. 1516 plainly shows that not only the secular clergy but religious, too, may be executors and trustees. If a cleric or religious receives a donation or a bequest in trust, he must notify his Ordinary of that fact and indicate to him all the property held in trust, movable as well as immovable, together with the obligations attached thereto. Should a donor have expressly forbidden the intervention of the Ordinary, no religious or cleric can accept the bequest or donation.[26]

The Ordinary must insist that the property held in trust is safely invested and watch over the fulfillment of the testator's will, according to can. 1515. A safe investment, according to Roman practice, is that in land.

[25] Ib., n. 777 ff.
[26] S. C. C., Aug. 7, 1909, (A. Ap. S., I, 766).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

When a religious has received property in trust, the Ordinary referred to in § 1 and § 2 of this canon is the local Ordinary if the property is destined for a church of the town or diocese, or for the inmates of charitable institutions existing in that town or diocese; in all other cases the Ordinary is the superior of the exempt religious; for only exempt clerical superiors go by the name of Ordinaries, according to can. 198.

It seems doubtless that by "loci seu dioecesis ecclesiis" must be understood such churches as are either incorporated or parish churches. For if a donation or bequest were made to a church belonging exclusively to exempt religious, who use it for their own purposes only, even though it were a public oratory, it is incredible that the local Ordinary should have to intervene. This interpretation is borne out by the obvious meaning of the term, "dioecesis ecclesiae," churches of the diocese, in the genitivus subjectivus; for in that sense churches owned by religious, but not as parish or beneficiary churches, are not of the diocese, although in the diocese.

CHANGE OF LAST WILL

CAN. 1517

§ 1. Ultimarum voluntatum reductio, moderatio, commutatio, quae fieri ex iusta tantum et necessaria causa debent, Sedi Apostolicae reservantur, nisi fundator hanc potestatem etiam Ordinario loci expresse concesserit.

§ 2. Si tamen exsecutio onerum impositorum, ob imminutos reditus aliamve causam, nulla administratorum culpa, impossibilis evaserit, tunc Ordinarius quoque, auditis iis quorum interest, et servata, meliore quo fieri potest modo, fundatoris voluntate, poterit

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eadem onera aeque imminuere, excepta Missarum reductione quae semper Sedi Apostolicae unice competit.

§ 1. To reduce, mitigate, or change testamentary bequests is reserved to the Apostolic See, which can proceed only for a just and necessary cause. The local Ordinary may act only if the founder has expressly granted this power to him, and he too is bound by reasons of justice and necessity, for both the natural and the divine law, as well as positive law, demand that the last will of the faithful be conscientiously executed and the money bequeathed by them expended for those purposes for which it was intended. It may not be applied to a seemingly better cause, or in a more suitable manner, because such a change would frustrate the last will of the testator and injure the Church, since the faithful would hesitate to make donations if they were not certain that the money would be properly applied. Hence, even the Sovereign Pontiff is bound by the law of justice and necessity and cannot validly make a change or reduction [27] in a will without a proportionate cause. It is therefore quite natural to find that very rare use has been made of this power, and the negative answers of the S. Congregatio Concilii are more numerous than the permissive ones. Thus a change of a mansionariatus (simple benefice of a chapter) into a canonicate was rejected; a proposed change of manual masses into chaplaincies was rejected, etc., etc.[28]

§ 2. However, if, on account of decreased revenues or for other reasons not due to faulty administration, the obligations cannot possibly be complied with, the Ordinary, after having heard those concerned, may equitably dimin-

27 S. C. P. F., 1807, (Coll., n. 689).

28 S. C. C., Nov. 4, 1705; Feb. 27, 1734; June 26, 1772 (Richter, Trid., p. 164).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:8 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ish the burdens, but must, as well as he is able, abide by the will of the founder. From this power is excluded the reduction of Mass obligations, which is reserved to the Holy See.

This canon makes quite a concession to the Ordinaries, because formerly such faculties were granted only for very particular reasons of distance or slow travelling.[29] But the local Ordinaries are obliged in conscience to make use of this privilege only for just and solid reasons. Besides, since it has always been the practice of the Roman Court to ascertain the probable or likely mind of the testator before permitting a change,[30] this should also be the guiding principle for Ordinaries. Here is a case in point: A pious Catholic had left a sum of money for the purpose of founding a home for poor girls exposed to danger. The legacy proved insufficient (here the reason) and the foundation appeared rather useless for the town in question. Hence the money was assigned to a convent for nuns on condition that they would receive a poor girl without the dowry otherwise required (here the interpretation of the probable desire of the founder).[31]

From this now ordinary episcopal power, in which exempt religious superiors do not participate, is excluded the reduction of mass obligations, which is strictly reserved to the Apostolic See (S. C. Consilii), as will be further explained in can. 1551.

29 S. C. P. F., 1807 (l. c.).
30 S. C. C., Feb. 12, 1735 and pluries (Richter, l. c., p. 135, n. 8).
31 S. C. C., Aug. 19, 1724 (l. c., n. 2).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXVIII

THE ADMINISTRATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY

THE SOVEREIGN PONTIFF

CAN. 1518

Romanus Pontifex est omnium bonorum ecclesiasticorum supremus administrator et dispensator.

The Roman Pontiff is the supreme administrator and steward of all church property.

This right flows, of course, from the plenitude of his power, which embraces the final end of the Church as well as its means. Waiving the question as to the rights which were formerly vindicated to him by reason of the relation of vassalage that existed between some nations and the Apostolic See,[1] it is evident that the Code considers only actual or present-day conditions. The name dispensator was given to the Pope by St. Bernard [2] as well as by St. Thomas. The Angelic Doctor says: The possessions of the Church belongs to the Pope, not as their lord and owner, but as their principal dispenser. This means that the Pope may dispense or dispose of all church property, even that owned by single corporations, in favor of the universal Church if an urgent reason exists and the welfare or tranquillity of the Church requires it. This power is given for the edification of the society founded

1 See Hergenröther, Kath. Kirche und Christl. Staat, 1872–1878.

2 De Consideratione, l. IV; see Fagnani in c. 7, Relatum, III, 50.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

by Jesus Christ, not for its destruction, or for the enrichment of the Pontiff or of his family or nation.[3] There is nothing absurd in the exercise of this power, for the State, too, claims the right of eminent domain, in virtue of which it confiscates or expropriates private property. The law is based upon the well-known maxim: "Bonum privatum cedere debet bono publico."

THE LOCAL ORDINARIES

CAN. 1519

§ 1. Loci Ordinarii est sedulo advigilare administrationi omnium bonorum ecclesiasticorum quae in suo territorio sint nec ex eius iurisdictione fuerint subducta, salvis legitimis praescriptionibus, quae eidem potiora iura tribuant.

§ 2. Habita ratione iurium, legitimarum consuetudinum et circumstantiarum, Ordinarii, opportune editis peculiaribus instructionibus intra fines iuris communis, universum administrationis bonorum ecclesiasticorum negotium ordinandum curent.

§ 1. The local Ordinaries should watch carefully over the administration of all church property located in their dioceses, except that which has been withdrawn from their jurisdiction. If lawful prescription gives the bishop the right to administer property otherwise not subject to his power, he may make use of this right. The reason is that the bishop has the "intentio fundata in iure," i. e., the original right of administering all diocesan property because he is the pastor of the whole territory.

Exemption, as the term implies, spells an exception from the rule. Therefore, if exempt religious or other

3 Benedict XIV, "Cum Encyclicas," May 24, 1754, § 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

exempt communities or individuals permit prescription against themselves, the original right revives. But exemption creates a right of independent administration as far as the canons admit. For it signifies freedom from episcopal jurisdiction as well as from the law of the diocese; from the right in dando as well as from the right in recipiendo, with due regard, of course, to the common law.[4] But note well, the Ordinaries are only the administrators,[5] not the dispensers of diocesan property.

Therefore § 2 of can. 1519 provides that the Ordinaries should regulate the whole business of the administration of diocesan property according to the common law of the Church and with due regard to special, lawful customs, which are the best interpreters of the law, and to circumstances. To this effect, and with these objects in view, they may issue, either in synod or outside, particular statutes which bind the whole diocese, provided they keep within the common law.

DIOCESAN BOARD OF ADMINISTRATION

CAN. 1520

§ 1. Ad hoc munus rite obeundum quilibet Ordinarius in sua civitate episcopali Consilium instituat, quod constet praeside, qui est ipsemet Ordinarius, et duobus vel pluribus viris idoneis, iuris etiam civilis, quantum fieri potest, peritis, ab ipso Ordinario, audito Capitulo, eligendis, nisi iure vel consuetudine peculiari iam alio aequivalenti modo legitime fuerit provisum.

§ 2. Citra apostolicum indultum, ii a munere administratoris excluduntur, qui cum Ordinario loci primo

4 Cfr. c. 24, C. 12, q 1; c. 18, X, I, 31, and the gloss to the same.

5 S. C. P. F., April 1, 1816 (Coll. P. F., n. 712).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vel secundo consanguinitatis vel affinitatis gradu coniuncti sint.

§ 3. Loci Ordinarius in administrativis actibus maioris momenti Consilium administrationis audire ne praetermittat; huius tamen sodales votum habent tantum consultivum, nisi iure communi in casibus specialiter expressis vel ex tabulis fundationis eorum consensus exigatur.

§ 4. Sodales huius Consilii iusiurandum de munere bene ac fideliter adimplendo coram Ordinario emittant.

§ 1. In order that this business be properly attended to, every Ordinary shall establish in his episcopal city a board of administrators, consisting of the president, who is the bishop himself, and two or three capable men, experienced also in civil law, if possible, to be appointed by the Ordinary after having heard the advice of his chapter (or consultors). Should there be in the diocese a particular law or custom which provides an equally effective mode of administration, this may be retained. But some kind of a council (consilium) there must be, according to the admonition of the wise man: "Do nothing without counsel, and thou shalt not repent, when thou hast done." [6]

§ 2. Excluded from this council of administrators are all relatives in the first and second degree (affines et consanguinei) of the local Ordinary, unless the Apostolic See should grant a dispensation to the contrary.

§ 3. Local Ordinaries shall not fail to call the council of administrators as often as any business of importance is to be transacted. Such business would be alienation of property, for which a papal indult is required, the effective exercise of supervision over the administration of tem-

[6] Ecclus. 32, 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

poralities, and the rendering of accounts to be given annually by those who are obliged to do so.[7] But the vote of these administrators is advisory only, unless a decisive vote is required in certain cases expressed in law or in the charter of a foundation.

§ 4. The members of this board must take oath to the effect that they will perform their duty well and faithfully.

It may be observed that these administrators may also be laymen, provided, of course, they are Catholics.

ADMINISTRATORS OF INDIVIDUAL INSTITUTIONS

CAN. 1521

§ 1. Praeter hoc dioecesanum Consilium administrationis, Ordinarius loci in administrationem bonorum quae ad aliquam ecclesiam vel locum pium pertinent et ex iure vel tabulis fundationis suum non habent administratorem, assumat viros providos, idoneos et boni testimonii, quibus, elapso triennio, alios sufficiat, nisi locorum circumstantiae aliud suadeant.

§ 2. Quod si laicis partes quaedam in administratione bonorum ecclesiasticorum vel ex legitimo fundationis seu erectionis titulo vel ex Ordinarii loci voluntate competant, nihilominus universa administratio nomine Ecclesiae fiat, ac salvo iure Ordinarii visitandi, exigendi rationes et praescribendi modum administrationis.

§ 1. According to Roman as well as ecclesiastical law each institution should have an administrator, or, as he was formerly called, syndicus.[8] Our Code prescribes the appointment of such syndics, in addition to the diocesan

7 S. C. P. F., Oct. 18, 1883, n. XIV, (Coll., n. 1606).

8 Cfr. Cod. Iust., I, 2; c. 2, Clem., III, 11; Trid., Sess. 7, c. 5; Sess. 25, c. 8, de Ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07: 9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

board of administrators. For all churches or pious institutions which have no syndics either by law or charter, the Ordinary should choose prudent and capable men of good repute to administer the property. The term of these administrators lasts three years, unless local circumstances counsel a more or less frequent change. It is evident that our American parishes need no special administrators, because the parish priests themselves, aided by the trustees, administer the property.

§2. If the charter or the will of the local Ordinary calls upon laymen to take part in the administration of ecclesiastical property, the whole administration must nevertheless be conducted in the name of the Church, and the Ordinary's right of visitation and of demanding a regular account and prescribing the mode of administration must be safeguarded.

THE GENERAL DUTIES OF ADMINISTRATORS

The following canons set forth the duties of administrators appointed by law or charter or by order of the Ordinary; first, before assuming office:

CAN. 1522

Antequam administratores bonorum ecclesiasticorum, de quibus in can. 1521, suum munus ineant:

1.° Debent se bene et fideliter administraturos coram Ordinario loci vel vicario foraneo iureiurando cavere;

2.° Fiat accuratum ac distinctum inventarium, ab omnibus subscribendum, rerum immobilium, rerum mobilium pretiosarum aliarumve cum descriptione atque aestimatione earundem; vel factum antea inventarium acceptetur, adnotatis rebus quae interim amissae vel acquisitae fuerint;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Huius inventarii alterum exemplar conservetur in tabulario administrationis, alterum in archivo Curiae; et in utroque quaelibet immutatio adnotetur quam patrimonium subire contingat.

Before they assume office, the administrators of church property, (a) must take an oath before the local Ordinary or the rural dean, by which they promise that they will perform their obligations properly and faithfully. (b) They must sign the inventory, which must be made accurately and distinctly, of all the immovable property, as also of precious movable goods, clearly described and appraised; or accept an inventory already made, which should account for things either lost or acquired in the meantime. (c) Of this inventory two copies must be drawn up, one of which must be kept in the archives of the administrative council and the other in the archives of the diocesan court, in each of which all changes in the property must be duly noted.

Can. 1523

Administratores bonorum ecclesiasticorum diligentia boni patrisfamilias suum munus implere tenentur; ac proinde debent:

1.° Vigilare ne bona ecclesiastica suae curae concredita quoquo modo pereant aut detrimentum capiant;

2.° Praescripta servare iuris tam canonici quam civilis, aut quae a fundatore vel donatore vel legitima auctoritate imposita sint;

3.° Reditus bonorum ac proventus accurate et iusto tempore exigere exactosque loco tuto servare et secundum fundatoris mentem aut statutas leges vel normas impendere;

4.° Pecuniam ecclesiae, quae de expensis supersit et

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 07:9 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

utiliter collocari potest, de consensu Ordinarii, in emolumentum ipsius ecclesiae occupare;

5.° Accepti et expensi libros bene ordinatos habere;

6.° Documenta et instrumenta, quibus iura ecclesiae in bona nituntur, rite ordinare et in ecclesiae archivo vel armario convenienti et apto custodire; authentica vero eorum exemplaria, ubi commode fieri potest, in archivo vel armario Curiae deponere.

Administrators of ecclesiastical property should administer their office like a good father of a family; in particular,

1.° They should see to it that nothing entrusted to their care is lost or damaged;

2.° They shall observe the rules laid down by both ecclesiastical and civil law, and the regulations imposed by the founder or donor, or by lawful authority;

3.° They shall collect the revenues and fees (produce, rent, etc.), at the proper time, keep them safely, and use them in accordance with the will of the founder and the rules of the charter;

4.° They shall invest the surplus profitably, with the consent of the Ordinary, and to the advantage of the Church;

5.° They shall keep the books of income and expenditures in good order;

6.° They shall keep the holographs and title deeds of the church in good order and place them in the archives or safe of the church, and copies or abstracts in the diocesan archives or safe.

Can. 1524

Omnes, et praesertim clerici, religiosi ac rerum ecclesiasticarum administratores, in operum locatione de-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bent assignare operariis honestam iustamque mercedem; curare ut iidem pietati, idoneo temporis spatio, vacent; nullo pacto eos abducere a domestica cura parsimoniaeque studio, neque plus eisdem imponere operis quam vires ferant neque id genus quod cum aetate sexuque dissideat.

This canon refers to a duty incumbent on administrators of church property, which is of a preëminently social character because it enjoins on them the obligation of paying fair wages to workingmen. All administrators, it says, especially clerics and religious, must pay their employees a just and adequate wage; they should also see to it that the workingmen be allowed a convenient time for fulfilling their religious duties; they should never keep them from their domestic duties or from habits of thrift nor impose upon them more work than their strength, age or sex enables them to perform. The whole famous encyclical letter of Leo XIII "On the Condition of the Working Classes" is here contained in a nutshell.[9] We will not, although the temptation is strong, dwell on this point. On the one hand, an example is to be set of really religious interpenetration of work and prayer, and on the other, the world is to be shown that the Church is opposed to slavish drudgery, but not to wholesome social and domestic pursuits. If priests and religious fail to do justice to workingmen, how can the world expect enlightenment and guidance from the Church in the solution of the labor question?

9 "Rerum Novarum," May 15, 1891; J. A. Ryan, A Living Wage. This canon also applies to housekeepers and janitors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SPECIAL DUTIES OF ADMINISTRATORS

CAN. 1525

§ 1. Reprobata contraria consuetudine, administratores, tam ecclesiastici quam laici, cuiusvis ecclesiae etiam cathedralis aut loci pii canonice erecti aut confraternitatis, singulis annis officio tenentur reddendi rationem administrationis Ordinario loci.

§ 2. Si ex peculiari iure aliis ad id designatis ratio reddenda sit, tunc etiam Ordinarius loci vel eius delegatus cum his admittatur, ea lege ut aliter factae liberationes ipsis administratoribus minime suffragentur.

§ 1 of canon 1525 reprobates any custom contrary to the duty, established by long standing law,[10] of rendering annual accounts to the local Ordinary. This law is binding on clerical as well as lay administrators

(a) Of every church, including the cathedral church, and every public oratory, with the exception of churches belonging to exempt religious exclusively and solely by reason of their own service and for their own purpose, without being a parish or incorporated church by way of a benefice. Parish churches governed by religious must also render an account of their administration.[11]

(b) Accounts must also be rendered of any and all charitable or pious institutions canonically erected, no matter whether governed by secular or religious, even exempt, clergymen. Thus, if religious conduct a hospital or an asylum of any kind, an account must be given, the reason being that such charitable institutions concern the faithful, or the Church at large, and are often of the na-

10 C. 11, C. 10, q. 1, (Synod. Tolet. IV).

11 C. 31, X, III, 5; see can. 532 f.; can. 1504.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ture of foundations connected with a last will.[12] This rule holds also concerning institutions under royal protection.[13]

(c) The syndics of each and every confraternity, without exception, even though affiliated with an archconfraternity in the City of Rome, for instance, that of the "Good Death," and even though it be erected in a church of exempt religious,[14] must likewise render an account to the bishop. Of course, this is to be understood only of such confraternities as have revenues of their own, and form at least a juridical entitiy (un' ente morale).

§ 2. If there is a special statute requiring that accounts be rendered to others designated for that purpose, the local Ordinary or his delegate must also be allowed to inspect the accounts, and all stipulations made for the purpose of excluding the Ordinary are void. Thus, for instance, if a municipality is entitled to receive the account of a pious foundation, which contains a clause to the effect that the local Ordinary be excluded, this clause would be invalid in the ecclesiastical court.[15] The same is true of any custom that may have crept in against the present canon.[16]

CAN. 1526

Administratores litem nomine ecclesiae ne inchoent vel contestentur nisi licentiam obtinuerint scripto datam Ordinarii loci, aut saltem, si res urgeat, vicarii

12 Cfr. c. 2, Clem. III, 11, where xenodochia, leprosariae, eleemosynariae, hospitalia, though exempt, are mentioned; see Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881.

13 S. C. C., Dec. 10, 1621, and saepius (Richter, Trid., p. 168, n. 4 f.).

14 S. C. C., Sept. 20, 1710; March 24, 1725 (Richter, l. c., nn. 6 f.).

15 S. C. C., June 6, July 11, 1750 (Richter, l. c., n. 2).

16 S. C. C., Jan. 18, 1757 (ibid., n. 3).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

foranei, qui statim Ordinarium de concessa licentia certiorem reddere debet.

Administrators of church property must not institute or contest a lawsuit in the name of the church without having obtained written permission from the local Ordinary or, in urgent cases, from the rural dean, who shall immediately inform the Ordinary when he has granted such a permission.

"Nomine ecclesiae" means in the name of the church or pious foundation. For going to law the administrators need the formal and written consent of the local Ordinary, because he is the administrator of all church property in his diocese.

CAN. 1527

§ 1. Nisi prius ab Ordinario loci facultatem impetraverint, scriptis dandam, administratores invalide actus ponunt qui ordinariae administrationis fines et modum excedant.

§ 2. Ecclesia non tenetur respondere de contractibus ab administratoribus sine licentia competentis Superioris initis, nisi quando et quatenus in rem suam versum sit.

If they disregard his advice and are defeated in a lawsuit, they are bound in conscience and by ecclesiastical law to make up for the loss sustained.[17] The church is not responsible for contracts made by the administrator without the permission of the competent superior, unless the contract is favorable. This favor ecclesiae is to be extended to lawsuits as well.

According to § 1 of can. 1527, administrators per-

17 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 29, 1850, ad 1 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 125 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

form even otherwise legal acts invalidly if they exceed the limits and mode of ordinary administration without having obtained the necessary written permission of the local Ordinary.

Ordinary administration as a rule excludes the acceptance or refusal of legacies, bequests, donations, the purchase of immovable property, mortgages and rents for more than three years, alienation of precious objects, borrowing a considerable sum, building new edifices and cemeteries, making repairs of importance, suppressing parishes and institutions, imposing taxes or taking up collections.[18] For all these acts, therefore, the bishop's permission is required.

CAN. 1528

Etsi ad administrationem non teneantur titulo beneficii vel officii ecclesiastici, administratores qui munus expresse vel tacite susceptum arbitratu suo dimittunt ita ut damnum ecclesiae obveniat, ad restitutionem tenentur.

Administrators are obliged to restitution if they relinquish an office which they have either explicitly or tacitly assumed and thereby cause loss to the church. This rule holds even though they were not bound to act as administrators by reason of an ecclesiastical benefice or office.

Hence also laymen may be bound to make restitution according to the rules laid down in moral theology.

18 S. C. P. F., July 21, 1856, n. 20 (Coll., n. 1127).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXIX

CONTRACTS

ECCLESIASTICAL AND CIVIL CONTRACTS

CAN. 1529

Quae ius civile in territorio statuit de contractibus tam in genere, quam in specie, sive nominatis sive innominatis, et de solutionibus, eadem iure canonico in materia ecclesiastica iisdem cum effectibus serventur, nisi iuri divino contraria sint aut aliud iure canonico caveatur.

Whatever the civil law of a country determines with regard to contracts, general and specific, named and nameless, as well as payments, shall be observed also in ecclesiastical law and with the same legal effects, unless the civil laws run counter to divine law, and, unless the canons provide otherwise.

A contract is a formal agreement made between two or more parties ("duorum vel plurium in idem placitum consensus").[1] Contracts are sometimes divided into nominati and innominati, the former being such as have obtained special names in law, as, for instance, contracts of sale, rent, lease, whilst nameless contracts are comprised under the fourfold class of: do ut des, facio ut facias, do ut facias, facio ut des. The third is especially applied to pious foundations (can. 1544).

The essential elements of a contract are: the consent of 1 Cfr. Engel, I, tit. 25, n. 7 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the contracting parties, their ability to contract, and the consideration itself. The civil law prescribes formalities or rules which must be observed in order that a contract be valid. These formalities may concern all contracts in general or only a certain class of contracts. These civil formalities, says our canon, must be observed even if the subject matter, or the consideration, or the contracting parties belong to the Church. But there are two exceptions: (1) provided the contract does not contravene the divine positive law, and (2) provided the canon law is not against its observance. Whether the term "divine law" includes natural law is not quite evident. Neither is the doubt completely solved by can. 1513, where natural and ecclesiastical law only are mentioned, and where a will lacking the formalities required by civil law is held to be valid in the court of conscience. We leave it to the theologians to decide this problem. Clearly opposed to divine law would be a civil law excluding ecclesiastical persons, either physical or moral, from the right of making contracts. The ecclesiastical law differs in some respects from the civil law with regard to religious, as may be seen in can. 536. Against ecclesiastical law is also the obligatory form of civil marriage, which, besides, violates the divine law. These exceptions admitted, it is safe to follow the civil law, because after all, a law worthy of the name should be nothing else than a more detailed application of the natural law, and jurists should be grateful that the new Code offers an illustrious example of the conciliatory spirit of the Church and her readiness to adapt herself to the reasonable demands of the State. Modern jurists define a contract as "a promise or agreement enforceable by law," but complain that the definition is not satisfactory.[2] All

2 Harriman, The Law of Contracts, 1901, § 3 ff.; § 610 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more or less agree that a formal contract at least needs the support of law. Which is true, as far as material coercion is concerned; but a contract may be binding in conscience. However, our Code accepts the formal contract with the reservation pointed out. Formal contracts in our law are those the existence of which can be established by a record or a deed. Unilateral contracts impose an obligation on one party only, whereas bilateral contracts impose obligations on both parties. Requisites for valid contracts are set forth by the jurists as affecting the promise itself, the one who makes it, and the one to whom it is made. Yet, though all the elements of a contract be present, there may be a law which prevents their effecting a contractual obligation, and therefore, renders a contract illegal. Of these there are quite a number in canon law.[3]

ALIENATION

CAN. 1530

§ 1. Salvo praescripto can. 1281, § 1, ad alienandas res ecclesiasticas immobiles aut mobiles, quae servando servari possunt, requiritur:

1.° Aestimatio rei a probis peritis scripto facta;

2.° Iusta causa, idest urgens necessitas, vel evidens utilitas Ecclesiae, vel pietas;

3.° Licentia legitimi Superioris, sine qua alienatio invalida est.

§ 2. Aliae quoque opportunae cautelae, ab ipsomet Superiore pro diversis adiunctis praescribendae, ne omittantur, ut Ecclesiae damnum vitetur.

Alienation implies the turning away of a thing from its proper purpose or destiny.[4] From this it was but logical

3 Ibid., § 171 ff.

4 Cfr. c. 2, C. 12, q. 2: "quae a religioso aliena sunt proposito."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to apply the term to any act by which the ownership or usufruct or any right belonging to the Church was transferred to another. However, it also implies a transfer that is detrimental,[5] which indeed is verified in any loss of a right, but may nevertheless be more useful than its retention. Besides, it must be remembered that the purpose of Church property is wide, and that the poor and captives always had a special claim on the property of the Church. Hence the alienation even of sacred vessels was not considered forbidden if captives had to be redeemed or the poor succored.[6] Forbidden, however, was any unwarranted and purposeless alienation, (under the feudal system any alienation without the consent of the Lord.)[7] This is still traceable in the present legislation, the reason for which is stated in can. 1518.

Alienation, then, is the transfer of an object or right from one to another and partakes of the nature of an onerous contract, which involves a deterioration in the condition of the holder. The acts by which this transfer is made are: sale, exchange, payment, donation, mortgage, leases for more than three years, bailment and security, and cessio iuris, or cession of a right acquired, such as admitting a servitude.[8] The objects or rights which are or may be transferred by way of alienation are things of material value or price (res pretio aestimabiles); hence movable as well as immovable goods.

Movable goods are either such as can be preserved or kept without loss, (quae servando servari possunt), for instance, title deeds, books, treasures, etc.; or things that

5 Thus c. 52, C, 12, q. 2: "ut meliora prospiciat."

6 Cfr. cc. 14, 15, 70, C. 12, q. 2.

7 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., II, 288 f.

8 All these acts occur in the sources of law; see Santi-Leitner, III, 13, n. 1; Wernz, III, n. 154, who justly observes that a repudiatio lucri, though illicit, is no alienation, because it is not yet property acquired.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are easily consumed or corrupted, for instance, produce.[9] Movable goods may be precious, or have little value, at least for the time being. Precious things, can. 1497, § 2 says, are such as have a considerable artistic value (paintings, sculptures by great artists) or a historical value (manuscripts or archaeological objects) or are made of precious material (jewelry, rare stones, pearls). The term precious might also be applied to an entire library, or to the sacred treasure of a church.

Immovable property consists of land, buildings, lakes, rivers, mines, etc. These too are estimated in proportion to their value, according to the canon "Terrulas" (c. 53, c. 12, q. 2).[10] Immovable, though incorporeal, property are rights of way, the privilege of fishing or hunting, etc. To give up such rights or privileges or to surrender them when in dispute (cessio litis), would be alienation.

Alienation is not forbidden absolutely, for, as stated above, this act signifies a deterioration of the material condition of a church or corporation, which the common law endeavors to prevent by administrative restrictions or regulations. An absolute prohibition might involve a summa iniuria, which the legislator certainly does not intend. Therefore can. 1530 sets forth certain conditions which render alienation lawful and valid.

For the alienation of sacred relics the express permission of the Holy See is required, according to can. 1281, § 1. All other ecclesiastical goods, whether immovable or movable, may be alienated, under the following conditions:

9 To this class also belong: young stock, calves, pigs, lambs, chickens, the right of selling which canonists admit, but not the entire herd at once.

10 The value of this less valuable property, according to an antiquated opinion, would be about $50, or 268 francs; Santi-Leitner, l. c., n. 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° An appraisement of the goods must be made by conscientious experts;

2.° There must be a just cause, i. e., urgent necessity, or evident utility on the part of the church, or piety;

3.° The competent superior must give his permission, without which alienation would be invalid.

The superior may also prescribe other precautions and formalities, as the circumstances of the case may demand, in order to prevent damage to the church.

Here it may be noted that perishable or easily consumable goods require no formalities; hence live stock or produce may be bought, sold, or exchanged without any scruples of conscience, unless the competent superior has prescribed special rules, as, for instance, that no exports shall be made in time of public calamity beyond certain boundaries, or nothing be bought from a place or country infected by a contagious disease or an epidemic.

Valuation or appraisement is not required under pain of nullity. Nor is the cause required under such a penalty. However, if alienation were made without any reason, the one who made it to the detriment of the church would certainly be obliged to restitution, because administrators of church property are not possessors, but trustees.

Just reasons for lawful alienation are these three: necessity, utility, piety. Necessity must be urgent here and now, for instance, the paying of a debt, redeeming a mortgage, the indispensable support of the ministers, repair of the church, etc. The utility must be evident, i. e., considering all the circumstances of the case, alienation must be more profitable than the retention of the property, for instance, buying a piece of property to round out one already held, a rare occasion of buying a library, etc. Piety may mean gratitude towards those from whom we have received favors, aid and succour of the poor and captives,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as stated above, in fact the whole field of practical corporeal works of Christian mercy and charity.

CAN. 1531

§ 1. Res alienari minore pretio non debet quam quod in aestimatione indicatur.

§ 2. Alienatio fiat per publicam licitationem aut saltem nota reddatur, nisi aliud circumstantiae suadeant; et res ei concedatur qui, omnibus perpensis, plus obtulerit.

§ 3. Pecunia ex alienatione percepta caute, tuto et utiliter in commodum Ecclesiae collocetur.

This canon rules, not, however, under pain of nullity,

1.° That no thing should be alienated for less than what it was appraised at, because this would involve injustice and grafting;

2.° That alienation should take place by auction, or at least by advertisement of a public sale, unless circumstances advise the contrary; and the property to be disposed of should, everything being considered, be given to the highest bidder;

3.° That the sum realized from alienation should be invested safely and profitably.

Concerning the public auctioning of church property, the rules usually given by canonists are somewhat out of date and inapplicable to modern conditions.[11] But public auction is still commendable, in as much as it is apt to prevent favoritism and nepotism. For the rest, the civil law governing public auctions may safely be followed. Circumstances may demand less publicity, as when church property has to be sold on account of bankruptcy, or to 11 Bened. XIV, "Essendo," Nov. 23, 1742; S. C. EE. et RR., March 18, 1835 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 62 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google protect the church against an iniquitous civil law, or to spare the good name of an institution.[12]

CAN. 1532

§ 1. Legitimus Superior de quo in can. 1530, § 1, n. 3, est Sedes Apostolica, si agatur:

1.° De rebus pretiosis;

2.° De rebus quae valorem excedunt triginta millium libellarum seu francorum.

§ 2. Si vero agatur de rebus quae valorem non excedunt mille libellarum seu francorum, est loci Ordinarius, audito administrationis Consilio, nisi res minimi momenti sit, et cum eorum consensu quorum interest.

§ 3. Si denique de rebus quarum pretium continetur intra mille libellas et triginta millia libellarum seu francorum, est loci Ordinarius, dummodo accesserit consensus tum Capituli cathedralis, tum Consilii administrationis, tum eorum quorum interest.

§ 4. Si agatur de alienanda re divisibili, in petenda licentia aut consensu pro alienatione exprimi debent partes antea alienatae; secus licentia irrita est.

Can. 1532 determines the lawful superior whose permission is required for valid alienation. This superior is:

1.° The Apostolic See, i. e., the S. C. Concilii (can. 250, § 2), if (a) precious things of any kind or amount are to be alienated, for they are not precisely appraised in our 12 That the investment should be made in safe securities, is a wise ruling, but has nothing to do with the validity of the act, if the sum does not exceed the value stated in can. 1532. Hence, despite the decision of the S. C. C., quoted in the Irish Eccl. Record, Jan., 1920, p. 67, the answer there given shoots beyond the mark and is against can. 1530, § 1, n. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

canon; or (b) if property is to be disposed of, the value of which exceeds the sum of 30,000 lire (or francs),[13] i. e., about $6,000 to $10,000.

2.° If the value of the property to be alienated does not exceed the sum of 1,000 lire (or francs), i. e., about $200, the local Ordinary may proceed after having heard the advice of the board of administrators — unless the property is of very little value — and with the consent of those concerned.

"Those concerned" are the contracting parties, who, however, must be in a condition to give their consent. While a benefice is vacant, or while an episcopal see is vacant, no alienation of property belonging to the benefice or to the mensa episcopalis is permitted, even though the amount would be small. Hence the canon "Terrulas" cannot be applied here, because it would be contrary to can. 436: "Sede vacante nihil innovetur."[14]

3.° If the value of the property to be alienated is between 1,000 and 30,000 lire (or francs), the local Ordinary may proceed, provided a threefold consent has been obtained, viz., (1) that of the cathedral chapter (or diocesan consultors), which must be given collegialiter, i. e., by vote at a meeting; (2) the consent of the board of administrators, and (3) that of the persons concerned. The penalties are stated in can. 2347.

4.° If the property to be alienated is divisible, the parts which have been previously alienated must be mentioned in the petition for permission or consent, under pain of nullity. Hence no concealment is admissible, because it may endanger the validity of the transaction.

13 What was said under can. 534 (see this Commentary, Vol. III, p. 186) must be reaffirmed, provided, of course, the valuta is normal.

14 See C. 1, X, III, 9; S. C. EE. et RR., June 14, 1788 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 40 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This holds concerning the papal indult as well as with regard to anyone's consent.

We call attention to can. 81, which certainly may be applied in cases that brook no delay or where delay would entail serious loss.

FORMALITIES OF ALIENATION

CAN. 1533

Sollemnitates ad normam can. 1530-1532 requiruntur non solum in alienatione proprie dicta, sed etiam in quolibet contractu quo conditio Ecclesiae peior fieri possit.

Can. 1533 applies the formalities set forth in can. 1530–1532 not only to alienation in the technical sense of the word, but to any contract by which the status of the Church might be impaired. Prelates may improve the condition of their churches, but are not allowed to render it worse.[15] A deterioration may be brought about by mortgages or securities as well as by donations (see can. 1535) and onerous contracts.[16] Alms or offerings collected by missionaries also constitute ecclesiastical property and may not be acquired or disposed of at will by the missionary, even though it were for the benefit of the mission.[17] This rule, of course, includes the making of debts, which is always dangerous, especially if done by such as do not know the value of money or lack business capacity.

CAN. 1534

§ 1. Ecclesiae competit actio personalis contra eum qui sine debitis sollemnitatibus bona ecclesiastica alienaverit et contra eius heredes; realis vero, si alien-

15 C. 2, X, III, 24.
16 C. 2, X, III, 23.
17 S. C. P. F., May 27, 1881 (Coll., n. 1553); see can. 534.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

atio nulla fuerit, contra quemlibet possessorem, salvo iure emptoris contra male alienantem.

§ 2. Contra invalidam rerum ecclesiasticarum alienationem agere possunt qui rem alienavit, eius Superior, utriusque successor in officio, tandem quilibet clericus illi ecclesiae adscriptus, quae damnum passa sit.

The Church, i. e., each single church corporation, or juridical entity (through its syndic) has the right to bring a double action. A personal action may be brought against anyone who has alienated church property without observing the formalities required by law. This action, brought to recover the damage or property itself, is also extended to the heirs of the one who is guilty of illegal alienation, because the heir is supposed to be identical in law with the deceased who acted unlawfully. Real action may be brought, in case of invalid alienation, against any one who acquired church property that was alienated illegally, even if he bought it in good faith. However, the possessor thus brought to law may, on his side, bring suit against the one who performed an illegal alienation.[18] But it also must be added that if the illegally alienated property was obtained by personal action, no real action is to be brought against the possessor, because the same thing cannot be demanded twice, and vice versa.

§ 2 says that invalid alienation can be revoked either by the alienator himself, or by his superior, or by the successor of either, and, finally, by any clergyman assigned to the church which has sustained a loss by the invalid alienation. The text from which our canon is taken threatens with penalties the clergyman who neglects to denounce the illegal alienator or donator.[19]

18 Cfr. c. 6, X, III, 13; I. 3, X, III, 21; Reiffenstuel, III, 13, n. 62.

19 C. 6, x, III, 13; c. 2, x, III, 14; c. 2, x, III, 24 (against donation).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DONATIONS

CAN. 1535

Praelati et rectores de bonis mobilibus suarum ecclesiarum donationes, praeterquam parvas et modicas secundum legitimam loci consuetudinem, facere ne praesumant, nisi iusta interveniente causa remunerationis aut pietatis aut christianae caritatis; secus donatio a successoribus revocari poterit.

Prelates and rectors are allowed to make only small and moderate donations from the movable property of the Church, according to legitimate local custom; large donations may be made only for a just reason, as reward, piety, or Christian charity. Donations made against this rule may be revoked by the successors.

Donations are free gifts and are here understood of movable property only, to the exclusion of immovable property.[20] Since prelates are not the owners of church property, but only the administrators, they are not allowed to deteriorate the condition of their church. Therefore only small and infrequent donations are permitted. The judgment concerning quantity and quality is left to the donor, who must be guided by local custom and by the circumstances of time and persons. But local custom must not be stretched so as to cover large donations because such a custom would be a corruption and therefore unreasonable. However three reasons may justify larger and more important donations: reward or remuneration, piety, and charity. Reward is here understood as a remuneration for services done to the church or to the 20 It is evident that the text intends only donations inter vivos, gifts to living persons, not donations mortis causa, made to go into effect after the donor's death; see commentators on lib. III, tit. 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prelate or rector, provided a certain equality or proportion be observed between the merits and the reward. Piety, as stated, may signify gratitude and duty either to one's relatives and friends, or to outsiders. Household, town, and diocese should determine the gradation. Christian charity is wider, embracing, as it does, all causae piae of every description. But the donor must always keep in view the condition of the church; for to go beyond the means at hand would be unreasonable and involve an unjustice.[21]

CAN. 1536

§ 1. Nisi contrarium probetur, praesumendum ea quae donantur rectoribus ecclesiarum, etiam religiosorum, esse ecclesiae donata.

§ 2. Donatio facta ecclesiae, ab eius rectore seu Superiore repudiari nequit sine licentia Ordinarii.

§ 3. Repudiata illegitime donatione, ob damna quae inde obvenerint actio datur restitutionis in integrum vel indemnitatis.

§ 4. Donatio ecclesiae facta et ab eadem legitime acceptata, propter ingratum Praelati vel rectoris animum revocari nequit.

§ 1 says that donations made to rectors of churches, secular or religious, are supposed to be made to the church, unless there is reason to presume the contrary (see can. 533).[22]

§§ 2 and 3 lay down certain rules concerning the refusal of donations. In order lawfully to refuse a donation made to a church, the rector or superior of the same needs the permission of the Ordinary. An illegal refusal, if a

21 Reiffenstuel, III, 24, n. 37 ff.
22 See this Commentary, Vol. III, p. 182.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google loss is caused thereby, justifies an action for restitutio in integrum or indemnity.

§ 4 departs from the Decretals,[23] inasmuch as the Code does not permit a donation made to a church and lawfully accepted by the latter, to be revoked on account of ingratitude or enmity on the part of the prelate or rector.

CAN. 1537

Res sacrae ne commodentur ad usum qui earundem naturae repugnet.

Sacred things, i. e., such as have received ecclesiastical consecration or blessing,[24] may not be loaned for a purpose repugnant to their nature. Thus a church should never be turned into a concert hall, a chalice is not to be used for banquets,[25] even though it were only by a transitory loan and the money were sorely needed. The rule is absolute and admits of no exception.[26]

MORTGAGES AND DEBTS

CAN. 1538

§ 1. Si ecclesiae bona, legitima interveniente causa, oppignoranda vel hypothecae nomine obliganda sint, vel agatur de aere alieno contrahendo, legitimus Superior, qui ad normam can. 1532 licentiam dare debet, exigat ut antea omnes, quorum interest, audiantur, et curet ut, cum primum fieri poterit, aes alienum solvatur.

§ 2. Hac de causa annuae ratae ab eodem Ordi-

23 C. 10, x, III, 24 admitted revocation on account of qualified ingratitude, such as violence, atrocities, serious injury.

24 Can. 1497, § 2.

25 See Dan. 5, 2 f.

26 Reg. Iuris 51 in 6°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nario praefiniantur quae exstinguendo debito sint destinatae.

§ 1. If, for a lawful reason, church property has to be pawned or mortgaged, or debts have to be made, the lawful superior who is entitled to grant permission, according to can. 1532, shall first hear all concerned, i. e., the administrators and rectors, or syndics, and endeavor to pay off the debt as soon as possible.

§ 2. For this purpose the Ordinary should determine the amount of annual payments. If the church has fixed revenues, this may be done by subtracting the necessary amount therefrom.[27] But if no fixed endowment or revenues are available, as is the case with most of our churches, a "sinking fund" should be established to wipe out the debt.

SALE AND EXCHANGE

CAN. 1539

§ 1. In venditione aut permutatione rerum sacrarum nulla ratio consecrationis vel benedictionis in pretii aestimatione habeatur.

§ 2. Administratores possunt titulos ad latorem, quos vocant, commutare in alios titulos magis aut saltem aeque tutos ac frugiferos, exclusa qualibet commercii vel negotiationis specie, ac de consensu Ordinarii, dioecesani Consilii administrationis aliorumque quorum intersit.

§ 1. When sacred things are sold or exchanged, the fact that they are consecrated or blessed shall not influence their valuation, i. e., no higher price can be lawfully

27 S. C. P. F., July 30, 1867, n.4 (Coll., n. 1310).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

charged for a consecrated or blessed object merely because it is consecrated or blessed. To do so would be simony.[28]

§ 2. The administrators may convert notes payable to bearer into other titles or investments which are safer than, or at least equally safe and profitable as, the former.

In doing so, however, they must avoid every species of trading or speculation, and, besides, obtain the previous consent of their Ordinary, of the diocesan board of administrators, and other interested persons.

ADMINISTRATORS AND RELATIVES EXCLUDED

CAN. 1540

Bona ecclesiae immobilia propriis administratoribus eorumque coniunctis in primo aut secundo consanguinitatis vel affinitatis gradu non sunt vendenda aut locanda sine speciali Ordinarii loci licentia.

Immovable church property cannot lawfully be sold or leased to the administrators themselves, or to persons related to them in the first or second degree either by blood or marriage, without special permission of the local Ordinary.

LEASE OR RENT

CAN. 1541

§ 1. Contractus locationis alicuius fundi ecclesiastici ne fiant, nisi ad norman can. 1531, § 2; et in iis addantur semper conditiones de limitibus custodiendis, de bona cultione, de rite solvendo canone, de opportuna cautela pro conditionibus implendis.

28 See can. 730.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Pro locatione bonorum ecclesiasticorum, servato praescripto can. 1479:

1.° Si valor locationis excedat triginta millia libellarum seu francorum et locatio sit ultra novennium, requiritur beneplacitum apostolicum; si locatio non sit ultra novennium, servari debet praescriptum can. 1532, § 3;

2.° Si valor contineatur intra mille libellas et triginta millia libellarum seu francorum et locatio sit ultra novennium, servari debet praescriptum eiusdem can. 1532, § 3; si locatio non sit ultra novennium, praescriptum eiusdem can. 1532, § 2;

3.° Si valor non excedat mille libellas seu francos et locatio sit ultra novennium, servari debet praescriptum can. 1532, § 2; si locatio non sit ultra novennium, fieri potest a legitimis administratoribus, monito Ordinario.

§ 1. Land belonging to a church should not be rented except by public auction or announcement, as stated under can. 1531, § 2, and exact conditions must be laid down in the lease or rent contract as to the boundaries, appropriate methods of cultivation, payment of rent, and the necessary safeguards for the fulfillment of the conditions.

§ 2. Anticipated payments being excluded according to can. 1479, the following rules must be observed in leasing or renting church property:

1.° If the rental exceeds 30,000 lire (or francs) and the lease is made for more than nine years, a papal indult is required; if the contract is made for less than nine years, the local Ordinary may give the permission, with the consent of his cathedral chapter (or diocesan consultors), the board of administrators, and those interested.

2.° If the rental is between 1,000 and 30,000 lire (or francs) and the lease runs more than nine years, the local Ordinary may grant permission, with the consent of those just mentioned; but if the contract is made for less than nine years, the local Ordinary has only to consult with the board of administrators and obtain the consent of those concerned.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° If the rental is less than 1,000 lire (or francs) and the contract reads for more than nine years, the local Ordinary has to consult with the board of administrators and obtain the consent of those concerned; if the contract is for nine years or less, the administrators themselves may sign the contract and notify the Ordinary.

The Code has extended the time limit from three to nine years.

CAN. 1542

§ 1. In emphyteusi bonorum ecclesiasticorum emphyteuta nequit canonem redimere sine licentia legitimi Superioris ecclesiastici de quo in can. 1532; quod si redemerit, eam saltem pecuniae vim ecclesiae dare debet, quae canoni respondeat.

§ 2. Ab emphyteuta congrua exigatur cautio pro solutione canonis et conditionibus implendis; in ipso instrumento pacti emphyteutici forum ecclesiasticum arbiter statuatur ad dirimendas controversias inter partes forte exorituras et expresse declaretur meliorationes solo cedere.

Emphyteusis has little practical value, at least in our law. Ancient jurists distinguished it from locatio, defining the latter as an informal contract by which the usufruct, or use, of an object, or the labor of a person is let or hired,[29] whereas emphyteusis was a species of indefinite [29] Santi-Leitner, III, 18, n. 1; n. 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lease of immovable property, under which the tenant paid rent, but had all but the nominal ownership of the land.[30] Enfeoffment would most nearly correspond to emphyteusis; but the general term lease conveys the idea just as well. Now our canon says that the lessee of church property cannot redeem the rent without the permission of the competent ecclesiastical superior, and if he does redeem the fee — which is generally paid annually — he must give at least as much as the whole rent for the entire time would amount to. Besides the lessee must give security for the payment of the rent and for complying with the other conditions. The lease itself must contain the clause that the ecclesiastical court is the competent court to settle disputes between the parties and that all improvements accrue to the soil.

INTEREST

CAN. 1543

Si res fungibilis ita alicui detur ut eius fiat et postea tantundem in eodem genere restituatur, nihil lucri, ratione ipsius contractus, percipi potest; sed in praestatione rei fungibilis non est per se illicitum de lucro legali pacisci, nisi constet ipsum esse immoderatum, aut etiam de lucro maiore, si iustus ac proportionatus titulus suffragetur.

"Fungible" goods are such as can be replaced in kind. If such goods are given to a person in such a way that he becomes the owner thereof, and are restored in kind to the same amount, no interest can be demanded by reason of the contract itself, for it would be usury to demand back

30 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., II, 309 ff.; Stimson's Law Dictionary, 1911, s. v. "Emphyteusis."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more than was given ("nihil in mutuo vi mutui accipiendum ultra sortem principalem"). However, it is not per se forbidden to make loans under the usual legal conditions, provided no excessive interest is charged; nor is it forbidden to stipulate a higher rate of interest if a just and proportionate reason can be advanced.

The quintessence of this canon is that interest on loans is permitted according to the usual and legal rate, not precisely by reason of the contract, but by reason of the risk incurred and other circumstances.[31]

31 Cfr. Bened. XIV, "Vix pervenit," Nov. 1, 1745; S. C. P. F., Instr. 1873 (Coll., n. 1393, where the documents referring to these subjects are given and the question is treated ex professo).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXX

PIOUS FOUNDATIONS

DEFINITION

CAN. 1544

§ 1. Nomine piarum fundationum significantur bona temporalia alicui personae morali in Ecclesia quoquo modo data, cum onere in perpetuum vel in diuturnum tempus ex reditibus annuis aliquas Missas celebrandi, vel alias praefinitas functiones ecclesiasticas explendi, aut nonnulla pietatis et caritatis opera peragendi.

§ 2. Fundatio, legitime acceptata, naturam induit contractus synallagmatici: do ut facias.

CAN. 1545

Loci Ordinarii est normas praescribere de dotis quantitate infra quam pia fundatio admitti nequeat et de eius fructibus rite distribuendis.

The term "pious foundation" signifies temporal goods conveyed to some ecclesiastical juridical person with the perpetual or long-continued obligation to say Masses, or to perform certain ecclesiastical functions, or works of piety or charity, in consideration of the revenues received from said endowment. Hence every foundation, after it has been duly accepted, has the nature of a bilateral contract: "do ut facias."

If Title XXVI is compared with the present, the difference between them may appear very slight; however, there is a distinction between the institutions mentioned there and the foundations named in our canon. First, temporal goods enter into can. 1544, in directo, whereas in can. 1489 they are omitted as a member of the definition. Besides, our canon presupposes an artificial person already in existence, whereas can. 1489 mentions a decree that creates such persons. In other words, there is a juridical person existing either really or at least by a legal fiction and represented by legal authority. Lastly, the purpose of a pious foundation does not constitute the legal person, but obliges the respective person to perform certain things or acts in consideration of the goods donated. There is the temporal element on one side and the spiritual on the other, and between both stands the mediator, viz., the moral person. Hence such foundations can be called neither corporations nor institutions, but there is a juridical person who accepts the object of the contract, and the contract itself is called: "do ut facias." For in every contract, whether express or implied, there must be something given in exchange for something else, a mutual or reciprocal consideration. This is the case between master and servant, or employer and employee, when the former agrees to give the employee a certain sum for performing certain work. Hence the do are the temporal goods, while the ut facias is the performance of certain works. But since the works to be performed are mostly spiritual, it is necessary that the competent authority should intervene. Hence can. 1545 demands that the local Ordinaries should fix the minimum of endowment below which no pious foundation may be accepted, as well as the manner in which the interest is to be distributed. This is somewhat similar to fixing the amount of mass stipends.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:01 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SAFEGUARDS OF FOUNDATIONS

CAN. 1546

§ 1. Ut huiusmodi fundationes a persona morali acceptari possint, requiritur consensus Ordinarii loci, in scriptis datus, qui eum ne praebeat, antequam legitime compererit personam moralem tum novo oneri suscipiendo, tum antiquis iam susceptis satisfacere posse; maximeque caveat ut reditus omnino respondeant oneribus adiunctis secundum cuiusque dioecesis morem.

§ 2. In acceptatione, constitutione et administratione fundationis patronus ecclesiae nullum ius habet.

This canon (§ 1) commands that no more obligations be accepted than can be complied with, and that none be accepted for less than the customary tax. The written consent of the local Ordinary is required for the acceptance of foundations by ecclesiastical persons. This consent should never be given unless the Ordinary is assured that the institution is capable of fulfilling the new as well as any old obligations it has assumed or is to assume. The Ordinary shall also see to it that the consideration is in proportion to the obligations, according to local custom.

§ 2 provides that the patron has nothing to say about the acceptance, constitution, or administration of such pious foundations.

It may not be amiss to state that the local Ordinary is here intended for foundations under his jurisdiction.

CAN. 1547

Pecunia et bona mobilia, dotationis nomine assignata, statim in loco tuto, ab eodem Ordinario designando, deponantur ad eum finem ut eadem pecunia vel

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bonorum mobilium pretium custodiantur et quamprimum caute et utiliter secundum prudens eiusdem Ordinarii arbitrium, auditis et iis quorum interest et dioecesano administrationis Consilio, collocentur in commodum eiusdem fundationis cum expressa et individua mentione oneris.

This canon provides for the safekeeping and safe investment of pious foundations. All money and movable property assigned as an endowment, must be deposited in a safe place, to be designated by the local Ordinary. This, with us, generally is a bank. Titles and other valuable papers may be put in a safety vault. If stock or produce were offered, the easiest way would be to sell them.

The Ordinary shall then consult with those interested, i. e., the founder or his heirs, those who have accepted the foundation, and the diocesan board of administrators, as to the safest and most profitable way of investing the property for the benefit of the foundation. Each investment of this kind must be accompanied by express and specific mention of the obligation resting on the investment.

FORMALITIES

CAN. 1548

§ 1. Fundationes, etiam viva voce factae, scripto consignentur.

§ 2. Alterum tabularum exemplar in Curiae archivo, alterum in archivo personae moralis, ad quam fundatio spectat, tuto asservetur.

Pious foundations, even when made orally, must be set down in writing; one of the records must be kept in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the diocesan archives, the other in the archives of the institution which is obliged to fulfill the obligation.

CAN. 1549

§ 1. Servatis praescriptis can. 1514-1517 et can. 1525, in qualibet ecclesia onerum ex piis fundationibus incumbentium tabella conficiatur, quae apud rectorem in loco tuto conservetur.

§ 2. Pariter praeter librum de quo in can. 843, § 1, alter liber retineatur et apud rectorem servetur, in quo singula onera perpetua et temporaria eorumque implementum et eleemosynae adnotentur, ut de iis omnibus exacta ratio Ordinario loci reddatur.

In every church there must be kept a list of the obligations arising from pious foundations; this list must be preserved in a safe place in the rectory.

Besides the book for manual stipends,[1] mentioned in can. 843, § 1, there must be another, kept by the rector, in which each and every obligation, whether perpetual or temporary, is duly entered, as also the record of fulfillment (when a mass was said) and the amount of the alms, — so that an accurate account may be rendered to the local Ordinary.

EXEMPT RELIGIOUS

CAN. 1550

Si agatur de piis fundationibus in ecclesiis, etiam paroecialibus, religiosorum exemptorum, iura et offiicia

1 We cannot accept the theory advanced in a magazine that a priest who receives, say, $100 for "masses," can satisfy his obligation by saying 20 "high or sung masses," intead of 100 low masses. For this is a substantial, not merely an accidental, change, the ceremony of singing being a mere accidens; and the priest would therefore defraud the donor of eighty masses. Who can admit such a pious fraud?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ordinarii loci, de quibus in can. 1545–1549, exclusive competunt Superiori maiori.

As to pious foundations made and accepted by churches belonging to exempt religious, even if they be parish churches, all the rights and duties of the local Ordinary mentioned in canons 1545–1549, devolve on the major superior exclusively, according to the constitutions of the respective institute.

It may be added that the Constitution "Nuper," of Innocent XII,[2] from which these laws are chiefly taken, revokes and annuls all contrary privileges granted to any order.

REDUCTION OF OBLIGATIONS

CAN. 1551

§ 1. Reductio onerum quae pias fundationes gravant, uni Sedi Apostolicae reservatur, nisi in tabulis fundationis aliud expresse caveatur, et salvo praescripto can. 1517, § 2.

§ 2. Indultum reducendi Missas fundatas non protenditur nec ad alias Missas ex contractu debitas nec ad alia onera piae fundationis.

§ 3. Indultum vero generale reducendi onera piarum fundationum ita intelligendum est, nisi aliud constet, ut indultarius potius alia onera quam Missas reducat.

The reduction of obligations arising from pious foundations is reserved to the Apostolic See, unless the charter contains an express provision to the contrary and with due regard to can. 1517, § 2, which admits the reduction of certain foundations under certain conditions, but excepts masses.

2 § 30.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The S. C. Concilii sometimes grants an indult reducing foundation-masses, but this indult does not extend to masses to be said by some other species of contract different from that by which a foundation is accepted, nor to other works imposed by a pious foundation. Hence this particular kind of indult must be strictly interpreted. If a general indult is granted for reducing the obligation arising from a pious foundation, this must be understood and interpreted to mean that the grantee should reduce other works rather than the masses, unless the text of the indult reads differently. Thus if, besides Masses, the recitation of the divine office or certain prayers are prescribed in the foundation, the latter should be reduced rather than the masses.[3] Sometimes the wording of a general indult, or a particular indult, expressly permits the reduction of masses. Such indults need close inspection. For instance, it may be that the indult mentions legata taxative or demonstrative concepta. A legacy which is drawn up taxative is one which first fixes the sum of the endowment, say $1,000, and then the obligations to be fulfilled, say a requiem high mass every year on such and such a day. If the obligation is mentioned first, and the endowment afterwards, we have a legacy worded demonstrative. This kind of legacy is also called approximate and has this peculiarity that the heirs of the founder could, by ecclesiastical law, be compelled to supply the deficient funds so as to continue the fulfillment of the obligation, although the value of the endowment may have decreased.[4] However, this is often impossible. Hence, if the indult draws no distinction between the different kinds of bequests, the heirs are not to be bothered.

[3] S. C. C., May 6, 1803 (Richter, Trid., p. 139, n. 80); if the will of the founder does not appear, this rule must be followed; S. C. C., Sept. 11, 1717 (ibid., n. 81).

[4] S. C. C., Sept. 9, 1702; Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 25, 32.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The practice of the Roman Court, mentioned in rescripts, is to change missae cantatae into low Masses, provided the funds suffice for the same number.[5] If a reduction has already been granted, and another is asked for, there must be new reasons to justify the request.[6]

Reasons for granting a reduction of mass obligations are insufficiency of funds brought about by a considerable decrease in the endowment; and the poverty of the priests who would be obliged to say them.[7] In some cases the needy condition of the patron and the necessity of repairing the church were considered sufficient reasons at least for a temporary reduction.[8]

5 S. C. C., Feb. 3; Aug. 4, 1725 (Richter, l. c., p. 140, n. 83 f.).

6 S. C. C., Sept. 7, 1793 (ibid., n. 82).

7 S. C. C., Aug. 17, 1793, and pluries (l. c., n. 82).

8 S. C. C., Dec. 2, 1775; Nov. 29, 1777 (ibid.).

END OF VOL. VI

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

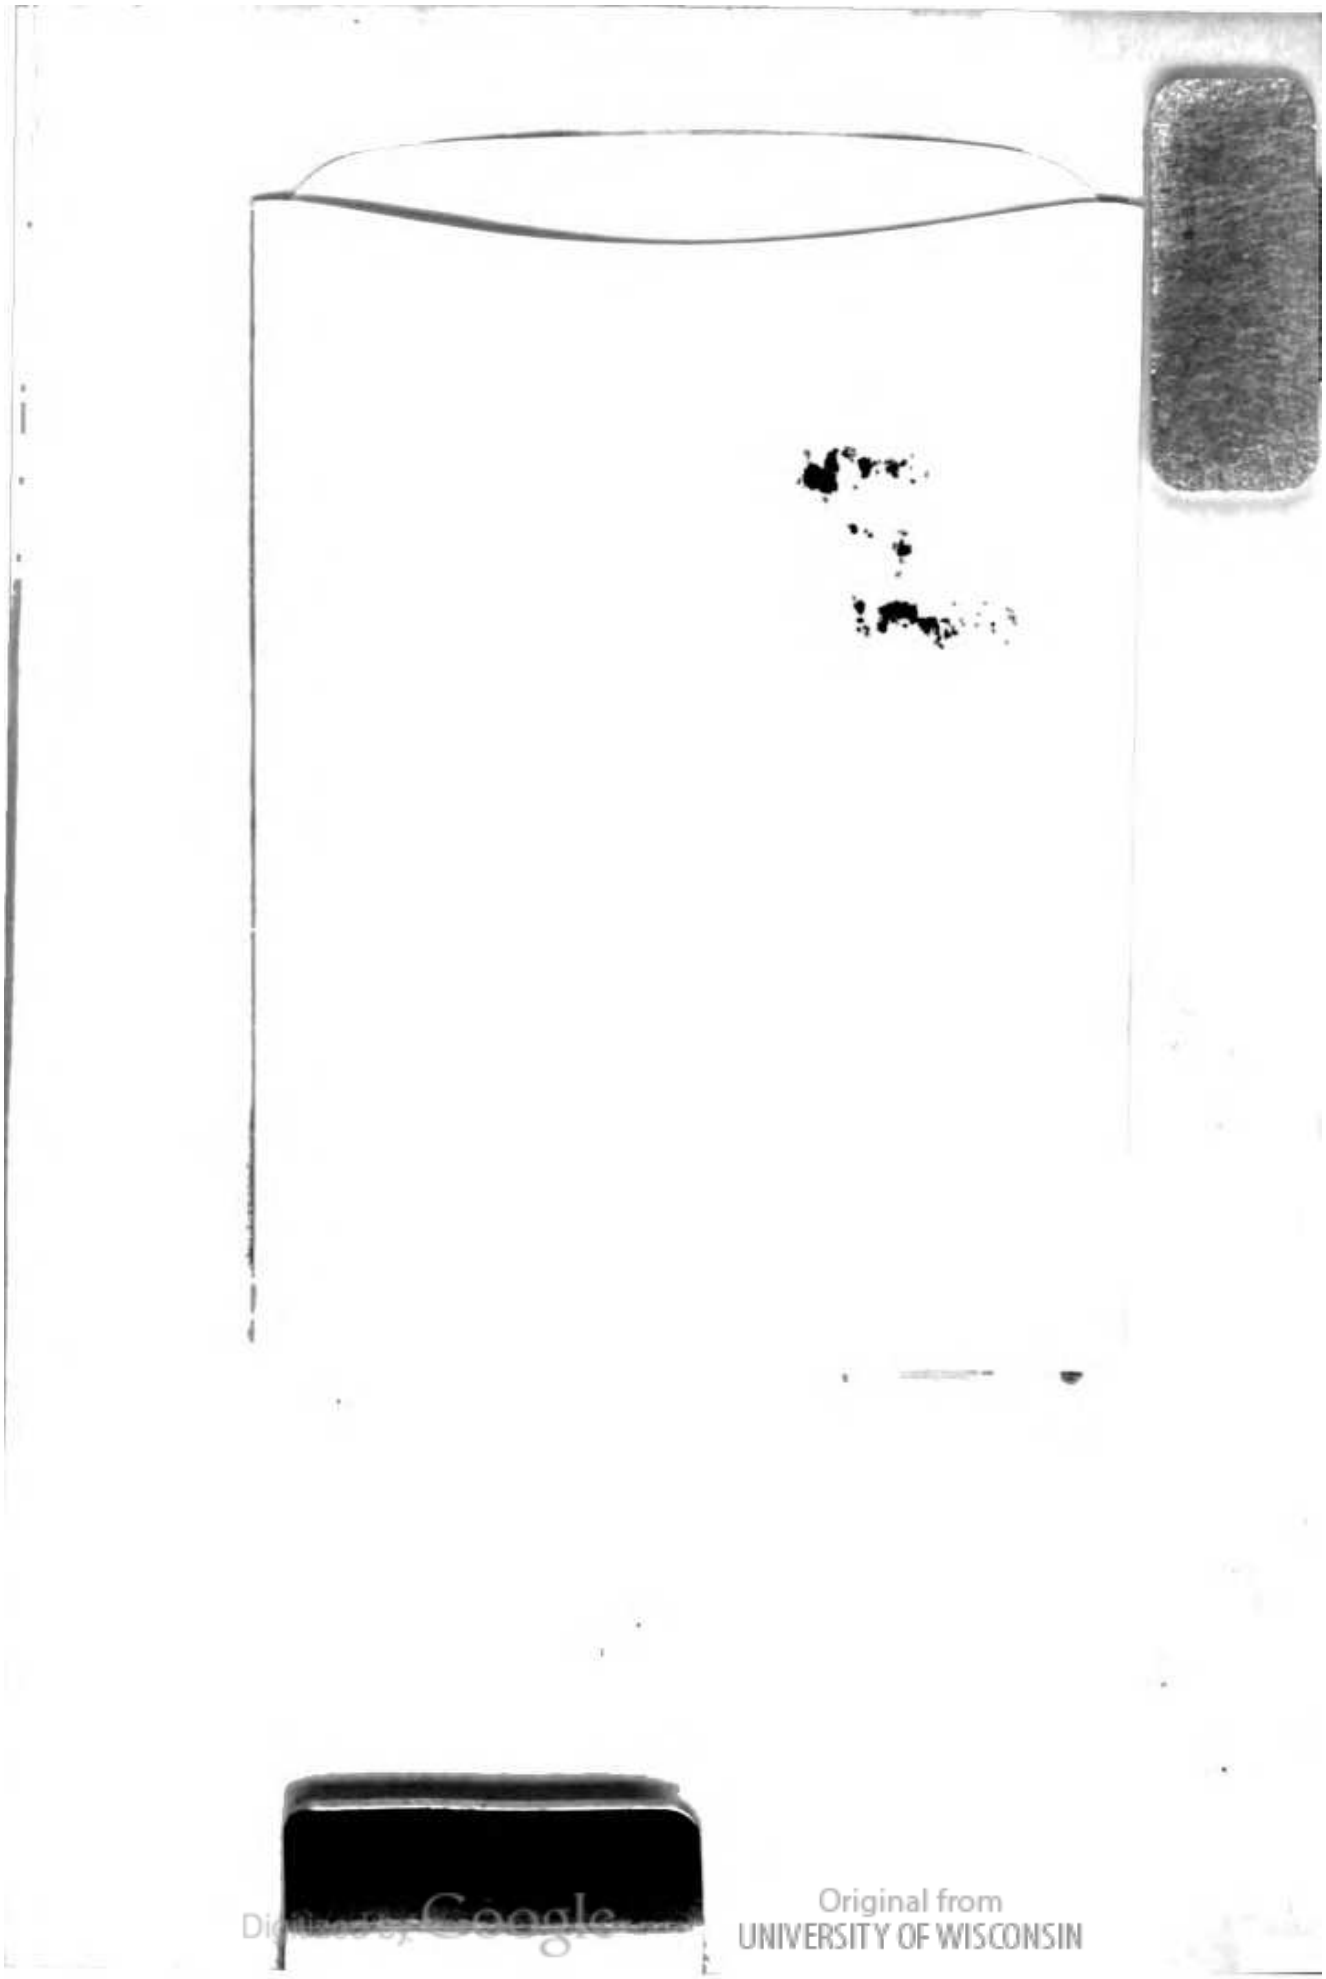
Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN



89097198196

B89097198196A

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

89097198196

b89097198196a

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 08:02 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A COMMENTARY on CANON LAW

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library

of the

University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

By THE REV. P. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

VOLUME VII
Ecclesiastical Procedure (Book IV)
(Can. 1552-2194)

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68, GREAT RUSSELL ST., LONDON, W. C.
1921

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CUM PERMISSU SUPERIORUM

NIHIL OBSTAT

Sti. Ludovici, die 8 Mart, 1921

F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum

IMPRIMATUR

Sti. Ludovici, die 9 Mart, 1921

✠Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici

Copyright. 1921,
by
Joseph Gummersbach

All rights reserved
Printed in U. S. A.

VAIL-BALLOU COMPANY
BINGHAMTON AND NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CQ
B12
7

587683

CONTENTS

	PAGE
BOOK IV—ECCLESIASTICAL PROCEDURE	1
Introduction	1
PART I. TRIALS	3
Definition, Division, and Object	3
Section I. Trials in General	11
Title I. The Forum Competens	11
Exemption of the Pope	11
Reserved Competency	12
Ordinary and Extraordinary Forum	14
Title II. Different Stages and Species of Tribunals	24
Roman Tribunals	24
Ordinary Tribunals	25
Chapter I. The Ordinary Tribunals of the First Instance	28
Art. I. The Judge	28
The Local Ordinary	28
The Official	29
Synodal Judges and Counselors	31
Collegiate Board of Judges	33
Art. II. Auditors and Referees	38
Art. III. Notary, Prosecuting Attorney, Defensor Vinculi	41
Art. IV. Beadles and Couriers	44
Chapter II. The Ordinary Tribunal of the Second Instance	46
Chapter III. The Ordinary Tribunals of the Apostolic See	49
Art. I. The Sacra Romana Rota	50
Art. II. The Signatura Apostolica	53
Chapter IV. Delegated Tribunals	57
Title III. Rules to be Observed by Ecclesiastical Tribunals	58

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

	PAGE
CHAPTER I. JUDGES AND OTHER OFFICIALS	59
Competency and Suspicion	59
Duties of the Judge	66
Penalties for Judges and Officials	72
Security or Bail	74
CHAPTER II. ORDER OF PROCEDURE	75
CHAPTER III. DELAYS AND "FATALIA"	81
CHAPTER IV. PLACE AND TIME OF JUDGMENT	83
CHAPTER V. PERSONS ADMITTED TO TRIALS; METHOD OF DRAWING UP AND KEEPING JUDICIAL ACTS	87
The Judicial Acts	88
TITLE IV. THE PARTIES TO THE CASE	95
CHAPTER I. PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANT	95
Who May be Plaintiff or Defendant	95
Minors	97
Religious as Plaintiffs	101
Ordinaries and Corporations	103
Excommunicated Persons	105
CHAPTER II. ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELS (ADVOCATES)	107
Choice of Attorneys and Counsels	107
Qualities and Conditions of Attorneys and Counsels	110
Mandate of Attorney and Counsel	113
Removal of Attorney and Counsel	115
TITLE V. ACTIONS AND EXCEPTIONS	118
In General	118
CHAPTER I. SEQUESTRATION AND INHIBITION	124
CHAPTER II. NOVI OPERIS NUNTIATIO AND DAMNUM INFECTUM	127
CHAPTER III. ACTIONS OF "NULLITAS ACTORUM"	129
CHAPTER IV. RESCISSORY ACTIONS AND RESTITUTION IN INTEGRUM	133
Rescissory Actions	133
Restitution in Integrum	135
CHAPTER V. COUNTER-PLEAS. (ACTIONES RECONVENTIONALES)	139
CHAPTER VI. POSSESSORY ACTIONS	141
CHAPTER VII. EXTINGUISHMENT OF ACTIONS	147
TITLE VI. OPENING OF THE CASE	157
CHAPTER I. THE BILL OF COMPLAINT	158

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

PAGE

CHAPTER II. SUMMONS AND INTIMATION 163
Contents of the Summons 165
Intimation or Conveyance of Summons 166
Necessity and Effect of Summons 170
TITLE VII. ISSUE IN PLEADING (LITIS CONTESTATIO) . 173
Definition and Requisites 173
Intricate and Doubtful Cases 174
Effects of the Litis Contestatio 176
TITLE VIII. LITIS INSTANTIA OR PROCEEDINGS 180
Definition and Interruption 180
Abatement of the Instantia 182
Renunciation 184
TITLE IX. QUESTIONING THE PARTIES 186
Questions to be Proposed 186
The Oath 188
TITLE X. PROOFS 191
Preliminary Rules 191
CHAPTER I. CONFESSION 196
CHAPTER II. WITNESSES AND TESTIMONY 201
Admission and Obligation of Witnesses 201
Art. I. Who May be Witnesses 205
Art. II. By Whom, How, and How Many Witnesses are to be Introduced, and Who are to be Rejected 212
How Witnesses are Produced 213
The Number of Witnesses 215
Which Witnesses are to be Excluded 216
Art. III. The Oath Taken by Witnesses 218
Art. IV. The Examination of Witnesses 221
The Place of Examination 221
In Whose Presence the Witnesses are to be Examined 223
Nature of the Interrogatories and Answers . . 225
Answers to be Put in Writing and Read 228
Repeated Examinations 230
Art. V. Publication of Testimonies and their Rejection 230
When the Testimony May be Published 231
Exception to Depositions 232
Repeated Calling of Witnesses 233

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONTENTS

PAGE

Art. VI. Compensation of Witnesses 234
Weight of Testimonies 235
CHAPTER III. EXPERTS 241
When, by Whom, and for What Purpose Experts are Chosen 241
Who May be Chosen 242
Duties of Experts towards Judge and Parties . . 243
Critical Investigation of Papers 245
Reports of the Experts and Non-Experts . . . 246
Expenses of Experts 249
CHAPTER IV. ACCESSUS AND RECOGNITIO 250
Local Inspection 250
CHAPTER V. DOCUMENTARY PROOF 253
Art. I. Nature of Documents 253
Authority of Documents 259
Art. II. Exhibition of Documents and Claim Thereto 262
Original and Authenticated Documents . . . 262
Actio ad Exhibendum 264
CHAPTER VI. DE PRAESUMPTIONIBUS, OR CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE 268
CHAPTER VII. THE OATH OF THE PARTIES 274
The Supplementary Oath 274
Iuramentum Aestimatorium 278
Iuramentum Decisorium 279
TITLE XI. INCIDENTAL QUESTIONS 282
Definition, Proposal, and Acceptance 282
Form of Settling Incidental Questions 284
CHAPTER I. CONTUMACY OR CONTEMPT OF COURT . . 288
Contumacy of the Defendant 288
Desisting from Contumacy 291
Contumacy of the Plaintiff 292
Effect of Contumacy 293
CHAPTER II. INTERVENTION OF A THIRD PERSON . . 295
CHAPTER III. ATTEMPTS PENDING THE TRIAL . . . 297
TITLE XII. PUBLICATION OF THE PROCESS, CLOSING OF THE EVIDENCE, PLEADING OF THE CASE 301
The Publication of the Process 301
Closing of the Evidence 302
Defense or Discussion of the Case 303

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

PAGE

TITLE XIII. THE SENTENCE 308
Definition and Intrinsic Conditions of the Sentence 308
How a Board of Judges or One Judge Pronounces Sentence 311
Contents of the Sentence 313
Extrinsic Formalities 314
Publication of the Sentence 316
TITLE XIV. LEGAL REDRESS AGAINST THE SENTENCE . 317
CHAPTER I. APPEALS 318
When an Appeal is Forbidden 318
The Judge "a Quo" 321
The Judge "ad Quem" 322
Lapse of the Term 324
Effect of Appeals 324
Second Instance of Court of Appeal 326
CHAPTER II. COMPLAINT OF NULLITY OF SENTENCE . 328
CHAPTER III. INTERFERENCE OF A THIRD PERSON . . 332
TITLE XV. RES IUDICATA AND RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM 334
Res Iudicata 334
Restitutio in Integrum 336
TITLE XVI. TRIAL EXPENSES AND GRATUITOUS DEFENCE 339
CHAPTER I. REGULAR EXPENSES 340
CHAPTER II. GRATUITOUS DEFENCE 344
TITLE XVII. EXECUTION OF THE SENTENCE 346
The Time of Execution 346
The Executor 347
Mode of Execution 349
SECTION II. SPECIAL RULES FOR CERTAIN TRIALS . . . 351
TITLE XVIII. WAYS OF AVOIDING TRIALS 351
CHAPTER I. COMPROMISE 352
CHAPTER II. COMPROMISE BY ARBITRATION 354
TITLE XIX. CRIMINAL TRIALS 355
CHAPTER I. CRIMINAL ACTION AND DENUNCIATION . 359
CHAPTER II. INQUEST 366
Mode of Conducting the Inquest 371
What is to be Done after the Inquest is Completed 372
CHAPTER III. CORRECTION OF THE DELINQUENT . . . 374
CHAPTER IV. CRIMINAL PROCEDURE AND HEARING OF THE DELINQUENT 380

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONTENTS

PAGE

PART II. THE PROCESSES OF BEATIFICATION AND CANONIZATION 385
INTRODUCTION 385
CHAPTER I. THE DUTIES OF THE LOCAL ORDINARY . 390
Art. I. Inquiry into the Writings of the Servant of God 392
Art. II. The Information Process 393
Art. III. Inquiry into the Non-Cultus 394
Art. IV. Transmission of the Acts to Rome . . . 395
CHAPTER II. INTRODUCTION OF THE CASE AT ROME . . 396
CHAPTER III. APOSTOLIC TRIALS 397
Art. I. Institution of the Trial 397
Art. II. Judgment of the Validity of the Trial . . 398
Art. III. Judgment on the Heroic Virtues . . . 398
Art. IV. Judgment on the Miracles 399
TITLE XXV. EXTRAORDINARY TRIAL PER VIAM NON-CULTUS OR CASUS EXCEPTI 400
TITLE XXVI. THE PROCESS OF CANONIZATION . . . 402

PART III. MODE OF PROCEDURE IN CERTAIN CASES AND THE APPLICATION OF PENALTES 403
General Rules 403
TITLE XXVII. PROCEEDINGS FOR THE REMOVAL OF IRREMOVABLE PASTORS 409 Reasons for Removal 411
Invitation to Resign 419
Resignation Accepted 423
Rebuttal of the Pastor 425
Proceeding of the Ordinary 425
After Removal 432
Excursus on Disabled Priests' Funds 434
TITLE XXVIII. PROCEDURE IN REMOVING REMOVABLE PASTORS 441
TITLE XXIX. PROCEDURE IN THE TRANSFER OF PASTORS 444
TITLE XXX. PROCEDURE AGAINST CLERGYMEN TRANSGRESSING THE LAW OF RESIDENCE 449
TITLE XXXI. DE MODO PROCEDENDI CONTRA CLERICOS CONCUBINARIOS 457

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

PAGE

TITLE XXXII. PROCEDURE AGAINST PASTORS NEGLECTING THEIR PASTORAL DUTIES 464

TITLE XXXIII. PROCEDURE IN INFLICTING THE SUSPENSION EX INFORMATA CONSCIENTIA 469

The Power of Ordinaries 470

Procedure in Inflicting this Penalty 475

Occult Crimes 479

Manifestation of Reasons and Recourse . . . 481

APPENDIX I. TO CANON 1990 484

APPENDIX II. "DECRETUM" AND "DECERNERE" . . . 485

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

BOOK IV

ECCLESIASTICAL PROCEDURE

INTRODUCTION

There is no part of Canon Law which is so conspicuously based on, nay governed by, Roman Law as the book which we now undertake to describe and, as far as necessary, to explain. The reason for this phenomenon is not far to seek. For not only did the Roman Law rest on the principles of natural justice and equity, but through the influence of the Christian emperors it became familiar to the Church at large. Not only the soil on which it had grown, but its very terminology, had become the common possession of the Christianized nations, not even excepting the Teutonic race, though the Germanic law had not been influenced as largely as others. An exception, however, was the English law. The little island of Britannica had its peculiar laws, to which the nobility as well as the laity clung conservatively, whilst the bishops and the clergy, many of them foreigners, applied themselves to the study of the civil, i. e., Roman and canon law.[1] But the clerical element was finally eliminated or forced to retreat to its schools and monas-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

teries. Thus it happened that the English law has least of all received the structure and outlines of Roman or ecclesiastical law. In its stead it has introduced a terminology which needs a special study of Anglo-Saxon and old French. This we state in order to make it plain that some terms of Canon Law are not easily rendered into English, but require circumlocution. Therefore time-honored and concise terms shall be retained in their original Latin. The essentials of the trial, being common to all civilized nations, are the same in English law as in others.

The Code divides Book Four, which embodies the second book of the decretals, into three parts:

I. Trials, or Ecclesiastical Procedure.
II. Beatification and Canonization.
III. Procedure in Particular Cases.

1 Blackstone-Cooley, Commentary I, 18 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART I

TRIALS

DEFINITION, DIVISION AND OBJECT

CAN. 1552

§ 1. Nomine iudicii ecclesiastici intelligitur controversiae in re de qua Ecclesia ius habet cognoscendi, coram tribunali ecclesiastico, legitima disceptatio et definitio.

§ 2. Obiectum iudicii sunt:

1.° Personarum physicarum vel moralium iura persequenda aut vindicanda, vel earundem personarum facta iuridica declaranda; et tunc iudicium est contentiosum;

2.° Delicta in ordine ad poenam infligendam vel declarandam; et tunc iudicium est criminale.

CAN. 1553

§ 1. Ecclesia iure proprio et exclusivo cognoscit:

1.° De causis quae respiciunt res spirituales et spiritualibus adnexas;

2.° De violatione legum ecclesiasticarum deque omnibus in quibus inest ratio peccati, quod attinet ad culpae definitionem et poenarum ecclesiasticarum irrogationem;

3.° De omnibus causis sive contentiosis sive criminalibus quae respiciunt personas privilegio fori gaudentes ad normam can. 120, 614, 680.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. In causis in quibus tum Ecclesia tum civilis potestas aeque competentes sunt, quaeque dicuntur mixti fori, est locus praeventioni.

CAN. 1554

Actor, qui causas mixti fori ad iudicem ecclesiasticum deductas ad forum saeculare iudicandas defert, congruis poenis puniri potest ad normam can. 2222 et privatur iure contra eandem personam de eadem re et de connexis causam agendi in foro ecclesiastico.

CAN. 1555

§ 1. Tribunal Congregationis S. Officii suo more institutoque procedit sibique propriam consuetudinem retinet; et etiam inferiora tribunalia, in causis quae ad S. Officii tribunal spectant, normas ab eodem traditas sequantur oportet.

§ 2. Cetera tribunalia servare debent praescripta canonum qui sequuntur.

§ 3. In iudicio pro dimissione religiosorum serventur praescripta can. 654–667.

The Roman Law constantly employs, not processus, but iudicia (judgments), which were divided into public and private. Our Code, too, speaks here of iudicium ecclesiasticum, which it defines as the lawful discussion and settlement before the ecclesiastical court of a disputed matter of which the Church is entitled to take cognizance.

Can. 1553 determines which matters belong by inherent and exclusive right to the ecclesiastical court. They are:

1.° All merely spiritual matters and such strictly con-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nected with spiritual things. This is a very moderate vindication of a right which cannot be denied to any autonomous society. That the spiritual element is superior to the material or temporal, the divine to the human, the spirit to the flesh, should be evident. Yet it was necessary to repeat that truth against the encroachments of emperors and rulers who would pose as popes.[1] A conflict was inevitable. Undeniably there were exaggerations on both sides, especially at the time of Boniface VIII, when some writers vindicated to the Pope everything except creation.[2] Such unwarranted assertions could not fail to provoke resistance, from which it was but a short step to encroachments. But the rights of the Church needed no concessions, which indeed had voluntarily been made by loyal rulers who perceived the mighty influence of the Church over a semi-barbarous populace. The orderly procedure of the ecclesiastical courts gradually permeated the civil courts, to the gain of a more equitable and just handling of trials.[3] This of course can only be understood in the light of unbiased history. The ecclesiastical legislator vindicates to his court:

(a) All spiritual matters. Such are everything belonging to faith and morals, the Sacraments and sacramentals, divine worship and the sacred liturgy, dispensations from vows and oaths, ecclesiastical offices, rights and obligations of the clergy, beneficiaries and religious, the extent of, and exemption from, ecclesiastical jurisdiction, etc.[4]

(b) Matters which might per se be called temporal, but are intimately connected with the spiritual, such as

1 Cc. 3, 6, Dist. 10.

2 See Scholz, Publizistik zur Zeit Philipps des Schönen und Bonifaz VIII. (Stutz, Kirchenrechtl. Abhandlg., 6–8, 1903); Alex. Carerius, De Potestate Summi Pontificis, 1601, still asserts what is said in the text.

3 Cfr. Hergenröther, Kath. Kirche u. Christl. Staat, 1872, p. 26 f.

4 Cfr. c. 34, Venerabilem, X, I, 6; cc. 2, 3, X, II, 1; 15, X, V, 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

advowson, church revenues, ecclesiastical burial, legitimacy of children, real immunity, etc.[5]

2.° The ecclesiastical court may also claim cases of violation of ecclesiastical laws and all matters in which the question of sin is involved, in so far as the determination of guilt and the infliction of ecclesiastical punishments comes into play. It is evident that here especially the leges plus quam perfectae and perfectae are intended, i.e., such as have an invalidating clause or a penal sanction attached. As to penalties inflicted upon transgressors they are more especially the censures and vindictive penalties which may be meted out not only to the clergy but also to the faithful. This is sometimes expressly mentioned in concordats, where also the punishment of public sinners and transgressors of the holy-days of obligation are specially noted.[6]

The second clause, viz., to take cognizance of matters which underlie the ratio peccati, is an allusion to a famous decretal of Innocent III, "Novit," in which this great Pontiff assures the King of France and John Lackland of England that he has "no intention to judge feuds, but to decide concerning sin, which undoubtedly belongs to him."[7] Hence our text only mentions guilt and ecclesiastical punishment. This power is called potestas directiva, and consists in wielding the spiritual sword or the functions of an authoritative teacher vested with ecclesiastical or spiritual weapons.[8] This power necessarily follows from the legislative power, inasmuch as the latter would be ineffective without the executive power

[5] Cfr. c. 3, X, II 1; c. 3 X, III, 30; c. 3, X, II, 10; c. 9, X, IV, 17; X, III, 28, de sepulturis; c. 4, 6°, III, 23; Wernz, Ius Decret., Vol. V, 1914, 3. 223, n. 268.

[6] Cfr., for inst., can. 1428, 1512, 1527, and all the diriment impediments.

[7] Nussi, Conventiones, 1870, pp. 92, 105, 151, 185, 312.

[8] C. 13, X, II, 1; see Hergenröther, l. c., p. 403 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google proper. Even a religious society cannot do without the rod.

3.° A third category of matters strictly belonging to the ecclesiastical court comprises a certain class of persons (ratione personae). Hence the civil as well as the criminal cases of the clergy and all those who share the clerical privileges of the forum are subject to the ecclesiastical court. These, i.e., the clergy proper as mentioned under can. 120, the religious as per can. 614, and the members of pious communities, though not religious in the canonical sense of the word, as per can. 680. All these, says the text, are subject to the ecclesiastical judge in civil as well as criminal matters.

Can. 1552, § 2 distinguishes two classes of procedure, ratione objecti, i.e., by reason of the purpose. For if an individual or a corporation goes to law, they are supposed to have sustained an injury or a wrong, for which they think it worth while to demand satisfaction. This

Concerning the threefold power distinguished by authors we may here add the following: The postestas directa would represent the Pope as endowed with unlimited power in spiritual as well as temporal matters, although the temporal power he wields through the worldly rulers, or rather these wield it by his command. The postestas indirecta is differently explained, but in general features there is agreement: the Pope rules directly over spiritual matters, whilst over temporal things he has power only as far as the object of the Church requires it. Hence the Pope may not depose secular princes, but he may change the occupants or transfer kingdoms, he may not issue or nullify secular laws, but he may absolve the faithful from the obligation of observing them if they are contrary to salvation; he may not judge in temporal matters, as a rule, but only assume the office of judge in case of two rivals or in case there is no one to judge. (See Bellarmine, De Rom. Pont., l. V, c. 6). The potestas directiva, too, is not always explained in the same manner. But what is said in the text comprises all explanations. The Church is the supreme spiritual and infallible director of every conscience, giving admonitions, explanations and counsels to high and low. But this is not all,—the Church, being an autonomous society, also enjoys the right of exercising the judiciary and executive power over her members. (See Hergenröther, Kath. Kirche und Christl. Staat, 1872, pp. 411 ff. J. Milita, De Eccl. Potest. Indirecta, Rome 1891.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

wrong may affect the person or corporation only, i.e., a private interest for which they seek redress. Take, for instance, can. 1534, where personal and real actions are permitted in case of unlawful alienation. It may be that the property unlawfully alienated is claimed, or it may be that the alienators can prove that they have observed the prescribed formalities and wish to have their acts justified and declared legal. But the interest around which the prosecution circles is private, touching the persons only. Such a proceeding is called contentious or civil, in order to distinguish it from the following. For it may be that the person bringing a suit has at heart not private interests, but the public order or the welfare of the community. This happens when a crime, a delictum publicum, is committed, which may also affect a person, inasfar as he or she has suffered an injury by the perpetration of the crime. Yet the accusation is made against the perpetrator not for personal revenge, but for the sake of the vindication or restoration of the public order that was disturbed by the crime. This is called criminal proceeding. It now-a-days concerns almost exclusively the clergy, i.e., persons who enjoy the privilegium fori, as explained under can. 120.

§ 2 of can. 1553 and can. 1554 mention matters subject to a mixed court, i.e., matters in which the ecclesiastical as well as the secular judge are competent to render a verdict. Such matters, as far as the civil procedure is concerned, are: (a) contracts made under oath, as far as the carrying out of the contract, not the oath, is involved; (b) cases of widows, orphans, and other destitute persons allowed to choose the forum; (c) cases of legacies made by laymen partly in favor of pious institutions or foundations; (d) cases of dowry, tithes, advowson, provided

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the fact of temporal possession or the right of possession is involved.[9]

As to criminal procedure, the cases subject to a mixed court are mentioned under can. 1933, § 3.

In such cases, then, subject to a mixed court, the ecclesiastical judge, provided he is otherwise competent, may preoccupy the jurisdiction of the secular judge, and vice versa. If a plaintiff should, therefore, venture to bring suit before a secular court in a matter which has already been brought before an ecclesiastical court, he may be punished by the lawful ecclesiastical superior, if scandal was given or the importance of the case requires a punishment; and that punishment may be meted out without previous warning or threat.[10] Besides, such a plaintiff loses the right of bringing suit against the same person in the same matter or one connected with the matter at issue. Formerly excommunication was decreed for such who declined to accept the forum ecclesiasticum in mixed matters, and other punishments were inflicted on ecclesiastical persons of higher and lower dignity who attempted a change of forum.[11]

Can. 1555 sets forth, in general terms, the method of procedure: (a) for the Holy Office, which must proceed according to the norms prescribed and in the manner customary with that sacred tribunal; the same rules must be observed by the inferior tribunals of the Roman Court, if they are called upon to judge in matters pertaining to the Holy Office. This is especially the case in matters

9 A damage or libel suit, especially among or against clerics, belongs to the criminal court according to can. 1935 and can. 1938. Yet what is stated in the text is perfectly true, for even injuries and libel suits, when directed against the clergy, affect the State as such.

10 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, til. 2, n. 151 ff. Can. 2222.

11 Martin V, "Ad reprimendas insolentias," Feb. 1, 1428 (Bull. Rom., ed. Luxemburg, I, 306 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of faith and morals, the validity of holy orders, and the matrimonial cases arising from the Pauline privilege, disparity of worship and mixed religion, if the case is tried in a judiciary way.[12]

(b) For all other tribunals the following canons form the rule of procedure. This is particularly the case with the S. Roman Rota and the Signatura Apostolica, which are mentioned later (can. 1597–1605). In trials for the dismissal of religious, canons 654–668 must be observed.[13]

12 Cfr. Normae Peculiares, P. II, c. VII, Art. 1, n. 6 (A. Ap., S., I, 78 ff.).

13 See this Commentary, Vol. III, p. 396 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION I

TRIALS IN GENERAL

TITLE I

THE FORUM COMPETENS

Every trial consists of two elementary parts, the persons concerned and the process or trial itself.

The persons chiefly concerned are the judge, who in the first title is comprised under the term competent court, the plaintiff, and the defendant.

Besides these, there are persons who assist these main actors in the trial. Then there is the process itself.

The Code premises a canon which is no doubt intended to preclude a false idea concerning the Supreme Head of the Church, as if he were subject to human judges.

EXEMPTION OF THE POPE

CAN. 1556

Prima Sedes a nemine iudicatur.

The first or primatial see is subject to no one's judgment. This proposition must be taken in the fullest extent, not only with regard to the object of infallibility. For in matters of faith and morals it was always customary to receive the final sentence from the Apostolic See, whose judgment no one dared to dispute, as the tradition of the Fathers demonstrates.[1] Neither was it ever allowed to reconsider questions or controversies once settled by the Holy See.[2] But even the person of the Supreme Pontiff was ever considered as unamenable to human judgment, he being responsible and answerable to God alone, even though accused of personal misdeeds and crimes. A remarkable instance is that of Pope Symmachus (498–514). He, indeed, submitted to the convocation of a council (the Synodus Palmaris, 502), because he deemed it his duty to see to it that no stain was inflicted upon his character, but that synod itself is a splendid vindication of our canon. The synod adopted the Apology of Ennodius of Pavia, in which occurs the noteworthy sentence: "God wished the causes of other men to be decided by men; but He has reserved to His own tribunal, without question, the ruler of this see."[3] No further argument for the traditional view is required. A general council could not judge the Pope, because, unless convoked or ratified by him, it could not render a valid sentence. Hence nothing is left but an appeal to God, who will take care of His Church and its head.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RESERVED COMPETENCY

CAN. 1557

§ 1. Ipsius Romani Pontificis dumtaxat ius est iudicandi:

1.° Eos qui supremum tenent populorum principatum horumque filios ac filias eosve quibus ius est proxime succedendi in principatum;

1 Zozimus, "Quamvis Patrum traditio," March 21, 418 (Migne, P. L., 20, 676).

2 Boniface I, "Retro maioribus tuis," March 11, 422 (ibid., col. 776).

3 See c. 14, C. 11, q. 3; c. 10, Dist. 96; cc. 10, 13, C. 9, q. 3; Reuben Parsons, Studies in Church History, ed. 2, 1901, Vol. I, p. 351 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Patres Cardinales;

3.° Legatos Sedis Apostolicae, et in criminalibus Episcopos, etiam titulares.

§ 2. Tribunalibus vero Sedis Apostolicae reservatur iudicare:

1.° Episcopos residentiales in contentiosis, salvo praescripto can. 1572, § 2;

2.° Dioeceses aliasve personas morales ecclesiasticas quae Superiorem infra Romanum Pontificem non habent, uti religiones exemptas, Congregationes monasticas, etc.

§ 3. Alias causas quas Romanus Pontifex ad suum advocaverit iudicium, videt iudex quem ipsemet Romanus Pontifex designaverit.

CAN. 1558

In causis de quibus in can. 1556, 1557, aliorum iudicum incompetentia est absoluta.

It has been an ancient custom for the Roman Pontiff to reserve certain cases (causae maiores) to his own exclusive tribunal. These are:

(a) The cases of actual rulers of nations, their sons and daughters, and proximate successors, provided, of course, their cases are brought before the Supreme Pontiff, as often happened when rulers still called themselves Christian;

(b) The cases, civil as well as criminal, of cardinals[4] and legates of the Apostolic See;

(c) The criminal cases of bishops, titular as well as residential.

To the tribunals of the Apostolic See are reserved:

4 A famous instance is the Caraffa trial under Pius IV; see R. Ancel, O.S.B., "Paul IV, et le Concile," Extract from la Revue d'Histoire Ecclés., 1907.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(a) The civil cases of residential bishops, with the exception mentioned in can. 1572, § 2;

(b) All cases of dioceses and other exempt corporations immediately subject to the Roman Pontiff, such as exempt religious organizations and monastic congregations. If the Roman Pontiff calls other cases before his tribunal, that judge is competent whom he designates. This happened in the case of the English Ladies founded by Mary Ward.[5]

The cases mentioned (in can. 1156 and 1157) are so reserved that every other than the judge or tribunal mentioned is absolutely excluded, no preliminary hearing or taking cognizance of the case is permitted, and any attempted sentence would be ipso iure invalid. This is called absolute incompetency, because competency means nothing else but the jurisdiction proper to a judge, not only concerning the matter at issue (ratione causae), but also with regard to the person (ratione personae),[6] and where both are wanting, as under can. 1556 and 1557, the incompetency is complete in every respect.

ORDINARY AND EXTRAORDINARY FORUM

CAN. 1559

§ 1. Nemo in prima instantia conveniri potest, nisi coram iudice ecclesiastico qui competens sit ob unum ex titulis qui in can. 1560–1568 determinantur.

§ 2. Incompetentia iudicis cui nullus ex his titulis suffragatur, dicitur relativa.

§ 3. Actor sequitur forum rei; quod si reus multiplex forum habeat, optio fori actori conceditur.

5 See Bened. XIV, "Quamvis iusto," April 30, 1749.

6 Wernz, l. c., Vol. V, P. I, n. 275, p. 227.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1560

Forum necessarium habent:

1.° Actiones de spolio, coram Ordinario loci rei sitae;

2.° Causae respicientes beneficium, quamvis non residentiale, coram Ordinario loci beneficii;

3.° Causae quae versantur circa administrationem, coram Ordinario loci ubi administratio gesta est;

4.° Causae quae respiciunt hereditates aut legata pia, coram Ordinario loci domicilii testatoris, nisi agatur de mera exsecutione legati, quae videnda est secundum ordinarias competentiae normas.

Can. 1561

§ 1. Ratione domicilii vel quasi-domicilii quilibet conveniri potest coram Ordinario loci.

§ 2. Ordinarius autem domicilii vel quasi-domicilii iurisdictionem in subditum, quamvis absentem, habet.

Can. 1562

§ 1. Qui peregrinus est in Urbe, licet per breve tempus, potest in ipsa tanquam in proprio domicilio citari; sed ius habet revocandi domum, idest petendi ut ad proprium Ordinarium remittatur.

§ 2. Qui in Urbe ab anno commoratur, ius habet declinandi forum Ordinarii et instandi ut coram Urbis tribunalibus citetur.

Can. 1563

Vagus proprium forum habet in loco ubi actu commoratur; religiosus in loco domus suae.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1564

Ratione rei sitae pars conveniri potest coram Ordinario loci, ubi res litigiosa sita est, quoties actio in rem directa sit.

CAN. 1565

§ 1. Ratione contractus pars conveniri potest coram Ordinario loci in quo contractus initus est vel adimpleri debet.

§ 2. In actu autem contractus permittitur contrahentibus, obligationis declarandae, urgendae vel implendae gratia, locum eligere, in quo etiam absentes citari et conveniri possint.

CAN. 1566

§ 1. Ratione delicti reus forum sortitur in loco patrati delicti.

§ 2. Licet post delictum reus e loco discesserit, iudex loci ius habet illum citandi ad comparendum, et sententiam in eum ferendi.

CAN. 1567

Ratione connexionis seu continentiae ab uno eodemque iudice cognoscendae sunt causae inter se connexae, nisi legis praescriptum obstet.

CAN. 1568

Ratione praeventionis, cum duo vel plures iudices aeque competentes sunt, ei ius est causam cognoscendi qui prius citatione reum legitime convenit.

Forum is a Latin word and formerly signified a place for giving judgment. The forum or comitium of the old Romans meant jurisdiction, or the power of passing judgment. Competent means proper jurisdiction over the person and case in question.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The person who determines the forum competens is the defendant, according to the well known adage: "Actor sequitur reum," i.e., the plaintiff follows the defendant's court. However, this is to be understood as a rule which has its exceptions. For the Code itself makes exceptions in can. 1560, 1567, and 1568. Whilst, therefore, the principle "actor sequitur reum" constitutes the ordinary or voluntary forum, because it depends on the defendant's will, the other three mentioned in the three canons may be called extraordinary modes of following the forum, although even this distinction [7] is not quite adequate, since the law itself establishes these exceptions. The Code has a proper name only for one forum, which it calls necessarium, and hence the other six might be called voluntary fora.

Canon 1559 states that no one can be sued in the first instance (instantia prima) except before the ecclesiastical judge who is competent in virtue of one of the seven reasons stated in can. 1560–1568. If none of these seven titles justifies the judge in hearing the case, his incompetency is relative, because it may be that he would be competent by reason of the person being subject to his jurisdiction. Then the general rule is reaffirmed: Actor sequitur forum rei. But an exception is admitted in case the defendant is sued on various counts, which permit a choice of judges. This choice is left, not to the defendant, but to the plaintiff. Thus, if domicile and contract are in question, the plaintiff may choose either Ordinary.

[7] Wernz, l. c., n. 259, according to customary teaching, distinguishes: forum legale — conventionale; commune — singulare; universale — particulare; ordinarium — extraordinarium.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1560 constitutes a forum necessarium in the following cases:

1.° All actions concerning forcible deprivation or disseissin, of which more under can. 1698, where the term spolium recurs;

2.° All cases touching benefices, even though non-residential, which must be decided before the Ordinary in whose diocese the benefice is located;

3.° All cases of administration, which must be tried before the Ordinary in whose diocese the administration was conducted;

4.° All cases in which pious bequests or legacies are involved, must be tried before the Ordinary in whose diocese the testator had his domicile, unless the question should turn about the mere execution of a legacy, when it may be settled according to one of the following reasons of competency.

By reason of domicile or quasi-domicile,[8] under can. 1561, anyone may be sued before the local Ordinary, who in this case also has jurisdiction over an absent subject. This court is the chief, ordinary, and natural forum for trying the defendant, even though he be absent from the diocese. If the plaintiff be absent, the summons suffices to render him in contempt in case he does not appear.[9]

This forum concurs with any other mentioned,[10] except, of course, the one spoken of in can. 1560.

A peculiar right is vindicated to the City of Rome as the "mother and teacher of all churches." As under the Decretals,[11] so now by our Code (can. 1562) a peregrinus, i.e., any clergyman or layman who is in Rome, even though only for a short time, may be summoned there 8 Cfr. can. 91 ff., and our Comment., Vol. II, p. 14 ff.

9 Cfr. cc. 11, 17, 19, X, II, 2; c. 3, X, II, 14.

10 Santi-Leitner, II, tit. 2, n. 10; Smith, Elements of Ecclesiastical Law, Vol. II, p. 63.

11 C. 20, X, II, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as if he were in his own domicile; and since a summons constitutes the beginning of a trial (can. 1725), it follows that the whole process may be finished there. However, the right of having the case pleaded at home remains, wherefore such a one may ask for leave to appear before his own Ordinary.

The ius revocandi domum, as the commentators say,[12] is not the same as that of declining the forum. The latter supposes that the judge is not competent, whilst in the case of revocatio domum the competency is admitted. Formerly the favor of revocatio was granted if the pilgrim came to Rome for a just and necessary reason, as stated in the Decretals. Our text has no such conditional clause, wherefore the old law must be looked upon as corrected in this case. We may, however, admit what the same writers say concerning two other conditions for making use of the revocatio. They deny the right if delay would be dangerous and if the peregrinus has committed a crime in the City of Rome. Our text adds a new regulation in § 2, can. 1562: One who has lived in Rome for one year, has the right (not the duty) to decline the forum of his own Ordinary and to demand that his case be tried before the tribunals of the City.

However, if we mistake not, the whole of canon 1562 must be understood in conformity with can. 1560, and hence the privilegium urbis cannot be applied. This seems to be deducible from the fact that the favor is subsumed under "domicile"; since this is not applicable in the cases mentioned in can. 1560, can. 1562 may not be alleged against can. 1560.

Those who have neither domicile nor quasi-domicile, i.e., vagi, are tried in the place where they happen to [12] Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 2, nn. 108 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google reside, "there and then," even if they had made up their mind to settle in another place.[13]

Religious are subject to the forum of the place in which their house is located (can. 1563). Religious who have made perpetual vows, lose their domicile;[14] but not those who have taken only temporary vows. However, in our case the quasi-domicile must be considered sufficient to establish the competent forum for all religious. If one would be dismissed or dispensed, and leave the religious house, he would regain his former domicile or quasi-domicile, and therefore the ecclesiastical court of the diocese in which he originally had a domicile or quasi-domicile, and not the court of the diocese in which the religious house is located, would be the forum competens for him.[15]

By reason of res sita (can. 1564) or location of the litigious object, one may be sued in any place where a real (not a personal) action is brought against him, on account of the object being permanently located in that place. The disputed object may be movable or immovable, in possession of the litigants or not, but whether it must be permanently situated there, not merely in transitu, is a disputed question.[16] Thus, for instance, if two bishops should get into a dispute over a bequest, that bishop's court would be competent in whose diocese the property was located.[17] But the text permits only a real action, i.e., one against the thing itself, not against the person. Hence the judge who is competent by reason of the location of the disputed object may not proceed against the defendant by censures, or by declaring him contumacious; nor can he,

13 Reiffenstuel, II, 2, n. 45.

14 Can. 585.

15 Cfr. can. 641; S. C. EE. et RR., May 2, 1864 (A. S. S., I, 365 f.).

16 Reiffenstuel, II, 2, n. 99 f. favors the opinion that in transitu is sufficient, nor is our text against that opinion.

17 C. 3, X, II, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

properly speaking, summon the defendant if the latter does not belong to his territory. But he may, in case of contempt, put the plaintiff in possession of the disputed object.[18]

By reason of a contract (can. 1565) one may be tried by the local Ordinary in whose diocese the contract was made, or must be fulfilled. A contract, as generally understood, is any agreement which involves the fulfillment of an obligation, including guardianship or tutorship.[19]

Since contracts are generally determined as to obligations and circumstances, the Code permits the contracting parties to state in the contract itself the place where the obligation is to be fulfilled or urged. This also determines the forum to which the absentee must be summoned and before which he must be sued.[20] If no stipulation was made as to the place where the contract is to be carried out, the place where it was made determines the forum. And consequently in such a case the laws of the respective diocese or province must be followed (can. 1529).

By reason of crime (can. 1566) one may be tried in the place where he committed the justiciable act, no matter whether it was grievous or not. The law only says: "delictum," i.e., an external crime committed against the public order. The whole crime must have been perpetrated in the diocese whose Ordinary is thus rendered competent, but it is not necessary that the effects should have followed in the same diocese. If a cleric were shot in diocese A, and died in diocese B, the Ordinary of diocese A would be competent.[21]

All clerics of whatever condition or rank (laymen are now tried before the secular judge), except those men-

18 Wernz, l. c., n. 289, p. 242, note 138.
19 Santi-Leitner, II, 2, n. 13.
20 C. 17, X; II, 2.
21 Wernz, l. c., n. 290, p. 244.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tioned in can. 1556, are here comprised. Therefore also exempt religious (see can. 616).

But what if the perpetrator is at large, i.e., absent from the territory where the crime was committed? § 2 of our canon, for which no previous authority of law could be alleged, rules that even in this case the local judge is entitled to summon the criminal and to pronounce sentence on him.

By reason of connection (can. 1567) or contents one and the same judge may take cognizance of cases which have some connection with one other, unless the law expressly prohibits this. This may happen:

(a) When one suit depends upon the settlement of another, as the principal may depend on an incidental question. Thus, a matrimonial case which involved an inheritance, if the validity of the marriage were concerned, could not be decided by a lay judge, and therefore the lay judge would be unable to take cognizance of the whole case, even though he were competent to judge of the right to the inheritance. The law (can. 1553, § 1, n. 1) prohibits him to be judge in spiritual matters and matters connected therewith.[22] But if the question would only be whether the person was born in or out of lawful wedlock, the lay judge would be competent in the whole affair.[23]

(b) A connexio causarum also exists when a general action is brought, i.e., one which implies several suits or causes by reason of one's main office or quality, for instance, a tutor, guardian, or general manager may have several suits on hand on account of his official capacity, and hence may be called to court by various Ordinaries and may plead before one and the same judge cases otherwise belonging to several courts.[24]

22 Cc. 5, 7, 9, X, IV, 17; c. 3, X, II, 10.

23 Santi-Leitner, II, 2, n. 21.

24 Ibid., n. 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

By reason of prevention (can. 1568) one of several otherwise equally competent judges may be entitled to take cognizance of a case, because he was the first to issue a lawful summons to the defendant. Can. 1553, § 2, dealt with the case of a mixed forum, when the ecclesiastical judge preoccupies the case by a legitimate summons. But it may also happen that a criminal who has changed his domicile is summoned by the judge of the former domicile or diocese; the judge who first issues the summons is the competent one.[25] Finally, prevention may take place when several judges are competent jointly and severally (in solidum), for in this case regula juris 54 holds: "He has the better title who was prior in time."[26] However the summons must have been served legitimately, i.e., according to the rules laid down in our Code;[27] otherwise exception might be taken to the judge's competency.

25 C. 19, X, II, 2.
26 C. 8, 6°, I, 14; Reiffenstuel, II, 2, nn. 43, 166 ff.
27 See can. 1711–1725.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE II

DIFFERENT STAGES AND SPECIES OF TRIBUNALS

ROMAN TRIBUNALS

CAN. 1569

§ 1. Ob primatum Romani Pontificis integrum est cuilibet fideli in toto orbe catholico causam suam sive contentiosam sive criminalem in quovis iudicii gradu et in quovis litis statu, cognoscendam ad Sanctam Sedem deferre vel apud eandem introducere.

§ 2. Recursus tamen ad Sedem Apostolicam interpositus non suspendit, excluso casu appellationis, exercitium iurisdictionis in iudice qui causam iam cognoscere coepit; quique idcirco poterit iudicium prosequi usque ad definitivam sententiam, nisi constiterit Sedem Apostolicam causam ad se advocasse.

Can. 1561 mentioned a prerogative of Rome. Another is set forth in the following canon, which embodies a principle that has been acknowledged since immemorial time, viz., the right of appeal to the Apostolic See from any inferior tribunal and at any stage of a trial. The Council of Sardica (343) clearly stated this right,[1] and there is no need to recur to the Pseudo-Decretals.[2] The right of appealing to Rome was practised in every cen-

1 Cfr. c. 36, C. 2, q. 6; Hefele, Konzilien-Geschichte, I, 341, 541 ff.; Reuben Parsons, Studies in Church History, 1901, I, p. 209 ff.

2 See cc. 4–8, C. 2, q. 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tury and in various and distant provinces, and the Febrorian synod or meeting of Ems was probably the first to demand that Rome should reject and abolish appeals.[3] The right of accepting and deciding appeals rests on the primacy of the Roman Pontiff,[4] and is coextensive with his legislative and judiciary power. Hence our Code vindicates this right to the Holy See, to which any civil or criminal case may be appealed in any stage or instance and from any phase a trial may have taken in any part of the Catholic universe.[5]

§ 2 of this canon says that recourse to the Apostolic See does not suspend the exercise of the jurisdiction of the ordinary or delegated judge, who has commenced a trial by issuing the lawful summons. Suspension of jurisdiction is attached only to an appeal properly so-called. Hence in case of mere recourse, the judge-in-ordinary may proceed with the trial and pronounce final sentence, unless he has been duly informed that the Apostolic See has called the case before its own court. The difference between appeal and recourse is explained in can. 1889. For an apparent exception as to parishes and benefices see can. 2146.

CAN. 1570

ORDINARY TRIBUNALS

§ 1. Exceptis causis Sedi Apostolicae reservatis aut ad eandem advocatis, ceterae omnes cognoscuntur a diversis tribunalibus, de quibus in can. 1572 seqq.

§ 2. Quodlibet tamen tribunal, quod attinet ad

3 Pius VI, "Super soliditate," Nov. 28, 1786, § 4.

4 Conc. Vatic., Sess. IV, c. 3, De vi et ratione primatus.

5 Gradus means stage or instance, as we say, "first or second instance"; status implies the condition or status in which the trial happens to be, for instance, after the summons, before the closing of the acts, after the interlocutory or definitive sentence, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

partium et testium examen aut citationem, documentorum, vel rei controversae inspectionem, decretorum intimationem aliaque huiusmodi, ius habet in auxilium vocandi aliud tribunal, quod normas pro singulis actibus iure praescriptas servare debet.

CAN. 1571

Qui causam vidit in uno iudicii gradu, nequit eandem causam in alio iudicare.

With the exception of the cases reserved to, or called before the Apostolic See, i.e., the causae maiores, which are such either by reason of the matter involved or of the persons concerned, all other cases are tried by the several tribunals mentioned below (can. 1572 sqq).

Causae maiores are also excluded from the S. Roman Rota and the Signatura Apostolica.[6]

Now these regular or ordinary tribunals may find it difficult to examine or summon the parties and witnesses, to obtain and examine the necessary papers, to notify the decrees, and so forth, because the parties and witnesses may live in distant and separate dioceses, or even in countries with which communication is difficult. This happens especially in matrimonial trials.[7] What is to be done in such cases? The Code rules that in such cases the tribunal which is in a condition to furnish the necessary information or to procure the legal procedure, must assist the tribunal which tries the case. Of course, the court thus called upon to assist is held to obey the legal norms prescribed in the Code.

This applies also to the S. Romana Rota. If the party

6 Pius X, "Sapienti consilio," June 29, 1908 (A. Ap. S., I, 15); Lex Propria S. R. R., can. 15 (ibid., p. 24).

7 S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 19; S. C. P. F., 1883, n. XIX (Coll., nn. 1534, 1586).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is not present in Rome and has no procurator there, the diocesan court may be told to assist the S. Tribunal, which issues either a letter — which is a mild form of command — or a decree to the Ordinary in question to supply the processual acts.[8] Sometimes a iudex instructor is selected from outside the Curia (sc. Romana), who has to gather the proofs from witnesses, experts, and documents. This is done by a letter called litterae rogatoriae seu remissoriae. Such letters are also sent to diocesan courts when the litigants reside outside of Rome and cannot be easily summoned.[9] It is evident that the diocesan courts are obliged to give information and to proceed according to judicial rules, for otherwise the parties might escape by making exceptions which would draw out the trial indefinitely.

The iudex instructor, as assistant of another court than the trial court proper, must not be confounded with the court of appeal, or court of second instance, because no sentence is given by the assisting court. Only if a case has been decided by a court in one stage or instance, the same case can not be decided again by the same court in another stage (can. 1571), because an appeal requires two different courts, one lower and the other higher.[10]

8 Cfr. Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, c. 14 (A Ap. S., II, 788).

9 Ibid., can. 106, can. 143 (l. c., p. 818, 827).

10 Cfr. c. 35, X, II, 28. Iudex instructor is not easily translated into English, although it has been rendered "judge of inquiry," according to the Italian "giudice istruttore." However, the very term judge seems to convey too much, as if a sentence were implied; but as the Latin also uses the term iudex it may be accepted, although auditor would perhaps be better; cfr. Messmer, l. c., p. 53.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE ORDINARY TRIBUNAL OF THE FIRST INSTANCE

ART. I

THE JUDGE

CAN. 1572

THE LOCAL ORDINARY

§ 1. In unaquaque dioecesi et pro omnibus causis a iure expresse non exceptis, iudex primae instantiae est loci Ordinarius, qui iudiciariam potestatem exercere potest ipse per se, vel per alios, secundum tamen canones qui sequuntur.

§ 2. Si vero agatur de iuribus aut bonis temporalibus Episcopi aut mensae vel Curiae dioecesanae, controversia dirimenda deferatur vel, Episcopo consentiente, ad dioecesanum tribunal collegiale quod constat officiali et duobus iudicibus synodalibus antiquioribus, vel ad iudicem immediate superiorem.

Aside from the cases excepted by law, i.e., those expressly mentioned in can. 1556 and 1557 and those assumed or accepted by the Apostolic See (can. 1570, § 1), all cases must be tried by the local Ordinary, who may exercise his power personally or by proxy, but must invariably proceed according to the rules laid down in the following canons. This is the law, new as well as old,[1]

1 C. 1, X, I, 31; Trid., Sess. 24, c. 20, de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for every diocese. Exempt religious, of course, are bound to this tribunal only in cases expressed by law (can. 616); otherwise their competent judge is the respective superior (can. 1579).

If a case concerns the rights or temporal property of the bishop, of the episcopal mensa (revenues), or of the diocesan court, it may, with the consent of the bishop, be tried in a body by the diocesan tribunal, consisting of the official and two senior synodal judges, or it may be brought before the court of the immediate superior.

The antiquiores are those longest in office, and the immediate superior would be the metropolitan. If the latter is a party to the trial, the immediate superior is the Delegate Apostolic, provided his instructions give him that power; otherwise, Rome.

CAN. 1573

THE OFFICIAL

§ 1. Quilibet Episcopus tenetur officialem eligere cum potestate ordinaria iudicandi, a Vicario Generali distinctum, nisi parvitas dioecesis aut paucitas negotiorum suadeat hoc officium ipsi Vicario Generali committi.

§ 2. Officialis unum constituit tribunal cum Episcopo loci: sed nequit iudicare causas quas Episcopus sibi reservat.

§ 3. Officiali dari possunt adiutores, quibus nomen est vice-officialium.

§ 4. Tum officialis tum vice-officiales esse debent sacerdotes, integrae famae, in iure canonico doctores vel ceteroqui periti, annos nati non minus triginta.

§ 5. Sunt amovibiles ad nutum Episcopi; vacante sede a munere non cessant, nec a Vicario Capitulari

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

amoveri possunt; adveniente autem novo Episcopo, indigent confirmatione.

§ 6. Qui Vicarius Generalis est idemque officialis, sede vacante, cessat quidem a Vicarii, non autem ab officialis munere.

§ 7. Si officialis eligatur in Vicarium Capitularem, ipse novum nominat officialem.

Our text insists upon the appointment of a diocesan officialis. This official is first mentioned in the Decretals [2] of Boniface VIII, whence we may conclude that the office was introduced after 1234. The officialis was appointed or commissioned by the bishop, and his office was ordinary, though limited. Later it appears to have been absorbed by that of the vicar-general. Now the Code rules that every bishop is obliged to choose an official with ordinary judiciary power. This office is distinct from that of the vicar-general. Only in case the diocese is small and there is not much business, may the bishop entrust the vicar-general with this office. How small or how large a diocese should be to require an officialis, is difficult to say; it depends upon the territorial extent as well as upon the number of the Catholic people and clergy residing there.

The tribunal of the officialis and the bishop form but one tribunal. Consequently no appeal is possible from the one to the other, or vice versa. Besides, the officialis cannot render judgment in cases which the bishop has reserved to himself. There is no doubt some similarity between the offices of the vicar-general and the officialis; but there is also a difference, for the bishop cannot lawfully curtail the power of the vicar-general beyond the

2 C. 2, 6°, I, 14. His cognitio causarum was general; but the potestas inquirendi, corrigendi aut puniendi was denied him; neither could he decree any removal from benefice, office, or administration

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cases mentioned in law, whilst the power of the officialis is entirely subject to the good pleasure of the bishop. Of course, the bishop has to make it clear which cases he has reserved to himself; otherwise the officialis may proceed, because his power is ordinary.

The officialis may be given assistants, but their power is not ordinary, nor must they be looked upon as quasi-judges in solidum. At least this seems to us a natural assumption because otherwise there would hardly be any unity of government.

The officialis as well as the vice-officialis must be priests in good standing, doctors in canon law or otherwise experienced, and at least thirty years of age. They are removable at the bishop's pleasure. Their office does not cease during the vacancy of the episcopal see, nor may they be removed by the vicar-capitular (administrator). But they need ratification by the new bishop.

If the offices of vicar-general and officialis are held by one person, the office of vicar-general, but not that of officialis, ceases when the episcopal see becomes vacant. If the officialis is elected vicar-capitular (administrator), he shall appoint another officialis.

SYNODAL JUDGES AND COUNSELORS

CAN. 1574

§ 1. In qualibet dioecesi presbyteri probatae vitae et in iure canonico periti, etsi extradioecesani, non plures quam duodecim eligantur ut potestate ab Episcopo delegata in litibus iudicandis partem habeant; quibus nomen esto iudicum synodalium aut pro-synodalium, si extra Synodum constituuntur.

§ 2. Quod ad eorum electionem, substitutionem,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cessationem aut remotionem a munere attinet, serventur praescripta can. 385–388.

§ 3. Nomine iudicum synodalium in iure veniunt quoque iudices pro-synodales.

CAN. 1575

Unicus iudex in quolibet iudicio duos assessores consulentes sibi adsciscere potest; quos tamen ex iudicibus synodalibus eligere debet.

Among ecclesiastical persons were mentioned synodal judges, whose election, removal from office, etc., was described in can. 385–388.[3] The Code now rules that such judges, elected either at, or outside of a synod, should be not more than twelve in number for every diocese. They must be priests of approved morals and experts in canon law. They may be chosen from another diocese if, to use a colloquial expression, the necessary "timber" is not to be found in the diocese itself. Their office is delegated by the bishop, by virtue of which fact they may assist in handling ecclesiastical trials.

No discrimination is made between synodal and pro-synodal judges because in law the latter are regarded as synodal judges pure and simple. One of their prerogatives consists in being assumed as counselors by the judge, who is entitled to select two of them in every trial (can. 1575). This is the rule inculcated by the Council of Trent; but in course of time it seems that protonotaries non participantes were often elected to the detriment of the synodal judges. Benedict XIV restored the Tridentine enactment by admonishing the patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops to entrust the synodal judges with ecclesiastical trials. Their number was to be in 3 Cfr. Vol. II of our Commentary, p. 418 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google proportion to the size and importance of the diocese, but no less than four, priests of knowledge and proved ability, should be chosen for each.[4]

COLLEGIATE BOARD OF JUDGES

CAN. 1576

§ 1. Reprobata contraria consuetudine et revocato quolibet contrario privilegio:

1.° Causae contentiosae de vinculo sacrae ordinationis, et matrimonii, vel de iuribus aut bonis temporalibus cathedralis ecclesiae; itemque criminales in quibus res est de privatione beneficii inamovibilis aut de irroganda vel declaranda excommunicatione, tribunali collegiali trium iudicum reservantur;

2.° Causae vero quibus agitur de delictis quae depositionis, privationis perpetuae habitus ecclesiastici, vel degradationis poenam important, reservantur tribunali quinque iudicum.

§ 2. Loci Ordinarius tribunali collegiali trium vel quinque iudicum cognitionem committere potest etiam aliarum causarum, idque praesertim faciat quando de causis agitur quae, attentis temporis, loci et personarum adiunctis et materia iudicii, difficiliores et maioris momenti videantur.

§ 3. Duo vel quatuor iudices qui una cum praeside tribunal collegiale constituunt, inter iudices synodales Ordinarius, nisi pro sua prudentia aliter opportunum existimaverit, eligat per turnum.

CAN. 1577

§ 1. Tribunal collegiale collegialiter procedere debet, et ad maiorem suffragiorum partem sententias ferre.

4 "Quamvis paternae," Aug. 16, 1741.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 Eidem praeest officialis vel vice-officialis, cuius est processum dirigere et decernere quae pro iustitiae administratione in causa quae agitur necessaria sunt.

CAN. 1578

Exceptis causis de quibus in can. 1572, § 2, Episcopus semper potest tribunali ipse per se praeesse; sed valde expedit ut causas, praesertim criminales et contentiosas gravis momenti, iudicandas relinquat tribunali ordinario, cui praesit officialis vel vice-officialis.

Canon 1576 concerns a modern[5] institution which the legislator prudently and seriously demands to be set up in every diocese. How seriously he wishes to be taken here may be judged from the very first clause, declaring "every contrary custom is reprobated and every contrary privilege is revoked." This institution is a collegiate board of judges, consisting either of three or five ecclesiastics, who form, not a corporation, but what was formerly called a society or college, and hence go by the name of collegiate tribunal; they must meet in a body and all be present at the same time.

§ 1 rules that to a board of three judges are reserved the following cases: (a) civil or contentious causes turning about the bond of sacred ordination (vinculum s. ordinationis, see can. 1993), the marriage tie (not mere separation), and the rights and property of the cathedral church; (b) criminal cases which concern privation of an irremovable benefice, which we believe must also be applied to the case of privation (not the mere removal) of an irremovable pastor; or which concern infliction or dec-

5 If we say modern, we mean in the sense of an ordinary stable tribunal; for several delegated judges are mentioned more than once in the Decretals; c. 13, X, I, 3; c. 21, 22, 34, X, I, 29.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

laration of excommunication, which may also touch laymen.[6]

To a board of five judges are reserved all criminal cases which involve the penalty of deposition, of perpetual privation of the ecclesiastical habit, or of degradation.

§ 2 permits the Ordinary to entrust the collegiate tribunal of three or five also with the cognizance of other cases, especially such as are more difficult and important by reason of circumstances of time, place, or person, or of the matter involved, for instance, in a mixed marriage when satisfaction is to be decided and the persons concerned are of high social standing. The same rule may be applied to clerics who hold important offices and to tendencies which are peculiar to a whole province or generation.

§ 3 commands the Ordinary to choose the two or four judges who constitute the collegiate tribunal together with the president, who is no one else than the diocesan officialis, in turn, from among the synodal judges, as, for instance, is done by the Roman Rota, where three proceed per turnum. The turnus may be taken either by seniority, or one senior and one junior, etc. But the Ordinary may depart from this rule if he deems it advisable, and select ecclesiastics who are not synodal judges.

Can. 1577 determines the mode of procedure to be followed by the board of judges. They must proceed collegialiter, i. e., in a body, and give sentence by majority vote. Thus, if there are three judges, including the officialis, there must be two votes cast either for or against a sentence; if five judges vote, at least three votes are required to pronounce either an interlocutory or definitive sentence.[7]

[6] The text draws no distinction between different kinds of excommunication.

[7] Lex propria S. R. R., April, 1908, can. 31, § 5; Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, § 176 (A. Ap S., I, p. 28; II, 834).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

We said, "including the officialis," for § 2 of can. 1577 rules that the officialis or vice-officialis is the president of the tribunal, whose duty it is to direct the trial and decree what is required for administering justice in the case. Of course he must follow the general rules prescribed by the Code. But, like any other judge, he may follow the dictates of reason as long as these do not clash with the essentials of justice.

Although the officialis or vice-officialis is ex officio the president of the trial, the bishop himself may preside, and, of course, also vote when a sentence is to be pronounced. However, since no one should be judge in his own case the bishop is precluded from presiding in all matters concerning himself or his diocesan court, according to can. 1572, § 2. Besides, according to canon 1578, it is highly advisable, that he leave the decision of criminal and contentious (civil) cases, especially those of importance and consequence, to the ordinary tribunal presided over by the official or vice-official, lest he incur an odium which might impair his authority.

CAN. 1579

§ 1. Si controversia sit inter religiosos exemptos eiusdem religionis clericalis, iudex primae instantiae, nisi aliud in constitutionibus caveatur, est Superior provincialis, aut, si monasterium sit sui iuris, Abbas localis.

§ 2. Salvo diverso constitutionum praescripto, si res contentiosa agatur inter duas provincias, in prima instantia iudicabit ipse per se vel per delegatum supremus religionis Moderator; si inter duo monasteria, supremus Moderator Congregationis monasticae.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Si demum controversia enascatur inter religiosas personas physicas vel morales diversae religionis, aut etiam inter religiosos eiusdem religionis non exemptae vel laicalis, aut inter religiosum et clericum saecularem vel laicum, iudex primae instantiae est Ordinarius loci.

If a dispute arises between individual exempt religious of the same order or congregation, the judge of the first instance is the provincial, or the abbot of an autonomous monastery, provided the respective constitutions do not ordain otherwise.

Unless the respective constitutions provide some other mode, a civil case pending between two provinces must be tried, in the first stage, before the superior general or his delegate; or before the abbot president of monastic congregations if the controversy is between two autonomous monasteries. If a quarrel arises either between individual religious, or between religious corporations of different congregations or orders, or between individual religious of non-exempt congregations or lay institutes, or between religious and secular clerics or laymen, the judge in the first instance is the local Ordinary. The last-named case, of course, supposes that both litigants are in the same diocese. If they are not in the same diocese, the other rules of competency are to be followed, viz., those mentioned under can. 1564–1568 (location of the litigious object, contract, crime, etc.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Article II

AUDITORS AND REFEREES

Can. 1580

§ 1. Potest Ordinarius unum aut plures auditores, seu actorum instructores, sive stabiliter sive pro certa aliqua causa constituere.

§ 2. Iudex auditorem eligere potest tantummodo pro causa quam cognoscit, nisi Ordinarius iam providerit.

Can. 1581

Auditores pro tribunali dioecesano, quantum fieri potest, deligantur ex iudicibus synodalibus; pro tribunali vero religiosorum deligendi semper sunt ex alumnis eiusdem religionis ad normam constitutionum.

Can. 1582

Eorum est testes citare et audire, aliaque acta iudicialia instruere secundum tenorem mandati, non autem sententiam definitivam ferre.

Can. 1583

Auditor in quovis litis momento ab officio removeri potest ab eo qui eundem elegit, iusta tamen de causa, et citra partium praeiudicium.

Can. 1584

Tribunalis collegialis praeses debet unum de iudicibus collegii ponentem seu relatorem designare qui in coetu iudicum de causa referat et sententias in scriptis redigat; et ipsi idem praeses potest alium ex iusta causa substituere.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Auditor [8] in our text means one who prepares the acts of a trial (drafter or draftsman). He is therefore also called instructor actorum. Such a one, or more than one, may be appointed by the Ordinary either permanently or for any special case. But a judge may choose an auditor only for a trial which he himself conducts, unless the Ordinary has appointed one for the same case, in which hypothesis the judge has to accept the auditor appointed by the Ordinary (can. 1580).

Auditors for the diocesan court should, if possible, be taken from among the synodal judges. For tribunals of religious, members of the respective institute should be selected (can. 1581). Auditors play a conspicuous part in the Decretals. They were generally appointed by the Pope upon the demand, or at least petition, of the parties. They had to "hear" (from audire), to examine, to take cognizance of the matters entrusted to them, and take down in writing what seemed important. Besides, they were obliged to report minutely and conscientiously to the Pope, which act was designated by the Latin term "referre." [9] But they seldom or never pronounced judgment. This right was given them only after they had been established as a regular college, under the name of Rota.

Can. 1582 defines the duties of auditors. Their office consists in summoning and hearing witnesses, in preparing the judiciary acts or documents according to the tenor or wording of their commission or mandate. An auditor may also be called upon to draw up a restrictus or summary of the acts.[10] But he is never allowed to pronounce a final sentence.

8 Auditor is sometimes taken as identical with iudex instructor or judge of inquiry; cfr., Messmer, Canonical Procedure, 1897, p. 53.

9 Cfr. c. 3, X, II, 12; c. 15, X, II, 13; c. 3, X, III, 27; c. 18, X, III, 5; 16, 21, X, I, 6; c. 23, X, I, 29; c. 4, X, II, 12; Phillips, K.-R., 1864, Vol. VI, p. 467 f.

10 S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 29 (Coll. P. F., n. 1534).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1583 permits the judge to remove the auditor at any moment of the trial, provided he has a plausible reason for so doing, and the parties suffer no disadvantage.

Besides the auditor, a referee or ponens, taken from the board of judges, is appointed by the president. This official must report to the judges on the process of the trial and write down the sentence. This is generally given in the form of an answer to a query, e. g.: "Utrum constet de nullitate matrimonii? Resp. Affirmative (or negative, as the case may be). If the judge who is appointed as ponens, wishes to decline the honor (or burden), he may do so, but he should have at least the semblance of a good reason,[11] in which case the president may substitute one of the other judges to act as ponens.

Article III

NOTARY, PROSECUTING ATTORNEY, DEFENSOR VINCULI

At every process or trial there must be present a notary, who at the same time acts as secretary. No papers or acts are valid unless written, or at least signed, by him. This latter clause permits the use of a typewriter. A rubber stamp is not admissible for the signature.

The notary must take down in writing the depositions of the witnesses who are present, as well as the answers sent in from other courts, which were asked for by the litterae rogatoriae.[12]

The notary must be chosen by the judge, before the trial begins, from among the notaries lawfully engaged in practice — in Rome they have to undergo an examination and are formally admitted to practice — unless the Ordinary has specially appointed one for the case.

11 Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, § 179; § 9 (A. Ap. S., II, 835, 785).

12 Ibid., § 114; § 144 (l. c., p. 821, 827).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PROMOTOR IUSTITIAE AND DEFENSOR VINCULI

CAN. 1586

Constituatur in dioecesi promotor iustitiae et defensor vinculi; ille pro causis, tum contentiosis in quibus bonum publicum, Ordinarii iudicio, in discrimen vocari potest, tum criminalibus; iste pro causis, in quibus agitur de vinculo sacrae ordinationis aut matrimonii.

CAN. 1587

§ 1. In causis in quibus eorum praesentia requiritur, promotore iustitiae aut vinculi defensore non citato, acta irrita sunt, nisi ipsi, etsi non citati, revera interfuerint.

§ 2. Si legitime citati aliquibus actibus non interfuerint, acta quidem valent, verum postea eorum examini subiicienda omnino sunt ut ea omnia sive voce sive scriptis possint animadvertere et proponere quae necessaria aut opportuna iudicaverint.

CAN. 1588

§1. Eadem persona officium promotoris iustitiae et defensoris vinculi gerere potest, nisi multiplicitas negotiorum et causarum id prohibeat.

§ 2. Promotor et defensor constitui possunt tum ad universitatem causarum tum pro singulis causis.

CAN. 1589

§ 1. Ordinarii est promotorem iustitiae et vinculi defensorem eligere, qui sint sacerdotes integrae famae, in iure canonico doctores vel ceteroqui periti, ac prudentiae et iustitiae zelo probati.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. In tribunali religiosorum promotor iustitiae sit praeterea eiusdem religionis alumnus.

CAN. 1590

§ 1. Promotor iustitiae et vinculi defensor electi ad universitatem causarum a munere non cessant, sede episcopali vacante, nec a Vicario Capitulari possunt removeri; adveniente autem novo Praelato, indigent confirmatione.

§ 2. Iusta tamen intercedente causa, Episcopus eos removere potest.

Each diocese should have its prosecuting attorney and its defensor vinculi.

Benedict XIV, in his well-known constitution, "Dei miseratione," Nov. 3, 1741, decreed ex plenitudine potestatis, that each and every diocese, no matter how small or how large, should have a defender of the marriage bond. To this task is now added another, viz., that of defending the bond of sacred ordination, which forms, as it were, a spiritual tie between the clergyman in higher orders (i. e., from subdeaconship upward) and the diocese to which he belongs.

The prosecuting attorney (promotor iustitiae) is appointed for civil cases which, though perhaps of a private nature, may, in the Ordinary's view, concern the welfare of the diocese or the public welfare (bonum publicum). Thus, for instance, a quarrel between two clergymen about the possession of a benefice or office may scandalize the whole diocese.

The promotor iustitiae also functions in criminal cases which, as already stated, almost exclusively concern clergymen.

If these two officials are not summoned to trials which

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

require their presence, all the acts are null and void, unless the officials in question were actually present, even though not summoned. Hence actual presence is required, not a summons. In civil matters the promotor iustitiae may be summoned by the instructor processus, but his absence would not invalidate the proceedings, whereas in criminal cases his presence is absolutely required. The presence of the defensor vinculi is indispensable in all trials concerning the marriage bond or the validity of ordination.[13]

However, if the promoter and the defender were not present, though summoned, at one or the other hearing, the validity of the proceedings is not impaired, but these officials may inspect the minutes afterwards, in order to make, either orally or in writing, such remarks as they may deem necessary or opportune.

One and the same person may be promoter and defender, unless a multiplicity of affairs and cases prevents, as may happen in large dioceses, or when cases are tried by several courts, or in different places at the same time.

The offices of promoter and defender may be held for all cases that may arise (ad universitatem causarum) or one may be appointed for each individual case (can. 1588). Those elected for all cases do not lose their office during the vacancy of the episcopal see, nor may they be removed by the vicar-capitular; they need, however, the approval of the new prelate. Besides, the bishop may remove them from office for any just cause (can. 1590). This rule Benedict XIV established concerning the defensor.[14] The same Pontiff also described the qualities which a defensor should have. The Code is even more explicit and, besides, strictly requires the priestly character. The promoters and defenders, therefore, should be

[13] Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 819).

[14] "Dei miseratione," Nov. 3, 1741, § 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

priests in good standing, doctors in canon law or at least able canonists, of tried prudence and justice.

In trials of religious the promoter must moreover be a member of the same institute.

Article IV

Beadles and couriers

Can. 1591

§ 1. Ad acta iudicialia intimanda, nisi alia sit probata tribunalis consuetudo, constituantur cursores sive pro omnibus causis sive pro causa peculiari; item apparitores ad sententias ac decreta iudicis, eo committente, exsecutioni mandanda.

§ 2. Eadem persona utroque officio defungi potest.

Can. 1592

Laici ipsi sint, nisi prudentia in aliqua causa suadeat ut eccclesiastici ad id muneris assumantur; quod vero ad eorum nominationem, suspensionem et revocationem attinet, eaedem serventur regulae quae pro notariis can. 373 statutae sunt.

Can. 1593

Acta quae hi confecerint, publicam fidem faciunt.

Couriers (cursores) were formerly employed by the Apostolic Chancery to affix papal bulls on four well-known public places in Rome, namely, St. Peter's, the Lateran, the Apostolic Chancery, and the Campo de' Fiori. This act constituted official promulgation.[15] The Code

15 Ibid., § 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google wants them to be appointed either as regular employees of diocesan courts, or for individual cases, unless the respective diocese or tribunal observes some other satisfactory custom. These couriers have the duty of communicating the judiciary proceedings or acts, of serving summonses, etc.

The apparitores (beadles, constables) are employed to carry out the sentences and decrees of the court. The two offices named in this canon may be held by one and the same person. The acts of cursores and apparitores are official and must be so accepted by the public (can. 1593).

As a rule these offices should be given to laymen; but if prudence demands that in some particular case an ecclesiastic be entrusted with such a mission, it may be done. They are appointed, suspended, or removed like notaries.[16]

16 See can. 373.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE ORDINARY TRIBUNAL OF THE SECOND INSTANCE

CAN. 1594

§ 1. A tribunali Episcopi Suffraganei appellatur ad Metropolitam.

§ 2. A causis in prima instantia pertractatis coram Metropolita fit appellatio ad loci Ordinarium, quem ipse Metropolita, probante Sede Apostolica, semel pro semper designaverit.

§ 3. Pro causis primum agitatis coram Archiepiscopo qui caret Suffraganeis vel coram loci Ordinario immediate Sedi Apostolicae subiecto, fit appellatio ad Metropolitam, de quo in can. 285.

§ 4. Inter religiosos exemptos, pro omnibus causis coram Superiore provinciali actis tribunal secundae instantiae est penes supremum Moderatorem; pro causis actis coram Abbate locali, penes supremum Moderatorem Congregationis monasticae; pro causis vero de quibus in can. 1579, § 3, servetur praescriptum §§ 1, 2, 3 huius canonis.

CAN. 1595

Tribunal appellationis eodem modo quo tribunal primae instantiae constitui debet; et eaedem regulae, accommodatae ad rem, in causae discussione servandae sunt.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1596

Si collegialiter causa in prima instantia cognita fuerit, etiam in gradu appellationis collegialiter nec a minore iudicum numero definiri debet.

Appeal from the court of a suffragan bishop lies to the metropolitan. If a case was tried in the first instance by the metropolitan court, appeal lies to the court of that local Ordinary whom the metropolitan, with the approval of the Holy See, has chosen once for all as court of appeal.[1] Can. 285 insists that archbishops who have no suffragans, and Ordinaries (including prelates or abbots nullius who are immediately subject to the Apostolic See) must choose the nearest metropolitan (viciniorem metropolitam) for conciliar or synodal purposes. This same nearest metropolitan is the court of appeals from the archbishops and Ordinaries, as mentioned above.

For exempt religious the second instance, in all cases tried by the provincial, is the superior general and in cases tried by the local abbot, the abbot president. For cases mentioned under can. 1579, § 3, the competent tribunal of appeal is the metropolitan or the suffragan approved by the Apostolic See, or the nearest metropolitan, also approved by the same Holy See. It depends on whether the local Ordinary has a metropolitan, or whether the case was tried by the metropolitan in the first stage, or whether the archbishop or Ordinary had to choose the nearest metropolitan.

The court of appeal must be established in the same fashion as the court of the first instance; hence the collegiate board with the official and vice-official must be constituted also in courts of appeal, and the same rules

1 In the Acta Ap. Sedis there are now being published many such approvals.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proportionately must be observed in the proceedings. If the case was tried collegialiter by the first court, it must be tried collegialiter also by the court of appeal; if three judges functioned in the lower court, three must act in the court of appeal; if five in the first, also five in the second instance.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER III

THE ORDINARY TRIBUNALS OF THE APOSTOLIC SEE

CAN. 1597

Romanus Pontifex pro toto orbe catholico ad normam can. 1569 iudex est supremus, qui vel ipse per se ius dicit, vel per tribunalia ab ipso constituta, vel per iudices a se delegatos.

On the history of the S. Romana Rota enough has been said elsewhere.[1] That Pius X has restored its ancient splendor, no canonist will regret. As to the Signatura Apostolica something will be said in Art. II, infra.

Although these two tribunals are constituted in foro externo, or for judiciary matter proper, it must be understood that the Roman Pontiff has not thereby unreservedly committed himself to them. He remains the supreme judge in all matters, especially of appeal, as laid down in can. 1569. Hence, instead of leaving a case to these tribunals, he may pronounce judgment himself or entrust trial to delegated judges, who then act in his name, according to can. 199, §§ 1, 2. However, as a rule, all affairs which do not belong to the class of causae maiores, are entrusted to the two ordinary tribunals.

1 Cfr. Vol. II, p. 267 f. of our Commentary.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ART. I

THE SACRA ROTA ROMANA

CAN. 1598

§ 1. Tribunal ordinarium a Sancta Sede constitutum pro appellationibus recipiendis est Sacra Rota Romana, quae est tribunal collegiale constans certo Auditorum numero cui praesidet Decanus, qui primus est inter pares.

§ 2. Ii sacerdotes esse debent laurea doctorali in utroque saltem iure praediti.

§ 3. Auditorum electio Romano Pontifici reservatur.

§ 4. Sacra Rota ius dicit aut per singulos turnos trium Auditorum, aut videntibus omnibus, nisi aliter pro aliqua causa Summus Pontifex constituat.

CAN. 1599

§ 1. Sacra Rota iudicat:

1.° In secunda instantia causas quae a quorumvis Ordinariorum tribunalibus in primo gradu diiudicatae fuerint et ad Sanctam Sedem per appellationem legitimam deferantur;

2.° In ultima instantia causas ab ipsa Sacra Rota et ab aliis quibusvis tribunalibus in secunda vel ulteriore instantia iam cognitas, quae in rem iudicatam non transierint.

§ 2. Hoc tribunal iudicat etiam in prima instantia causas de quibus in can. 1557, § 2, aliasve quas Romanus Pontifex sive motu proprio, sive ad instantiam partium ad suum tribunal advocaverit et Sacrae Rotae commiserit; easque, nisi aliud cautum sit in commissionis rescripto, Sacra Rota iudicat quoque in secunda et tertia instantia ope turnorum qui sibi invicem succedunt.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1600

Causae maiores penitus excluduntur ab ambitu competentiae huius tribunalis.

CAN. 1601

Contra Ordinariorum decreta non datur appellatio seu recursus ad Sacram Rotam; sed de eiusmodi recursibus exclusive cognoscunt Sacrae Congregationes.

The S. R. Rota now consists of ten prelates or auditors, chosen by the Roman Pontiff and presided over by the dean, as the first among equals. The auditors must be doctors of both civil and canon law, and priests. They form the ordinary court of appeals, and a regular collegiate board of judges, who sit in judgment by turns, each consisting of three auditors, or in full session, unless the Pope decrees otherwise in some particular case. They have their special rules or by-laws, which are not secret, but have been officially published.[2]

The competency of the S. Roman Rota is as follows:

1.° It passes judgment in the second instance on all cases tried by any court of Ordinaries in the first stage and lawfully appealed to the Holy See. Here it may be well to state that the Rota will not accept any case unless a sentence has been rendered by the first judge or in the first instance. Otherwise the S. R. Rota has to ask for a sanatio or return the acts, all of which causes delay.

2.° The Rota judges also cases which have already been tried by itself or by another court in the second or any

2 See A. Ap. S., I, 22 ff., II, 783 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other stage, provided these cases have not yet passed as res iudicata or been definitively adjudged (cfr. can. 1902 f.).

3.° Finally, the S. Romana Rota gives judgment in the first instance on cases mentioned in can. 1557, § 2, and others which the Roman Pontiff, either of his own accord or at the demand of the litigants, has reserved to himself and entrusted to the Rota. The same cases may also, unless the writ of commission is worded otherwise, be tried by the S. Rota in the second and third instance by way of succeeding turns. For the ten auditors are divided into ten turns, the first consisting of the three last (or junior) auditors, the second and third, of the six preceding auditors, the fourth of the Dean and the two last auditors, who again have to take their turn, etc. Hence there is always one who did not sit with the same two auditors.[3]

From the competency of the Rota are entirely excluded the causae maiores, which are such by reason either of the persons involved or of the importance of the matter.[4] To this class belong the cases mentioned under can. 1556 and 1557, § 1.

Can. 1601 rules that an appeal or recourse to the S. Rota is admissible against the decrees of Ordinaries, because such cases are exclusively handled by the S. Congregations. Hence whatever a local Ordinary settles administratively, for instance, division of parishes, etc., and in general all recursus in devolutivo[5] tantum, must be addressed to the S. Congregations, not to the Rota, and the episcopal court must pass a sentence if the case is tried in a judiciary way and appealed to Rome.

3 Lex propria, c. 12, § 1 (A. Ap. S., I, 22).

4 Ibid., can. 15 (l. c., p. 24).

5 See can. 345; 513, § 2; 1340, § 3; 1395, § 2; 1428, § 3; 2243, § 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ART. II

THE SIGNATURA APOSTOLICA

CAN. 1602

Supremum Signaturae Apostolicae Tribunal constat nonnullis S. R. E. Cardinalibus, quorum unus Praefecti munere fungitur.

CAN. 1603

§ 1. Apostolica Signatura videt potestate ordinaria:

1.° De violatione secreti ac de damnis ab Auditoribus Sacrae Rotae illitis eo quod actum nullum vel iniustum posuerint;

2.° De exceptione suspicionis contra aliquem Sacrae Rotae Auditorem;

3.° De querela nullitatis contra sententiam rotalem;

4.° De expostulatione pro restitutione in integrum adversus rotalem sententiam quae in rem iudicatam transierit;

5.° De recursibus adversus sententias rotales in causis matrimonialibus quas ad novum examen Sacra Rota admittere renuit;

6.° De conflictu competentiae quem enasci contingat inter tribunalia inferiora, ad normam can 1612, § 2.

§ 2. Videt ex potestate delegata de petitionibus per supplices libellos ad Sanctissimum porrectis ad obtinendam causae commissionem apud Sacram Rotam.

CAN. 1604

§ 1. In causa criminali, de qua in can. 1603, § 1, n. 1, si forte locus sit iudicio appellationis, hoc obtinetur penes ipsum Supremum Tribunal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. In casu suspicionis, Apostolica Signatura definit utrum sit locus recusationi Auditoris, necne; quo facto, iudicium ad Sacram Rotam remittit, ut, secundum suas regulas ordinarias, procedat, Auditore, contra quem exceptio mota fuit, in suo turno manente vel excluso.

§ 3. In casu querelae nullitatis aut restitutionis in integrum aut recursus de quibus in can. 1603, § 1, nn. 3, 4, 5, de hoc tantum iudicat num sit nulla sententia rotalis, num locus sit restitutioni vel recursus sit admittendus; et nullitate declarata aut restitutione concessa vel admisso recursu, causam remittit ad Sacram Rotam, nisi Sanctissimus aliter providerit.

§ 4. In examine supplicum libellorum Signatura, habitis opportunis notitiis et auditis iis quorum interest, decernit utrum precibus annuendum sit, necne.

Can. 1605

§ 1. Supremi Tribunalis Signaturae sententiae suam vim habent, quamvis rationes in facto et in iure non contineant.

§ 2. Nihilominus sive ad instantiam partis sive ex officio, si res postulet, Supremum Tribunal edicere potest ut praedictae rationes exponantur secundum regulas Tribunalis proprias.

After the auditors of the papal household had been constituted a formal corporation or court of trials, they were withdrawn from the immediate entourage of the Pope, who was then served by chaplains, called referendarii. These had to examine the petitions submitted to the Pontiff and present those worthy of acceptance to the Pope for his signature. Among these petitions, of course, there were such as required judiciary procedure, in which the referendarii lacked competency. Hence they could only issue decrees to other Roman tribunals, which perhaps had refused to render a decision or to accept the case at all. Although, therefore, the Signatura was not a tribunal in the proper sense of the word, yet it decided the competency of other tribunals and enforced the acceptance of cases when refused. This was the office of the Signatura Iustitiae. Besides this, there was another, which had more especially to deal with favors that belonged neither to the Dataria nor to the Poenitentiaria. The persons that made up this college were called collectively Signatura Gratiae. When the distinction between the two bodies was clearly made, is uncertain, but it probably dates from the time of Innocent VIII (1484–1492). In course of time both signaturae were reformed, their rights and privileges more accurately determined,[6] etc. But after the year 1870 their significance waned. Pius X resuscitated the Signatura as one tribunal, under the name Signatura Apostolica, which now consists of four Cardinals, one of whom is prefect (can. 1602). Its present ordinary competency is described by the Code as follows:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. It takes cognizance of any violation of secrecy or damage done by the auditors of the S. Rota in not rendering justice or doing an injustice, whether by fraud or through culpable negligence. In cases of such violation or damage which involve a crime, appeal may be made by the accused auditor to the supreme tribunal of the Signatura.

2. The Signatura is also competent in any case of suspicion pleaded against any of the auditors of the S.

6 See Phillips, K.-R., Vol. VI, 498 ff.; Bangen, Die Röm. Curie, 1854, 391 ff.; Hilling (Engl. Transl.) The Roman Court, 1907, p. 127 f.; Benedict XV, "Attentis expositis," June 28, 1915 (A. Ap. S., VII, 325) restored the two colleges of votantes and referendarii.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Rota. In every such case the Signatura shall decide whether the exception is well founded or not, and leave it to the S. Rota to proceed according to the established rules.

3. Furthermore the Signatura is competent when the plaint of nullity is made against a rotal sentence, for instance, when a marriage has been declared null.

4. Also in cases of restitutio in integrum being demanded against a rotal sentence which has become a res iudicata.

5. Also in recourses against a rotal sentence concerning matrimonial cases which the S. Rota refused to reconsider.

In the three last named cases (3, 4, 5) the Signatura alone has to judge whether the rotal sentence was null and void (on account of technical errors), whether restitution is justified or recourse is to be admitted. After the Signatura has rendered judgment, the case must be remanded to the S. Rota, unless the Holy Father provides otherwise.

6. The Signatura is also competent when there is a conflict of competency between inferior tribunals (can. 1612, § 2). Finally, the present Pope has enlarged its competency by giving to the Signatura a delegated power by virtue of which it may take cognizance of petitions addressed to the Holy Father to the effect that the S. Rota may be entrusted with a case brought before his Holiness. The Signatura, after having gathered information and heard the parties concerned, decides whether and how far the petition may be favored.[7] The decisions or sentences of the Signatura, to be effective, require no statement of reasons as to fact or law, but the sacred tribunal either ex officio, i.e., if it deems it necessary and opportune, or if the parties insist, may explain the reasons on which it based a decision, according to its own by-laws.

7 "Attentis expositis," l. c.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

DELEGATED TRIBUNALS

CAN. 1606

Delegati iudices servare tenentur regulas statutas in can. 199–207, 209.

CAN. 1607

§ 1. Iudex a Sancta Sede delegatus uti potest ministris constitutis in Curia dioecesis in qua iudicare debet; sed potest etiam alios quoscunque maluerit eligere et assumere, nisi in delegationis rescripto aliud cautum sit.

§ 2. Iudices vero ab Ordinariis locorum delegati uti debent ministris Curiae dioecesanae, nisi Episcopus in aliquo peculiari casu ob gravem causam proprios et extraordinarios ministros constituendos decreverit.

Delegated judges must follow the rules laid down in can. 199–207 and 209. A judge delegated by the Holy See may avail himself of the assistance of the officials of the court of the diocese in which he is to judge; but, unless his rescript reads otherwise, he may also choose or take to himself whomsoever he pleases.

Judges delegated by the local Ordinaries are bound to employ the officials of the diocesan court, unless the bishop, for a weighty reason and in an individual case, decides to appoint special and extraordinary officials.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE III

RULES TO BE OBSERVED BY ECCLESIASTICAL TRIBUNALS

After defining the cases that may be judged by ecclesiastical courts, and describing the various tribunals, higher and lower, in every stage, the Code now lays down some general rules which are to be observed in all trials. These rules concern the judges and officials of tribunals, the order in which cases should be tried, the delays in law, the time and place of judgment, and the persons that may be admitted to court. Note, however, that these are only preliminaries of the trial proper.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

JUDGES AND OTHER OFFICIALS

This chapter commences with the so-called exceptio fori declinatoria, when exception is taken to the person of the judge because he is regarded as incompetent to try the case at issue.

COMPETENCY AND SUSPICION

CAN. 1608

Iudex competens parti legitime requirenti suum ministerium ne recuset, firmo praescripto can. 1625, § 1.

CAN. 1609

§ 1. Iudex antequam aliquem ad suum trahat tribunal et iudicaturus sedeat, videat utrum ipse sit competens, necne.

§ 2. Eodemque modo antequam aliquem ad agendum admittat, cognoscere tenetur num is in iudicio possit iure consistere.

§ 3. Non est tamen necesse ut de his referatur in actis.

CAN. 1610

§ 1. Si exceptio proponatur contra iudicis competentiam, hac de re ipse iudex videre debet.

§ 2. In casu exceptionis de incompetentia relativa, si iudex se competentem pronuntiet, eius decisio non admittit appellationem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Quod si iudex se incompetentem declaret, pars quae se gravatam reputat, potest intra decem dierum spatium appellationem ad superius tribunal interponere.

CAN. 1611

Iudex quovis in stadio causae se absolute incompetentem agnoscens, suam incompetentiam declarare tenetur.

CAN. 1612

§ 1. Si inter duos iudices pluresve controversia oriatur quisnam eorum ad aliquod negotium competens sit, res definienda est a tribunali immediate superiore.

§ 2. Quod si iudices, inter quos exsistit competentiae conflictus, subsint distinctis tribunalibus superioribus, controversiae definitio reservatur tribunali superiori illius iudicis, coram quo actio primo promota est; si non habeant tribunal superius, conflictus dirimatur vel a Legato Sanctae Sedis, si adsit, vel ab Apostolica Signatura.

CAN. 1613

§ 1. Iudex cognoscendam ne suscipiat causam, in qua ratione consanguinitatis vel affinitatis in quolibet gradu lineae rectae et in primo et secundo gradu lineae collateralis, vel ratione tutelae et curatelae, intimae vitae consuetudinis, magnae simultatis, vel lucri faciendi aut damni vitandi, aliquid ipsius intersit, vel in qua antea advocatum aut procuratorem egerit.

§ 2. In iisdem rerum adiunctis ab officio suo abstinere debent iustitiae promotor et defensor vinculi.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Can. 1614

§ 1. Cum iudex, etsi competens, a parte recusatur ut suspectus, haec exceptio, si proponatur contra iudicem delegatum in causa unicum vel contra collegium vel maiorem delegatorum iudicum partem, definienda est a delegante; si contra unum vel alterum ex pluribus iudicibus delegatis, etsi Collegii praesidem, a ceteris iudicibus delegatis et non suspectis; si contra Auditorem Sacrae Rotae, a Signatura Apostolica ad normam can. 1603, § 1, n. 2; si contra officialem, ab Episcopo; si contra auditorem, a iudice principali.

§ 2. Si ipsemet Ordinarius sit iudex et contra ipsum exceptio suspicionis opponatur, vel abstineat a iudicando vel quaestionem suspicionis definiendam committat iudici immediate superiori.

§ 3. Si exceptio suspicionis opponatur contra promotorem iustitiae, defensorem vinculi aut alios tribunalis administros, de hac exceptione videt praeses in tribunali collegiali vel ipse iudex, si unicus sit.

Can. 1615

§ 1. Si iudex unicus aut aliquis vel etiam omnes iudices qui tribunal collegiale constituunt suspecti declarentur, personae mutari debent, non vero iudicii gradus.

§ 2. Ordinarii autem est in locum iudicum qui suspecti declarati sunt, alios a suspicione immunes subrogare.

§ 3. Quod si ipsemet Ordinarius declaratus fuerit suspectus, idem peragat iudex immediate superior.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1616

Exceptio suspicionis expeditissime definienda est, auditis partibus, promotore iustitiae vel vinculi defensore, si intersint, nec in ipsos suspicio cadat.

CAN. 1617

Quod ad tempus attinet quo exceptiones incompetentiae et suspicionis proponendae sint, servetur praescriptum can. 1628.

Since a judge is by virtue of his office appointed to administer justice, he is not at liberty to refuse his services to those who request it. Hence our Code (can. 1625, § 1) has established certain penalties against those who unreasonably fail to exercise their function as judges, when duly called upon. And the superiors have to see to it that they comply with their obligations, as Innocent III already enjoined.[1]

However, compliance with these obligations supposes competency. Therefore the judge, before he summons any one to his tribunal, and when about to take his seat,[2] must first ask himself whether he is competent, either by reason of his jurisdiction over the person, or by reason of the matter he is to judge. This is done by considering the various reasons which establish the competent forum. If he is a delegated judge he must, besides, be aware of the tenor of the rescript under which he acts, in order not to overstep the limits of his power.

Here the commentators refer to the famous law Barbarius[3] which offers the example of a fugitive slave

1 C. 17, X, II, 1.

2 The act of sitting is becoming to a judge, yet it is certainly not required for the validity of the sentence, as § 3 of can. 1609 makes evident, and can. 1877 seems to imply.

3 L. 3, Dig. 1, 14, de officio praetorum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

who acted as a judge, though he was no Roman citizen. All the glossators hold with Ulpian that the acts of such a judge would be valid, because this assumption is more human and in keeping with the public welfare. However an intruder, if the titulus coloratus (common error) were wanting, could not function validly.[4]

The judge must also consider whether those who seek his services are entitled thereto, that is, in general, whether they are persons endowed with the right of prosecution, of which more shall be said under title IV, ch. I.

It is not necessary, however, to put all this into the minutes (in actis) of the case.

If the defendant (reus) takes exception to the judge, on the claim that he is incompetent for one reason or another, he must state the grounds for his claim. Such a ground may be incompetency for lack of one of the reasons which establish a competent forum, as stated in can. 1560–1568 (relative incompetency). But if the judge declares that his competency in the case is established, no appeal is permitted from his sentence. There may be other reasons brought up by the defendant to establish the incompetency of the judge. Thus if the judge is delegated by another, it may be objected that he obtained his rescript by fraud.[5] Besides, the defendant may oppose the judge as being partial, because of aversion for the defendant and similar reasons. In that case the defendant may appeal to the higher court within ten days from the date of the exception made, provided the judge has admitted his incompetency and proof was furnished.

If the judge has found himself absolutely incompetent,

4 Reiffenstuel, II, 1, n. 200; Santi-Leitner, II, 1, n. 14.

5 C. 38, X, I, 29.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

i.e., by reason of the person to be judged as well as of the matter under adjudication, he is bound to make a declaration to that effect, no matter how far the trial may have proceeded (can. 1611).

The question of competency may be raised, not by the defendant, but by the colleagues or co-judges, as to which of them is entitled to hear the case. This quarrel should be settled by the immediate superior or next higher court, according to the rules of appeal. If the judges belong to different higher courts, the competent higher court is the one to which the controversy was first brought for settlement. If there is no higher court, the question is to be settled either by the legate of the Holy See or by the Signatura Apostolica.

Exception against the judge on account of blood relationship and affinity is extended by can. 1613 to the whole direct line and to the first and second degree of the collateral line. Besides, the judge may be interested in the case he has to judge for other reasons: he may be guardian or administrator,[6] he may be bound by the ties of friendship, he may be an enemy, political or personal, of the parties, or he may have a personal interest in the case, either of gain or loss, or he may have acted as attorney or proxy in the same case before. All these reasons militate against the judge, who therefore should not accept such a case for trial, though the Code does not state the nullity of the act. Exceptions must be heard and disposed of before the trial begins.

The same rules also apply to the promotor iustitiae and the defensor vinculi, who therefore should waive jurisdiction under such circumstances.

According to can. 1614, a plea of exception which arises

[6] Thus c. 36, X, II, 28, which, however, mentions only a delegated judge.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not from lack of competency, but from suspicion, must be settled by the delegans, if one judge, or all the judges, or the greater part of the collegiate board of judges with delegated power are objected to as suspicious. If the suspicion is alleged only against one or the other of the board of judges, even though the suspected one may be the president, the question must be decided by the other, non-suspected judges. The Signatura Apostolica settles all questions with regard to a suspected auditor of the S. Rota. The bishop is competent to judge the plea of suspicion against his official. And if there is an auditor in any court, according to can. 1580, the exception is disposed of by the chief judge, who in the case of a collegiate tribunal would be the official, or the vice-official if he takes the place of the official.

If the Ordinary himself is judge, and the plea of suspicion is brought against him, he shall either abstain from judging the case, or first have the exception settled by his immediate superior, according to can. 1594.

If exception is taken to the promotor iustitiae, or the defensor vinculi, or another official of the acting court on the ground of suspicion, the president of the collegiate board is competent to adjudge the matter.

If the judge sole, or one or all of a collegiate body of judges, are declared to be suspect, they must be changed, but the stage or instance of the court remains the same; the Ordinary should replace the suspected judges by others who are beyond suspicion. Should the Ordinary himself have been declared suspected, his immediate superior, i.e., the metropolitan, should replace him for this case by another judge. The plea of exception must be disposed of as quickly as possible in order not to conflict with can. 1620. When a case under that plea comes up, the respective parties must be heard, and also the promoter and defender, provided they are present and not suspected themselves.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The time within which these exceptions of incompetency and suspicion must be brought, is to be determined according to can. 1628.

DUTIES OF THE JUDGE

CAN. 1618

In negotio quod privatorum solummodo interest, iudex procedere potest dumtaxat ad instantiam partis; sed in delictis et in iis quae publicum Ecclesiae bonum aut animarum salutem respiciunt, etiam ex officio.

CAN. 1619

§ 1. Si actor pro re sua probationes quas afferre posset, non afferat, vel reus exceptiones sibi competentes non opponat, iudex ne suppleat.

§ 2. Si vero agatur vel de publico bono vel de animarum salute, eas supplere potest et debet.

CAN. 1620

Iudices et tribunalia curent ut quamprimum, salva iustitia, causae omnes terminentur, utque in tribunali primae instantiae ultra biennium non protrahantur, in tribunali vero secundae instantiae ultra annum.

CAN. 1621

§ 1. Excepto Episcopo qui per se potestatem iudiciariam excerceat, omnes qui tribunal constituunt aut eidem opem ferunt, iusiurandum de officio rite et fideliter implendo coram Ordinario vel coram iudice a quo electi sunt, vel coram viro ecclesiastico ab

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

alterutro delegato, praestare debent: idque ab initio suscepti officii, si sint stabiles, aut antequam causa agatur, si pro peculiari aliqua causa sint constituti.

§ 2. Etiam iudex a Sede Apostolica delegatus vel iudex ordinarius in religione clericali exempta idem iusiurandum praestare tenetur cum primum constituitur, adstante ipsius tribunalis notario, qui de praestito iureiurando actum redigat.

Can. 1622

§ 1. Quotiescumque iusiurandum praestatur sive a iudicibus aut tribunalis administris, sive a partibus, testibus, peritis, semper emitti debet praemissa divini Nominis invocatione et a sacerdotibus quidem tacto pectore, a ceteris fidelibus, tacto Evangeliorum libro.

§ 2. Iudex partem, testem aut peritum ad iusiurandum recipiens, eum regulariter commonefaciat tum de sanctitate actus et de gravissimo delicto quod admittunt iurisiurandi violatores, tum etiam de poenis, quibus obnoxii fiunt qui falsum in iudicio iurati affirmant.

§ 3. Iusiurandum secundum formulam a iudice probatam praestari debet coram eodem iudice aut eius delegato, adstante utraque aut alterutra parte, quae interesse iurisiurandi praestationi velit.

Can. 1623

§ 1. In iudico criminali semper, in contentioso autem si ex revelatione alicuius actus processualis praeiudicium partibus obvenire possit, iudices et tribunalis adiutores tenentur ad secretum officii.

§ 2. Tenentur etiam semper ad inviolabile secretum servandum de discussione quae in tribunali collegiali

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ante ferendam sententiam habetur, tum etiam de variis suffragiis et opinionibus ibidem prolatis.

§ 3. Imo quoties causae vel probationum natura talis sit ut ex actorum vel probationum evulgatione aliorum fama periclitetur, vel praebeatur ansa dissidiis, aut scandalum aliudve id genus incommodum oriatur, iudex poterit testes, peritos, partes earumque advocatos vel procuratores iureiurando adstringere ad secretum servandum.

CAN. 1624

Iudex et omnes tribunalis administri, occasione agendi iudicii, munera quaevis acceptare prohibentur.

According to the nature of different cases, the judge is to act differently, and although, like a praetor, he may be a judge by virtue of his office, yet in civil cases, which concern private interests only, he can proceed only upon the demand of the parties who seek his services. Otherwise the judge might commit excesses[7] and interfere in matters which are not in his power. Judgment supposes a plaintiff, and where there is no complaint, no judgment is required for private affairs. The case is different, of course, when the public weal and the salvation of souls are concerned, as in all criminal matters. Hence if the judge has obtained notice or a complaint that a crime has been perpetrated,[8] provided, of course, it is not mere slander or defamation, but based on facts, he is obliged ex officio to proceed (can. 1618).

Different also is the way the judge must proceed in civil and criminal cases, respectively. If the plaintiff in a civil case offers no proofs, or the defendant pleads no

7 C. 1, X, V, 31.

8 S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 11 (Coll. P. F., n. 1534).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

exception, the judge is not supposed to supply the deficiency or put in an exception, but acts merely as judge between the litigant parties, and his knowledge is, as shall be seen under can. 1869, strictly judicial. This does not mean that he should act as judge even though he has no knowledge at all of the requirements of the office, for a judge culpably destitute of the knowledge required would not only commit a grievous sin, but be liable to all the damage caused by his judgment.[9]

In criminal cases, which concern the public weal or the salvation of souls, the judge may and must, if he can, supply deficient proofs, and use even his extrajudicial knowledge to ensure a fair and just judgment (can. 1619).

In order to prevent unnecessary and costly delays, which may cause considerable damage to the parties involved,[10] the Code emphasizes the duty incumbent on judges and tribunals, of speedily finishing trials. In the first instance a trial should not be protracted over two years, in the second, not over a year. However, speed is not haste, and a "hurry up" trial might involve injustice. Hence this rule must be understood salva iustitia.

To secure proper and conscientious trials and judgments the Code lays down another obligation for those who are engaged in a trial, including all the officials and assistants of the court, excepting the bishop, when he himself exercises judiciary power. It is the oath. This must be administered by the Ordinary or the judge who has selected them, to the other officials and assistants, or any one delegated by either of them, provided he be an ecclesiastic. Habitual judges must take the oath before they assume 9 Bouix, De Iudicüs Ecclesiasticis, 1855, Vol. I, p. 135 f.

10 Theologians justly maintain that a judge who culpably protracts a trial is held to indemnification; Bouix, l. c., p. 136.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

office, and judges selected ad hoc, i.e., for one special case, must take it before the trial begins. Also a judge delegated by the Apostolic See,— including the bishop if he acts as delegated judge and the judge of exempt clerical organizations,— must take this oath before the trial commences, in the presence of the notary of the court, who shall put it down in writing (can. 1621).

The manner of taking this oath is as follows: The judge and the officials or assistants of the court, together with the parties, witnesses, and experts, must first invoke the name of God; the priests hold their left hand to the breast, the rest of the faithful touch the book of the gospels.[11] Before administering the oath, the judge should warn the parties, witnesses, and experts, of the sacredness of oaths, of the grievousness of perjury, and of the penalties established for perjurers.[12]

The formula of the oath must be approved by the judge and be pronounced in his presence or that of his delegate, and of both or one of the parties who should witness the administration of the oath (can. 1622).

To the conscientious and proper administration of justice also belongs the keeping of the official secret, which can. 1623 inculcates. This is always to be kept in criminal trials. In civil trials it must be observed if a revelation of the proceedings would be prejudicial to the 11 The formula used in the Roman Curia is (Acta Ap. S., I, 41): "In nomine Domini. Ego N. N. spondeo, voveo ac iuro, fidelem et obedientem me semper futurum B. etro et Domino Nostro Papae eiusque legitimis successoribus; ministeria mihi commissa in hac S. Congregatione (Tribunali aut Officio) sedulo ac diligenter impleturum; munera mihi in remunerationem, etiam sub specie doni oblata, non recepturum: et secretum officii religiose servaturum in iis omnibus, quae sacri Canones aut Superiores ecreta servari iusserint, itemque, quoties ab Ordinariis id postulatum fuerit, et quando ex revelatione alicuius actus praeiudicium partibus aut Ecclesiae obvenire potest. Sic me Deus adjuvet, et haec sancta Dei Evangelia, quae meis manibus tango."

12 Cfr. can. 1757, § 2, n. 1; can. 1795, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

parties, either in a spiritual or material way. Therefore the judges as well as all other officials and assistants, must hold their tongue. The same persons are bound by an inviolable secret concerning preliminary discussions held by the board of judges before the final sentence is pronounced. They must also observe strict secrecy concerning the various ballots and the views pronounced at the balloting. Besides, if the nature of the case or of its proofs is such that a revelation of the proceedings (minutes) or arguments (proofs) would endanger the reputation of others, or cause contention or scandal, etc., the judge may command the witnesses, the experts, the litigant parties and their lawyers or proctors to keep the secret under oath.

A final obligation set down in can. 1624 is the refusal to accept gifts, no matter how small or great, whether of a consumable nature, such as drinks, eatables,[13] etc., or of a pecuniary or other kind, as a service, recommendation, etc. This prohibition obliges the judge and all the officials acting at a trial. Then the text says: occasione agendi iudicii, which certainly means, not only on the occasion of a trial, but also with respect or reference to the same, because the object is to preclude bribery, which the divine and ecclesiastical laws forbid.[14]

This is so true that even if the litigants have equally strong proofs in their favor, the judge is not allowed to accept money in favor of one against the other.[15]

13 C. 11, 6°, I, 3, permits acceptance of poculenta and esculenta mera liberalitate oblata, but our text excludes even these.

14 Cfr. Is. 1; Mich. 3; Bouix, l. c., p. 137.

15 S. O., Prop. 26 damn., Sept. 24, 1665 (Denz., n. 997).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PENALTIES FOR JUDGES AND OFFICIALS

CAN. 1625

§ 1. Iudices qui cum certe et evidenter competentes sunt, ius reddere recusant, vel qui temere se competentes declarant, vel qui ex culpabili negligentia aut dolo actum nullum cum aliorum detrimento vel iniustum ponunt aut aliud litigantibus damnum inferunt, tenentur de damnis et ab Ordinario loci vel, si de Episcopo agatur, a Sede Apostolica, ad instantiam partis aut etiam ex officio, congruis poenis pro gravitate culpae puniri possunt, non exclusa officii privatione.

§ 2. Iudices qui secreti legem violare vel acta secreta cum aliis quoquo modo communicare praesumpserint, puniantur mulcta pecuniaria aliisque poenis, privatione officii non exclusa, pro diversa reatus gravitate, salvis peculiaribus statutis, quibus graviores poenae praescribantur.

§ 3. Eisdem sanctionibus subsunt tribunalis officiales et adiutores, si officio suo, ut supra, defuerint, quos omnes etiam iudex punire potest.

In order to give weight to the preceding laws, the legislator adds a penal sanction, which consists partly of a natural, or at least moral, consequence, and partly of a penalty to be imposed.

1. The moral or theological penalty consists in the obligation of making restitution or paying the damages that may arise from unqualified actions. These may be committed by:

a) judges who certainly and evidently are competent on every score, as provided in can. 1560–1568, but refuse to render judgment after complaint is made;[16]

16 C. 8, X, III, 149.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) those who rashly declare themselves competent, because rashness inculpates the judge;[17]

c) those who by culpable negligence or deceit proceed invalidly to the detriment of others, by omitting the necessary formalities or requisites as to the proceeding or hearing of witnesses;[18]

d) those who act unjustly, for instance, by inflicting a censure on innocent parties, or by bribery and avarice;[19]

e) those who injure the litigants in any other way, against their own conscience, through human respect or hatred.[20]

2. The penal sanction, which is, judicially speaking, also contained in the first clause, consists of proportionate penalties, which may be inflicted upon the demand of the injured parties, or ex officio:

a) By the local ordinary, if the judge is subject to his jurisdiction, or

b) By the Apostolic See, if the guilty judge is a bishop. This penalty may even be privation of the office of judge.

§ 2 threatens a pecuniary fine and other penalties, even privation of office, for judges who dare to violate the law of secrecy or communicate secret proceedings to outsiders in any shape or form.

The punishment must be proportionate to the guilt, and may be even severer if particular statutes provide severer penalties.

The same theological and penal sanctions threatened against judges may be inflicted by the judge on guilty officials and employees of his court.

17 C. 49, C. 11, q. 3.
18 C. 11, X, II, 19; c. 2, 6°, II, 1.
19 Cc. 8, 88, C. 11, q. 3; c. 1, 6°, II, 14.
20 C. 1, 6°, II, 14.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECURITY OR BAIL

CAN. 1626

Cum iudex praevidet actorem probabiliter spreturum esse sententiam ecclesiasticam si forte haec ipsi sit contraria, et idcirco conventi iuribus non satis consultum iri, potest, ad eiusdem conventi instantiam vel etiam ex officio, actorem adigere ad congruam cautionem praestandam pro ecclesiasticae sententiae observantia.

If the judge foresees that the plaintiff will not heed the ecclesiastical sentence in case it is against him, and that, therefore, the rights of the defendant will not be guaranteed, he may, either ex officio or upon the demand of the defendant, oblige the plaintiff to give bail or security to the effect that he will abide by the ecclesiastical sentence.

It is customary and required, when cases are brought before the S. Roman Rota, to deposit a certain sum of money for the expenses and as bailment.[21]

21 Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, § 3 (A. Ap. S., II, 795).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

CAN. 1627

Iudices et tribunalia tenentur causas ad se delatas eo ordine cognoscere quo fuerunt propositae, nisi aliqua earum celerem prae ceteris expeditionem exigat, quod quidem peculiari decreto a iudice seu a tribunali statuendum est.

CAN. 1628

§ 1. Exceptiones dilatoriae, eae praesertim quae respiciunt personas et modum iudicii, proponendae et cognoscendae sunt ante contestationem litis, nisi contestata iam lite primum emerserint aut pars iureiurando affirmet eas tunc tantum sibi innotuisse.

§ 2. Exceptio tamen de incompetentia iudicis absoluta a partibus opponi potest in quovis statu et gradu causae.

§ 3. Pariter exceptio excommunicationis opponi potest in quolibet iudicii statu et gradu, dummodo ante sententiam definitivam; imo si agatur de excommunicatis vitandis, aut toleratis contra quos sententia condemnatoria vel declaratoria lata fuerit, ii ex officio semper excludi debent.

CAN. 1629

§ 1. Exceptiones peremptoriae, quae dicuntur litis finitae, veluti exceptio rei iudicatae, transactionis, etc.,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

proponi et cognosci debent ante contestationem litis; qui serius eas opposuerit, non est reiiciendus, sed condemnetur in expensis, nisi probet se oppositionem malitiose non distulisse.

§ 2. Aliae exceptiones peremptoriae proponi debent post contestatam litem, et suo tempore tractandae sunt secundum regulas circa quaestiones incidentes.

Can. 1630

§ 1. Actiones reconventionales satius statim post litis contestationem, utiliter quovis iudicii momento, ante sententiam tamen, proponi possunt.

§ 2. Cognoscantur autem simul cum conventionali actione, hoc est pari gradu cum ea, nisi eas separatim cognoscere necessarium sit aut iudex opportunius existimaverit.

Can. 1631

Quaestiones de cautione pro expensis iudicialibus praestanda aut de concessione gratuiti patrocinii, quod statim ab initio postulatum fuerit, et aliae huiusmodi videndae regulariter sunt ante litis contestationem.

Can. 1632

Quoties, proposita principali controversia, quaestio praeiudicialis suboriatur, id est eiusmodi ex cuius solutione pendeat solutio quaestionis principalis, illa ante omnia a iudice cognoscenda est.

Can. 1633

§ 1. Si ex principali controversia quaestiones incidentes nascantur, cognoscantur prius eae quarum solutio viam sternat ad aliarum solutionem.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Quod si nullo nexu logico inter se cohaereant, quae prius ab alterutra parte propositae sunt, illae antea definiantur.

§ 3. Si de spolio incidat quaestio, haec ante omnia est dirimenda.

This chapter contains general rules for the judge, instructing him how to proceed. These rules concern the order of time in which cases must be tried, exceptions and reconventions, the giving of bail, and the logical or casual interdependence of cases.

1. First the Code rules (can. 1627) that judges and tribunals must try cases in the order of time in which they are proposed (prior in tempore, prior in iure). Hence a judge is not at liberty to give preference to one case over another, unless he is convinced that one should be disposed of as soon as possible.[1] But this view should always be objective. The inversion of the regular order, if deemed necessary, requires a special decree by the judge or the tribunal.

2. Next the Code lays down the rules for taking cognizance of so-called exceptions. These are statements or assertions of the defendant against the plaintiff, made in order to postpone or weaken his purpose. They are dilatory, if they defer action only for a time, and may, as can. 1628, § 1 says, regard either the persons concerned in the trial, i.e., the judge or plaintiff, or the mode of the trial, for instance, the order in which it is conducted.

These exceptions must be proposed and disposed of before the litis contestatio; after that has taken place, exceptions are admissible only if they were raised after 1 For instance, a case of matrimonium consummatum on account of sinful occasion should be given preference to a case of matrimonium contrahendum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the issue in pleading, or if the party declares under oath that they became known to him only after the litis contestatio. Thus it may happen that suspicion is created only after the plaidoyer, or that a relationship existing between the judge and the plaintiff becomes known to the defendant only after the contestatio.

However, exception may be taken to the competency of the judge at any phase or stage (instance) of the trial, provided his alleged incompetency is absolute, i.e., comprises the persons at law as well as the question proposed. This means that even if an incompetent judge has already given an interlocutory or final sentence, he can still be rejected on the plea of absolute incompetency.

A privileged exception is that of excommunication against the plaintiff. This claim, says our text, may be made at any stage or instance of the trial, up to the final sentence. This favor was granted in order to make ecclesiastical censures more respected. However, Innocent III as well as Gregory IX enacted that a defendant who deliberately omits to oppose the plea of excommunication, though it is to be admitted in the first instance, must be condemned to bear the expenses caused by protraction of the trial.[2] The Code is silent about this fine, and more probably does not sustain it.[3]

Those who are under a condemnatory or declaratory sentence of excommunication (either as vitandi or tolerandi) must be excluded from ecclesiastical trials ex officio, i.e., by the judge or board of judges, or by the president or the local Ordinary. This exception may be raised even against the judge or judges.

Another species of exception is that called peremptory, which entirely quashes the action or intention of the plain-

2 C. 12, X, II, 25; c. 1, 6°, II, 12.

3 We say "more probably," by reason of comparing sect. 3 of can. 1628 with sect. 1, can. 1629 where the expenses are clearly stated.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tiff. These are litis finitae, for instance, the proof that the matter at issue is already adjudged, or an agreement concerning a doubtful matter (transactionis), prescription, or payment made.[4] Such exceptions must be proposed and settled before the litis contestatio. But they may not be rejected even after the trial has entered that phase. However, unless the defendant can prove that his omission to oppose this exception sooner, was not intentional or malicious, i.e., designed to vex or fatigue his adversary, he is to be condemned to pay the expenses caused by the delay.

Other peremptory exceptions, which amount rather to incidental questions, must be proposed after the litis contestatio and are considered under Title XI.

3. The Code next considers the counter-plea or reconventio, i.e., an action or suit which the defendant may put in against the plaintiff before the same tribunal, for instance, when a wife sues her husband for separation, and the husband sues her for divorce, or the one pleads desertion and the other cruelty. Such counter complaints may be proposed from the litis contestatio to the moment before the final sentence.

The plea proposed by the plaintiff and the counter-plea opposed by the defendant should be tried at the same time, pari gradu, and by the same judge. But the plaintiff is to be heard first and the defendant must make answer to his allegations; whereupon the counter-plea of the defendant must be discussed. Thus the question may be settled at once.[5]

4. Questions concerning the bailment or security for defraying the expenses of the trial, or a gratuitous defence asked for at the beginning of the trial, and other

4 Engel, II, 25, n. 1, 6.
5 Cfr. c. 1, X, II, 4; c. 2, X, II, 10; Santi-Leitner, II, 4, n. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

similar questions should as a rule be settled before the litis contestatio (can. 1631).

5. Finally the Code considers the logical or causal connection of dependent or related cases or controversies. If an apparently principal question depends on the solution of the prejudicial controversy, the so-called side-issue must be settled first. For instance, when a wife demands that her husband be restored to her, but the husband claims that blood relationship exists between them, the question of consanguinity, though praeiudicialis, must be settled first.[6]

Similarly a connection may exist between several incidental questions or countercharges that may be brought up. These must be settled so that the solution of one paves the way for the solution of the other. Thus, if an election is attacked, and the electors assert there was a conspiracy or censure, the question of conspiracy or censure must first be disposed of, even though it is purely incidental.[7]

If there is no logical connection between several questions the one which was first proposed must be settled first. When disseissin (spolii) is alleged, this charge must be disposed of first.

[6] Cfr. c. 1, X, II, 10; c. 5, X, I, 9. [7] C. 19, X, II, 1.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

DELAYS AND "FATALIA"

CAN. 1634

§ 1. Fatalia legis quae dicuntur, idest termini perimendis iuribus a lege constituti, prorogari non possunt.

§ 2. Termini autem iudiciales et conventionales, ante eorum lapsum, poterunt, iusta intercedente causa, a iudice, auditis vel petentibus partibus, prorogari.

§ 3. Caveat tamen iudex ne nimis diuturna lis fiat ex prorogatione.

CAN. 1635

Si dies, pro actu iudiciali indicta, sit feriata nec in decreto iudicis dicatur expresse tribunal vacaturum nihilominus causis cognoscendis, terminus intelligitur prorogatus ad primam sequentem diem non feriatam.

The Code wishes trials to be terminated within a reasonable time so that peace may be restored between the litigants. However, delays may be granted in order to enable the judge to obtain a fuller knowledge of the case and to pass judgment with greater security. For this purpose so-called dilationes or delays are granted either by law or by the judge, or agreed upon by the parties.

1. The delays which are granted by law concerning the time for appealing, or at least for finishing, an action, are called fatalia legis. They cannot be prorogued,[1] except, of course, by the supreme judge.

1 Cfr. c. 4, Clem. II, 12; Santi-Leitner, II, 8, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Judiciary delays, granted according to the prudent discretion of the judge, or the conventional delays agreed upon by the parties, may be prorogued if there is a just reason for such action and the parties were heard and asked for delay. However, the judge must always watch that the prorogation is not unduly lengthened, either by deceit or contumacy.[2]

If the day set for a trial or judicial action is a feria, i.e., a legal holiday, and no mention is made in the decree of the judge that the tribunal does not sit on that day, the term is supposed to be the next court day which is not a feria.

2 Cfr. cc. 5, 10, X, II, 14.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

PLACE AND TIME OF JUDGMENT

CAN. 1636

Quamvis Episcopus in quolibet suae dioecesis loco, qui non sit exemptus, ius habeat erigendi tribunal, nihilominus penes suam sedem aulam statuat, quae sit ordinarius iudiciorum locus: ibique Crucifixi imago emineat, et adsit Evangeliorum liber.

CAN. 1637

Iudex e territorio suo vi expulsus vel a iurisdictione ibi exercenda impeditus, potest extra territorium iurisdictionem exercere et sententiam ferre, certiore tamen hac de re facto loci Ordinario.

CAN. 1638

§ 1. In unaquaque dioecesi Ordinarius publico decreto dies et horas definiri curet, pro loci ac temporum adiunctis opportunas, quibus tribunal adiri regulariter possit, et ab eo iustitiae administratio exigi.

§ 2. Iusta tamen de causa, et quoties periculum sit in mora, fas est fidelibus quovis tempore iudicis ministerium in sui iuris vel boni publici tutelam invocare.

CAN. 1639

§ 1. Dies festi de praecepto, et ultimi tres dies hebdomadae sanctae feriati habeantur; et in iis citationes

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

intimare, audientias habere, partes et testes excutere, probationes assumere, decreta et sententias ferre, denuntiare et exsequi vetitum est, nisi necessitas, christiana caritas, aut bonum publicum aliud postulent.

§ 2. Iudicis autem est in singulis casibus statuere et denuntiare, an et quae acta supra dictis diebus expleri debeant.

Although the bishop may set up a tribunal anywhere in his diocese (provided it be not exempt), yet he should establish a judgment hall in his episcopal city, which shall be the ordinary place for holding trials. There the Crucifix shall occupy a conspicuous place and there must also be a copy of the Gospels. The reason for choosing the episcopal city is, according to Boniface VIII that experts may usually be found there.[1]

A doubt may perhaps arise concerning exempt religious, who seem to live in an "exempt place." However, a monastery or convent, as such, is not exempt, but local exemption extends only as far as, and in virtue of, personal exemption. Hence it is licit to perform civil as well as criminal jurisdictional acts, to examine witnesses, or to write the acts of a trial in a convent or monastery of exempt religious: and such acts are certainly valid. Whether they would be valid if the entire trial, inclusive of the sentence, were conducted in such a place, seems doubtful.[2] Of course, if the place itself were exempt, for instance, a territory nullius, the proceedings would be invalid.[3]

The Council of Vienne (1311–1313) allowed bishops

1 C. 11, 6°, I, 3.

2 Cfr. c. 8, X, II, 20; c. 2, 6°, II, 1; Wernz, Ius Decret., Vol. V, n. 315, p. 267, denies the validity according to a decision of the S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 15, 1741; Messmer, Canonical Procedure, 1897, p. 143, asserts the validity, and quotes S. C. Imm., Jan. 21, 1821, and July 14, 1830.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google who had been forcibly driven from their dioceses, to give judgment in any strange diocese, although this was otherwise prohibited by law, according to the adage: "Extra territorium ius dicenti non paretur impune."[3] Our text amplifies and to some extent moderates this law. The amplification consists in that it permits any judge who is driven away from his diocese or prevented from exercising judgment there (e.g., on account of being a prisoner) to exercise jurisdiction outside his own territory, provided (not for valid exercise, but as a sign of respect), he notifies the local Ordinary of the fact,— a condition of which the Clementine decretal said nothing.

Ordinaries should make known the days and hours when the diocesan court may be approached by those seeking justice. These days and hours (office hours) should be set as conveniently as possible. The Code abstains from fixing the hours more closely, and hence any hour is valid.

Although the appointed days and hours should form the rule for holding trials or giving audience, there may be just reasons for seeking redress of grievances at other times. Sundays and holydays of obligation, and also the three last days of Holy Week are feriae or dies feriati, legal holidays on which no tribunal should be in session.[4] On these days, therefore, it is forbidden to issue summons, give audiences, hear parties or witnesses or discuss their testimony, accept proofs, issue decrees or sentences, denounce or execute criminals,— except in case of necessity or when Christian charity or the public welfare demand an exception. It is the right and duty of the judge to decide in each individual case which acts performed on forbidden days need supplementation. Here

[3] C. 2; 6°, I, 2.
[4] S. Pius V, "Cum primum," April 1, 1566, § 8; Bened. XIV, "Ab eo tempore," Nov. 5, 1745.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the old law has been modified, for the Decretals [5] declared every judicial act performed on a sacred day or holiday to be null and void. A summons served on such a day did not render the party contumacious. Now it is left to the judge to determine what is valid and what not.

[5] Cc. 1, 5, X, II, 9.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

PERSONS ADMITTED TO TRIALS; METHOD OF DRAWING UP AND KEEPING JUDICIAL ACTS

The Code wishes to insure orderly procedure and correct treatment of the official acts which are drawn up for and during a trial. To procure the first, it determines the persons to be admitted.

CAN. 1640

§ 1. Dum causae coram tribunali aguntur, extranei ab aula arceantur et ii tantummodo adsint, quos ad processum expediendum iudex necessarios esse iudicaverit.

§ 2. Omnes, iudicio assistentes, qui reverentiae et obedientiae tribunali debitae graviter defuerint, iudex, etiam illico et incontinenti si coram tribunali sedente in id quis peccaverit, potest censuris quoque aliisve congruis poenis ad officium reducere, advocatos praeterea et procuratores etiam iure alias causas apud tribunalia ecclesiastica pertractandi privare.

CAN. 1641

Si alicui actui processuali interveniat persona linguae loci ignara et iudices ac partes linguam huius personae propriam non intelligant, interpres adhibeatur iuratus, et a iudice designatus, contra quem alterutra pars legitimam exceptionem non proposuerit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The court room is not to be encumbered by outsiders whilst a trial is going on, but only those whom the judge deems necessary for conducting a trial are to be admitted. This rule might be profitably copied by our civil courts. Newspaper reporters are not required for the proper conduct of a trial.

It may happen that those who are allowed to be present cannot control their temper but profess contempt and scorn or otherwise act in a manner injurious and offensive to the respect and obedience due to the tribunal. The offense must be of a serious nature, but it need not consist in actual maltreatment (for instance, spitting in the face of, or making fists, at the judge); seriously contumelious words suffice.[1] In order to bring such intemperate persons to their senses, the judge may punish them there and then by inflicting censures or other suitable penalties. Lawyers and proctors guilty of such behavior may be deprived of the privilege of acting at ecclesiastical trials.

Among those to be admitted is the interpreter, if any person among those called to the trial does not speak the language of the place where the trial is held, and the judges and parties to the trial do not understand his language. Interpreters must be sworn and no one can be appointed to this office against whom either party has raised a legitimate exception.

THE JUDICIAL ACTS

CAN. 1642

§ 1. Acta iudicialia, tum quae meritum quaestionis respiciunt, seu acta causae, ex. gr., sententiae et

1 C. 11, X, V. 37: "de improbitate constat . . . adversus asserationem judicis temere prorumpentis."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cuiusque generis probationes, tum quae ad formam procedendi pertinent, seu acta processus, ex. gr., citationes, intimationes, etc., scripto redacta esse debent.

§ 2. Nisi iusta causa aliud suadeat, quoad eius fieri potest, lingua latina redigantur; sed interrogationes et responsiones testium, aliaque similia, lingua vernacula confici debent.

Can. 1643

§ 1. Singula folia processus numerentur; et actuarii subscriptio cum sigillo tribunalis apponatur in unoquoque folio.

§ 2. Singulis actis completis vel interruptis seu ad aliam sessionem remissis, apponatur subscriptio actuarii et iudicis vel tribunalis praesidis.

§ 3. Quoties in actis iudicialibus partium aut testium subscriptio requiritur, si pars aut testis hanc facere nequeat vel nolit, id in ipsis actis adnotetur, simulque iudex et actuarius fidem faciant actum ipsum de verbo ad verbum parti aut testi perlectum fuisse, et partem aut testem vel non potuisse vel noluisse subscribere.

Can. 1644

§ 1. In casu appellationis, actorum exemplaria ad norman can. 1642, 1643 conscripta et in fasciculum religata, cum indice omnium actorum et documentorum et cum testificatione actuarii seu cancellarii de eorum fideli transcriptione et integritate, mittantur ad superius tribunal; si exemplaria sine gravi incommodo exscribi nequeant, mittantur cum opportunis cautelis acta ipsa originalia.

§ 2. Si eo mittenda sint ubi vernacula lingua non sit cognita, acta ipsa in linguam latinam vertantur,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

adhibitis cautelis ut de fideli translatione constet.

§ 3. Si acta debita forma et charactere confecta non fuerint, a iudice superiore repelli possunt: quo in casu illi, quibus culpa imputanda est, acta suis impensis denuo conficere et mittere tenentur.

CAN. 1645

§ 1. Iudicio expleto, documenta partibus restitui debent, nisi in criminalibus, bono publico ita exigente, iudex aliquod retinendum censuerit.

§ 2. Documenta omnia, quae apud tribunal manent, in archivo Curiae deponantur sive publico sive secreto, prout eorum natura exigit.

§ 3. Notarii, actuarii et cancellarius sine iudicis mandato tradere prohibentur exemplar actorum iudicialium et documentorum quae sunt processui acquisita.

§ 4. Anonymae epistolae quae nihil ad causae meritum conferunt, et etiam subscriptae quae sint certo calumniosae, destruantur.

Writing plays a conspicuous part in every trial, yet not all things that are or must be written are of equal importance. Some concern the merits of the case and are styled acta causae. To this class of documents belong all sentences, either interlocutory or final, and proofs of every kind, even those presented orally, because they, too, must be put down in writing. Other papers (acta processus) touch the mode or form of procedure. To this class belong the summons, intimations, the oaths taken, and, perhaps, the special rules laid down for proceeding in a particular case. If one should wish to call the acta causae "records," and the acta processus "minutes," he would, we believe, not commit a grievous mistake, although the word records has a wider significance, though not as wide as "minutes." Which of the acta must be put in writing in order to be valid is determined under each heading; thus, for instance, the summons must certainly be recorded (can. 1723 f.); but if no invalidating clause is attached, a trial cannot be attacked as invalid because some portion of the proceedings was not written out.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Some ecclesiastical acts are intended not only for private use, but for the Church at large,[2] whose language is Latin, and since these records in many cases must be forwarded to Rome, which acknowledges as official languages only Latin, Italian, and French,[3] all acts should, as far as possible, be composed in Latin, unless there is a just reason for departing from this rule. However, the questions put to the witnesses, their answers, the so-called articuli or specified charges and counter-charges of plaintiff and defendant, and also the reports of experts[4] are to be written in the vernacular language (see, however, can. 1644, § 2). Each and every sheet of the records as well as the minutes (folia processus) must be paginated and signed by the secretary, who has also to put the seal of the tribunal on each. As soon as any part of the acts (for instance, the defense, or the hearing of one set of witnesses, or the report of an expert) has been completed, the secretary should sign his name to the record, which is then passed on to the judge (or to the president of the tribunal, if a board of judges is sitting) for their respective signatures. This process must be repeated every time the session is interrupted or adjourned. The Code does not prescribe that only one page

2 S. C. C., Aug. 22, 1840 (Coll. P. F., n. 911).

3 Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, § 7 (A. Ap. S., II, 785).

4 S. C. C., Aug. 22, 1840 (l. c.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the sheet be written on, but we have become accustomed to use only one page. Typewriting is not excluded, but special ink should be used at least for important documents.

If the judicial acts have to be signed by the parties to the trial and by the witnesses, and these are either unable or unwilling to sign — they cannot be compelled to do so — this fact must be set down by the secretary or clerk in the minutes, and the record thereof accompanied by the testimony of the judge and the acting clerk that the acts were read to the respective parties or witnesses, and that they were either unable or unwilling to sign them (can. 1643).

The acts taken down and signed in the first instance or stage of a trial may be required for the court of appeal. In that case the original papers should remain with the court of the first instance and copies forwarded to the court of appeal. Each copy must be bound so as to form a booklet and contain a list of the minutes and records, and of all other documents, together with the attestation of the secretary, or clerk, or chancellor, that the copy is a faithful and complete transcript of the original text. If copies cannot be made without great inconvenience, the original text may be sent to the court of appeals, provided there is no danger that they be lost, abused, or damaged, or fall into strange hands. We hardly believe that a carbon duplicate, provided with the necessary signature, or a photographic reproduction with the signature in handwriting (no rubber stamp!) would be refused. If the acts are written in the vernacular (for instance, English) and have to be sent to a court (for instance, at Rome, where this language is unknown, or at least not officially acknowledged) they must be translated into Latin and the faithfulness of the translation guaranteed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Acts not composed in the proper form and style may be refused by the higher judge, and the official through whose negligence this has happened, is bound to have them redrawn and forwarded at his own expense (can. 1644).

Form refers to the condition of the sheets and the signatures.

Character may signify style, hence the expression "stylus curiae," the style peculiar to judicial acts. The term "character" may also refer to the legibility of the acts and their arrangement; or to the language, which, as a rule, should be Latin, although if it is customary in a country to employ the vernacular, this fact would be a sufficient reason for composing the acts in that language. It sometimes requires an expert in both languages to translate certain terms into a dead language, and courts are not precisely intended for stylistic and linguistic exercises.

Here it may be added that a wise rule of the S. R. Rota prescribes that the written defence should not comprise more than twenty printed quarto pages, and the answers not more than ten pages of the same size.[5]

After the trial is finished, such documents as testimonials, deeds, letters of appointment, certificates, etc., which were required in court, must be restored to their owners. Only if the judge should deem it necessary to retain the one or other such document in a criminal case, may he keep it. But the documents which remain with the court (for instance, the charges and counter-charges, the depositions of witnesses, the defence, etc.) should be deposited in the diocesan archives, either the public or the secret archives — the latter in criminal and some secret marriage cases. The notaries, secretaries, and chan-

5 Lex propria, June 29, 1918; can. 29, § 1 (A. Ap. S., I, 27).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cellors [6] are not allowed to give out copies of any judicial acts or documents which have been acquired by reason of trials without a commission by the judge.

Anonymous letters which have little or no bearing on the merits of the case, and manifestly slanderous letters, though signed by their authors, must be destroyed.

6 What Archbishop (then Professor) Messmer wrote some twenty-three years ago (Canonical Procedure, 1897, p. 58) is still true: These different terms are "confoundedly confused"; neither can an adequate distinction be drawn from the Code. Hence a chancellor may act as notary and secretary, provided he can fill the office and is not otherwise employed in the same case; see can. 372.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE IV

THE PARTIES TO THE CASE

CHAPTER I

PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANT

In each and every trial or case there is one who complains and one who is complained against, one who accuses and one who is accused. The accuser may be the judge himself, who, in certain criminal cases, must proceed ex officio.[1] Yet even in this instance he must have at least some knowledge of the case, gained from one source or another.

After setting forth the office of the judge and his duties, and outlining in general terms the mode and method of procedure, the Code now turns to the parties involved in a trial.

WHO MAY BE PLAINTIFF OR DEFENDANT

CAN. 1646

Quilibet potest in iudicio agere, nisi a sacris canonibus prohibeatur; reus autem legitime conventus respondere debet.

CAN. 1647

Licet actor vel reus conventus procuratorem vel advocatum constituerit, semper tamen tenetur in 1 Criminal action proper is reserved to the fiscal promoter; can. 1934.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

iudicio ipsemet adesse ad praescriptum iuris vel iudicis.

First, the general rule is laid down that any one not prevented by the Canon Law may be plaintiff. This is a natural and inalienable right which can be to some extent limited or taken away only by way of a judicial penalty.

The terms used to designate the plaintiff are actor, agere in iudicio, habere personam standi in iudicio,[2] from which it may be seen how intimately this right is connected with the personal rights of man. Nor is it surprising that the Roman Law, which refused to acknowledge slaves as persons, should deny them the right of being plaintiffs, except in a very few cases of later date. Christianity knows no slaves in the Roman sense of the word. However, the exercise of personal rights supposes certain necessary personal faculties, of reason and will. Therefore the law provides for cases which concern persons not fully developed. Besides, some kind of a dependent will must be acknowledged in religious and moral persons or corporations which have a corporate will. Lastly, the law may, as stated, deprive certain delinquents of the right of acting as plaintiffs; as defendants all must be admitted, and all must answer when called to a trial, or sued, or accused, as otherwise criminals might profit by their malice.[3]

The question arises whether plaintiff and defendant, when duly and personally summoned, must appear personally before the judge. The answer is given in can. 1647, according to a Decretal[4] of Boniface VIII, but in a more extended form. Plaintiff and defendant may present their case by proxy or through advocates (law-

2 This term might be rendered by right to prosecute.

3 Cfr. c. 7, X, II, 1; c. 11, X, V, 1.

4 C. 1, X, 6°, II, 1, which mentions only delegated judges.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

yers) unless the law — which here means first and above all, the common law, then also a particular law which does not contradict the common law — or the judge demand their personal presence. The supreme judge, i. e., the Pope may give the power to summon the parties personally in his letter of delegation in criminal cases. But even in civil cases the judge who acts by virtue of his office may demand the personal appearance of either plaintiff or defendant, for instance, to test his mental capacity or character, or whenever the iuramentum calumniae is to be administered.[5]

MINORS

CAN. 1648

§ 1. Pro minoribus et iis qui rationis usu destituti sunt, agere et respondere tenentur eorum parentes aut tutores vel curatores.

§ 2. Si iudex existimet ipsorum iura esse in conflictu cum iuribus parentum vel tutorum vel curatorum, aut ipsos tam longe distare a parentibus aut tutoribus vel curatoribus, ut hisce uti aut minime aut difficulter liceat, tunc stent in iudicio per curatorem a iudice datum.

§ 3. Sed in causis spiritualibus et cum spiritualibus connexis, si minores usum rationis assecuti sint, agere et respondere queunt sine patris vel tutoris consensu; et quidem, si aetatem quatuordecim annorum expleverint, etiam per seipsos; secus per tutorem ab Ordinario datum, vel etiam per procuratorem a se, Ordinarii auctoritate, constitutum.

[5] Santi-Leitner, II, 1, n. 19.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1649

Nomine eorum de quibus in can. 100, § 3, stat in iudicio rector vel administrator, firmo praescripto can. 1653; in conflictu vero eorum iurium cum iuribus rectoris vel administratoris, procurator ab Ordinario designatus.

CAN. 1650

Bonis interdicti, et ii qui minus firmae mentis sunt, stare in iudicio per se ipsi possunt tantummodo ut de propriis delictis respondeant, aut ad praescriptum iudicis: in ceteris agere et respondere debent per suos curatores.

CAN. 1651

§ 1. Ut curator ab auctoritate civili alicui datus a iudice ecclesiastico admittatur, debet accedere consensus Ordinarii proprii illius cui datus est.

§ 2. Ordinarius potest quoque alium curatorem constituere pro foro ecclesiastico, si, omnibus mature perpensis, id statuendum esse prudenter censuerit.

To act personally at trials requires a normally developed mind and will. Personal rights cannot properly be exercised by infants or minors who lack judgment, and, consequently, to secure them from hurting themselves by improvident acts, not only the ecclesiastical, but the civil courts also, give them guardians.[6] Like unto infants are those adults who lack either the actual or the habitual use of reason. Therefore can. 1648 rules that for minors and those adults who lack the use of reason, parents or guardians are obliged to act as plaintiffs or defendants.

6 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., I, 464.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The text says: "aut tutores aut curatores." These two terms are comprised by the one English term guardians, although the Roman as well as ecclesiastical law draw a distinction between tutores, who are given to impuberes, and curatores, who are appointed for those who have reached puberty, but have not yet completed the age of twenty-one.[7] Also note the term "tenentur"; parents or guardians have the same obligation as the plaintiff or defendant himself, according to can. 1647.

However, it may be that parents or tutors have personal interests[8] of their own involved in a trial, and that these interests clash with the rights of the children or mentally incapacitated wards. In that case the judge should appoint a guardian. The same rule applies if the parents or guardians live so far away from the residence of their children or wards that they can not be present at the trial or can attend only with great difficulty. Attendance would be difficult if the distance were great or travelling inconvenient or expensive, or if there were danger of seriously delaying the trial.

The ecclesiastical law naturally favors spiritual matters, and matters closely connected with these, for instance, the Sacraments, iuspatronatus and beneficiary cases, pious legacies, etc. In all such cases minors who have attained the use of reason may act as plaintiffs or defendants without the consent of their parents or guardians; and after completing the age of fourteen, they may act by themselves without a procurator. But before they have completed the fourteenth year of age, minors, or rather [7] The tutor had charge of the maintenance and education of the minor; the curator had the care of his fortune; or in English law terms: the tutor was the committee of the person, the curator the committee of the estate (Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., I, 460).

[8] This may easily happen if the religion of the minor is at variance with that of the tutors, and these are bigots.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

impuberes, must be represented at trials by a guardian appointed by the Ordinary, or by a procurator whom they have chosen with the approval of the Ordinary. Thus disputed engagements of minors may be answered in court by the parties themselves if [9] they are over fourteen, and this holds not only for young men, but also for girls, because the text does not discriminate as to sex.

Can. 100, § 3, compares moral or artificial persons, whether corporate or non-corporate, with minors. If such are called to judgment, their rector or administrator must represent them (can. 1653). But if the rector or administrator has a special interest in the trial, which might clash with the interests or rights of the corporation or juridical entity which he represents, a procurator must be appointed for said juridical persons.

Can. 1650 considers the case of prodigals (bonis interdicti) and weak-minded persons. We say prodigals, because the Roman law put spendthrifts, who were supposed to be incapable of managing their own affairs, under guardianship.[10] The reason for this is to be sought partly in the abnormal mental condition which shows itself in one who squanders his property, and partly in the fact that such a person may not be able to defray the expenses of a trial. The aforesaid persons, then, need appear personally only in criminal cases or when the judge demands their personal presence, which he may, even in civil cases, as explained under can. 1647. Otherwise their curators may appear for them.

If curators have been appointed by the civil authority, must the ecclesiastical judge admit them? Yes, answers

[9] C. 14, X, II, 13; c. 3, 6°, II, 1.

[10] L. 1, Dig. 27, 10: "Lege XII tabularum prodigo interdicitur bonorum suorum administratio." In Scotch law, interdict means a legal restraint from executing deeds imposed on persons of weak mind; Stimson's Law Dictionary, 1911, s. v. "Interdict."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can. 1651, provided the Ordinary of the ward to whom the civil authority has given a curator, consents. But the same Ordinary may, if he deems prudent, appoint another curator.

Note that in canons 1648, § 3, 1649, 1651 the apposition loci is omitted, and hence, according to can. 198, the superiors of clerical exempt institutes are also competent.

RELIGIOUS AS PLAINTIFFS

CAN. 1652

Religiosi sine Superiorum consensu non habent personam standi in iudicio, nisi in casibus qui sequuntur:

1.° Si de vindicandis adversus religionem iuribus sibi ex professione quaesitis agatur;

2.° Si ipsi extra claustra legitime morentur et iurium suorum tuitio urgeat;

3.° Si contra ipsum Superiorem denuntiationem instituere velint.

Since religious have abdicated the habitual or actual right of holding property — which is the cause of most legal quarrels — and transferred it to the monastery, and since, besides, they depend on the will of their superiors, it follows that, to prosecute their rights as individual religious, they need the consent of their superiors.[11] But there are a number of exceptions, which the Code reduces to three, to wit:

1.° When a religious wishes to prosecute rights which he has acquired by reason of his religious profession, against the institute to which he belongs, he may proceed without the superior's permission. Thus if a sentence

11 Cfr. c. 11, C. 12, q. 1; c. 35, C. 16, q. 2; c. 7, X, I, 31; c. 6, X, III, 35.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of dismisal or expulsion was inflicted, and the religious believes he has just reason to complain against the same, he may bring the case before the superior (provincial or abbot) and also appeal to the higher court (general or abbot president); he may do this also in case he was deprived of the right of voting (active or passive).[12]

2. If a religious lawfully dwells outside the enclosure and is compelled to defend his rights, he may proceed to do so without the superior's permission. Thus a religious who, by reason of his studies (see can. 606, § 2), is absent from his monastery, is lawfully absent, and may defend his rights in the ecclesiastical and civil courts according to can. 120; a religious who is rector of a church, or administrator of a pious foundation, or chaplain of an institution, may defend his case, because his office involves the right of defence, and the permission of his superior is included in the appointment to office.[13]

3. Finally, individual religious may denounce their own superiors and prosecute the case at the expense of the monastery. The sources from which our text is taken[14] mention in a general way the right of accusing superiors who commit crimes, but the second text has in view especially the reformation of monasteries. A criminal charge is never or rarely to be brought against superiors; rather, as our text says, should denunciation be made to the next higher superior, who shall decide what course is to be taken.[15]

12 Cfr. c. 22, X, I, 3; Santi-Leitner, II, 1, n. 17.

13 C. 16, X, II, 1; c. 1, Clem. I, 2; Reiffenstuel, II, 1, n. 167.

14 Cc. 11, 26, X, V, 1.

15 Wernz, l. c., V, n. 166. Besides, it must be understood of crimes, not of mere transgressions, for instance, of a rubric which perhaps cannot be carried out on account of circumstances and admits a common-sense interpretation, nor of every transgression of a minor ecclesiastical law.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ORDINARIES AND CORPORATIONS

CAN. 1653

§ 1. Ordinarii locorum possunt nomine ecclesiae cathedralis aut mensae episcopalis stare in iudicio; sed, ut licite agant, debent audire Capitulum cathedrale vel Consilium administrationis eorumve consensum vel consilium habere, quando periculo vertitur pecuniae summa pro qua alienanda ad normam can. 1532, §§ 2, 3 eorundum consensus vel consilium requiritur.

§ 2. Beneficiarii omnes nomine beneficii possunt in iudicio agere aut respondere; quod tamen ut licite faciant, servare debent praescriptum can. 1526.

§ 3. Praelati ac Superiores Capitulorum, sodalitatum et quorumlibet collegiorum stare in iudicio nequeunt, nomine suae cuiusque communitatis, sine eiusdem consensu ad normam statutorum.

§ 4. Adversus eos de quibus in §§ 1–3, si sine praescripto consensu aut consilio in iudicio egerint, piae causae aut communitati ius est ad refectionem damnorum.

§ 5. In casu vero defectus vel negligentiae illius qui administratoris munere fungitur, potest ipse loci Ordinarius per se vel per alium stare in iudicio nomine personarum moralium quae sub eius iurisdictione sunt.

§ 6. Superiores religiosi nequeunt nomine suae communitatis stare in iudicio, nisi ad normam constitutionum.

The right of standi in judicio by reason of administration, is a limited right because, like that of alienation, it is liable to restrictions or formalities set up by the law.

1. Local Ordinaries may prosecute for the rights attached to the cathedral church or to the mensa episcopalis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But in order to act lawfully (licite) they must have the consent or advice of the chapter (diocesan consultors) or the board of administrators (according to can. 1532, § 2, 3 on alienation).

2. Beneficiaries (which name certainly comprises our pastors) may act as plaintiffs or defendants in the prosecution of beneficiary rights, but for so doing they need the written consent of the local Ordinary, or, in urgent cases, that of the rural dean, according to can. 1526.

3. Prelates and superiors of chapters, sodalities, and collegiate bodies cannot go to court in the name of their communities without the consent of the latter, as required by their statutes. The statutes may distinguish between the revenues, or property proper to the prelate or superior, or at least subject to his personal and exclusive administration, and goods which the prelate or superior administers in the name of the community. For these latter rights the superior needs the consent or advice of his chapter or council according to the rules laid down in the constitution or bylaws. Concerning the goods or property which the superior administers in his own name, he is not tied to the consent or advice of chapter or council.[16] However, in religious communities with solemn vows, this distinction has little weight, except in orders where the peculium still exists.

§ 6, therefore, simply rules that religious superiors of male and female organizations cannot go to court in the name of their community except in so far as their constitutions permit.

4. Those persons mentioned under nn. 1–3, if they go to court without the prescribed consent or advice, are 16 Cfr. c. 21, X, I, 3; c. 16; X, II, 1; Reiffenstuel, II, 1, n. 170 ff. In America, as far as we know, there is no distinction between the mensa abbatis and the mensa communitatis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bound to make restitution of the damage caused to the pia causa or community by their action. The bishop is held to repair the damage to his cathedral or mensa episcopalis, the beneficiary to his benefice, prelates and superiors to their community. Of course, religious superiors who have no property of their own cannot be held to restitution, except as far as they are able and it is compatible with the vows, as stated elsewhere.[17]

5. If there is no administrator, or if he is negligent, the local Ordinary may himself or by proxy prosecute the case in the name of those juridicial persons who are subject to his jurisdiction, as, for instance, diocesan congregations.

EXCOMMUNICATED PERSONS

CAN. 1654

§ 1. Excommunicatis vitandis aut toleratis post sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam permittitur ut per se ipsi agant tantummodo ad impugnandam iustitiam aut legitimitatem ipsius excommunicationis; per procuratorem, ad aliud quodvis animae suae praeiudicium avertendum; in reliquis ab agendo repelluntur.

§ 2. Alii excommunicati generatim stare in iudicio queunt.

Those who are under a sentence, either declaratory or condemnatory, of excommunication, either as vitandi or tolerati, are allowed to appear as plaintiffs in ecclesiastical trials only in case they wish to plead against the justice or legitimacy (validity) of the sentence of excommunication, and in this case they may defend themselves. But 17 Cfr. Vol. III, p. 273 of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if they wish to ward off spiritual injury or damage, they should act by proxy. If they are called into court in some other case, they must of course obey.[18]

All other persons, even though excommunicated, are admitted as plaintiffs. From this it would follow that non-Catholics are not excluded from ecclesiastical courts, as long as no declaratory sentence has been pronounced against them. (De facto they are excommunicated; can. 2314).

18 Cfr. c. 7, X, II, 1; c. 2, 14, 6°, V, 11; a spiritual damage would be a marriage case or danger of spiritual ruin; Wernz, Vol. V, n. 168.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELS (ADVOCATES)

The difference between attorneys and counsels is explained by the commentators on Book I, tit. 38, de procuratoribus.[1] But much of what they say can hardly be applied to-day. We may say, broadly, that an attorney acts ex officio, while a counsel acts at random or upon the demand of the client. We did not get much enlightenment from perusing the English terminology,[2] in order to establish an adequate distinction between barristers, attorneys, advocates, and proctors. In the last analysis all these terms signify persons who plead the cause of others.

Our Code lays down certain conditions for a procurator which are not applicable to a counsel (see 1656, § 2). The procurator has limited power, whereas the counsel is not limited by established restrictions. Apart from this, as the Code itself admits, the distinction is but slight

CHOICE OF ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELS

CAN. 1655

§ 1. In iudicio criminali reus aut a se electum aut a iudice datum semper habere debet advocatum.

§ 2. Etiam in iudicio contentioso, si agatur de minoribus aut de iudicio in quo bonum publicum vertitur, iudex parti carenti defensorem ex officio at-

1 Cfr. Reiffenstüel, I, 38, nn. 7 ff.
2 Cfr. Stimson's Law Dictionary, s. v.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tribuat, aut, si casus ferat, parti etiam habenti alium adiungat.

§ 3. Praeter hos casus pars libere potest advocatum et procuratorem constituere, sed potest quoque in iudicio per se ipsa agere et respondere, nisi iudex procuratoris vel advocati ministerium necessarium existimaverit.

§ 4. At Episcopus, si quando in causa est, aliquem constituat, qui eius personam, procuratorio nomine, gerat.

CAN. 1656

§ 1. Unicum quisque potest eligere procuratorem, qui nequit alium sibimet substituere, nisi expressa facultas eidem facta fuerit.

§ 2. Quod si, iusta causa suadente, plures ab eodem deputentur, hi ita constituantur, ut detur inter ipsos locus praeventioni.

§ 3. Advocati autem plures simul constitui queunt.

§ 4. Utrumque munus, procuratoris et advocati, etiam in eadem causa et pro eodem cliente eadem persona exercere potest.

In criminal cases the defendant must choose a counsel, or at least accept one appointed by the judge. This is now the rule,[3] though it appears to have been discountenanced by the Decretals,[4] which, perhaps owing to a confusion of the counsel with the proctor, rather deny that right or duty.

The appointment of a counsel may be made even against the will of the defendant ("semper debet habere.")

In civil cases also a defensor (the same as counsel or 3 S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 30 f. (Coll. P. F., n. 1534).

4 C. 1, 6°, I, 19; Santi-Leitner, II, 1, n. 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

advocatus) must be appointed by the judge for minors or in cases concerning the public welfare, if the parties have no counsel. Besides, if a counsel or lawyer chosen by the parties, or by the civil authorities, proves undesirable or lacks the necessary qualities, as described in can. 1657, the judge may appoint another counsel. This appointment, in all the cases mentioned, is ex officio, i.e., the judge is in duty bound to make it.

With the exception of these cases, then (viz.: criminal cases, civil cases of minors or public interest, and of counsels not acceptable) it is left to the parties to the trial either to choose a counsel or defend their own case, unless the judge deems it necessary that a proctor or counsel should be chosen, as in case the defendant has not the necessary knowledge of legal procedure or the qualities of equipoise and calmness necessary to defend his case effectively. Besides, it may also be that the person himself does not care to be dragged into court, or that his or her state of life does not permit him or her to leave home.[5]

If the bishop is a party to a case, he should designate a proctor or attorney to act in his name. This rule was made to protect the episcopal dignity and to save bishops the trouble of leaving their pastoral occupations.[6]

Can. 1656 rules that only one attorney or procurator may be chosen by each party. This one cannot be substituted by another, unless he has obtained special permission to that effect. One reason for this ruling lies in the certainty required.[7] We believe another reason is that the procurator is chosen de industria personae, i.e., on account of personal fitness, which may not be found in the substitute.

5 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, 6°, II, 1; Messmer, l. c., p. 74.

6 Trid., Sess. 13, c. 6, de ref.

7 C. 1, 6°, I, 19; Reiffenstuel, I, 38, n. 56.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If several proctors are chosen, which can be done only for good reasons, these must be appointed to act in solidum, i.e., the one who first takes hold of the cast must bring it to a finish.[8]

Counsels or lawyers are not limited as to number, and the parties to a trial may therefore choose several without restriction,

The office of proctor and counsel may be held by one and the same person, who may act in the same case and for the same client. In this case the limit as to number would certainly cease to be effective.

QUALITIES AND CONDITIONS OF ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELS

CAN. 1657

§ 1. Procurator et advocatus esse debent catholici, aetate maiores, bonae famae; acatholicus non admittitur, nisi per exceptionem et ex necessitate.

§ 2. Advocatus debet praeterea esse doctor vel alioqui vere peritus, saltem in iure canonico.

§ 3. Religiosus admitti potest, nisi aliud in constitutionibus caveatur, in causis tantum in quibus vertitur utilitas suae religionis, de licentia tamen Superioris.

CAN. 1658

§ 1. Quilibet pro lubitu a parte potest eligi et deputari procurator, dummodo secundum praecedentem canonem idoneus sit, quin opus sit ut Ordinarii approbatio antecesserit.

§ 2. Advocatus autem, ut ad patrocinium admittatur, indiget approbatione Ordinarii, quae aut generalis sit ad omnes causas aut specialis pro certa causa.

8 Reiffenstuel, l. c., n. 24.

Digitized by Google · Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. In iudicio coram Sanctae Sedis delegato, ipsius delegati est approbare et admittere advocatum, quo pars uti se velle ostenderit.

§ 4. Procurator et advocatus, in causis quae ad normam can. 1579, §§ 1, 2 aguntur in religionis tribunali, eligendi sunt ex eadem religione et ante patrocinii susceptionem approbandi ab eo, qui partes iudicis in causa agit; in causis vero quae ad normam eiusdem canonis § 3 apud tribunal Ordinarii loci pertractantur, admitti potest etiam religioni extraneus.

Attorneys and counsels must be Catholics; they must have completed the legal age of twenty-one years, and be of good moral standing. Non-Catholics are admitted only by way of exception and in cases of necessity.[9]

The text has a general bearing and requires only three qualities: religion, age, and reputation. Hence laymen and women are not excluded. The Roman law permitted women to act for their parents when sickness or age prevented them.[10] The third qualification would seem to exclude excommunicated and infamous persons.[11] However, since heretics are excommunicated, and are nevertheless admitted in cases of necessity, a rigid exclusion of censured persons can hardly be maintained. In cases of necessity, which should at the same time be exceptional, non-Catholics may act as attorneys or counsels for the defence. An able lawyer of a non-Catholic denomination may be more successful in defending a case; we could give instances of this.

[9] This canon may also be applied to cases of appeal, for instance, of parishioners who have recourse from the bishop's decree concerning boundary lines to the Apostolic Delegate; the latter should not be more lenient than the law prescribes for courts, especially if Catholic lawyers or attorneys are available.

[10] L. 41, Dig. 3, 3; but the mother was not allowed to act as defender of her orphan son; l. 18, Cod. II, 12.

[11] C. 7, X, II, 1; cc. 1, 2, C. 3, q. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Since juridical knowledge is also required, and the Code demands that counsel for defence be a doctor of canon law, or at least an expert in that science, it is evident that if this quality were wanting in a Catholic lawyer, but found in a non-Catholic lawyer, the case of necessity would be verified. The same rule may be proportionately applied to Freemasons, who belong to a condemned sect.

Religious may be admitted as attorneys and counsels to defend their own institute with the permission of their superiors and constitutions. If a religious has the same case to defend, according to can. 1652, he can be chosen procurator or counsel by the litigant religious; otherwise he needs the permission of his superior either for appointing, or being appointed as, or for acting as a substitute for, a procurator.[12]

Provided one has the qualities described in can. 1657, he may be chosen and appointed procurator without the formal approbation of the Ordinary. But in order to be chosen and admitted as counsel for the defence he must be approved by the Ordinary, who may grant that license once for all, i.e., for all cases, or for a special case only.

In trials conducted before a delegate of the Holy See, the delegate himself is entitled to approve and admit the counsel desired by the defendant.

For trials which, according to can. 1579, § § 1, 2, are conducted exclusively by and for religious, the proctor and counsel for the defence are to be chosen from among the members of the institute in question. Before they assume the defence they must be approved by the judge. In cases to be tried by the local Ordinary, according to § 3, can. 1579, outsiders, i.e., persons who are not members of the same religious institute, may be admitted as procura-

12 C. 3, Clem. I, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tors or counsels, provided they have the qualifications described in can. 1657, § § 1 and 2.

MANDATE OF ATTORNEY AND COUNSEL

CAN. 1659

§ 1. Procurator ne prius a iudice admittatur quam speciale mandatum ad lites scriptum, etiam in calce ipsius citationis, mandantis subscriptione munitum, et locum, diem, mensem et annum referens, apud tribunal deposuerit.

§ 2. Quod si mandans scribere nesciat, hoc ipsum ex scriptura constet necesse est, et parochus vel notarius Curiae vel duo testes, loco mandantis, mandatum subsignent.

CAN. 1660

Mandatum procurationis asservari debet in actis causae.

CAN. 1661

Advocatus, ut causae patrocinium suscipiat, habeat necesse est a parte vel a iudice commissionem ad instar mandati procuratorii, de qua in actis constare debet.

CAN. 1662

Nisi speciale mandatum habuerit, procurator non potest renuntiare actioni, instantiae vel actis iudicialibus, nec transigere, pacisci, compromittere in arbitros, deferre aut referre iusiurandum, et generatim ea agere pro quibus ius requirit mandatum speciale.

A proctor needs a special written commission, which is called mandatum ad lites. Before he has deposited this mandate with the tribunal, he cannot be admitted by the judge. The mandate must be signed by the mandans and note thereof must be made at the bottom of the official summons, from which fact it may be inferred that the mandate must be issued by the mandans before the summons, because after that proceeding the case has taken a legal turn (res non amplius integra).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The mandate must mention the place where, and the day, month and year when it was issued. If the mandans is unable to write, this fact must be noted, and the pastor or notary public of the ecclesiastical court or two witnesses must sign the mandate in his stead. The document by which a special mandate is issued to a proctor must be placed among the judicial acts of the trial.

A special mandate is required for all cases, for the text is general and therefore no cases or persons are excepted.[13] This is a very appropriate measure, because if no special mandate were necessary, there might be uncertainty as to the power of the mandatory and a loophole left for the party to attack the sentence by pleading incompetency of the proctor. Hence this special mandate, although given ad lites, and perhaps for all cases of a judiciary character, must define in clear terms the power of the proctor and its extent.

This special mandate ad lites differs from the one mentioned in can. 1662, which is also called a special mandate, but not included in the one named in can. 1659, unless expressly so determined and set down in writing. This special mandate concerns: foregoing actions, instances, and judicial acts; it may also concern transactions, agreements, compromises on arbiters, giving and requiring the oath of the other party,—all acts for which a special mandate is necessary.

13 The commentators allowed exceptions for relatives and co-litigants; Reiffenstuel, I, 38, n. 80 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The counsel, too, must have a commission, similar to the procuratorial mandate, either from the parties or from the judge, before he can take up the defence; and the judicial acts must take note of this commission.

REMOVAL OF ATTORNEY AND COUNSEL

CAN. 1663

Tum procurator tum advocatus possunt a iudice, dato decreto, repelli sive ex officio sive ad instantiam partis, iusta tamen de causa.

CAN. 1664

§ 1. Advocati et procuratores possunt ab eo a quo constituti sunt, removeri, salva obligatione solvendi honoraria ipsis debita; verum ut remotio effectum sortiatur, necesse est ut ipsis intimetur, et, si lis iam contestata fuerit, iudex et adversa pars certiores facti sint de remotione.

§ 2. Lata definitiva sententia, ius et officium appellandi, si mandans non renuat, procuratori manet.

CAN. 1665

§ 1. Vetatur uterque emere litem, aut sibi de immodico emolumento vel rei litigiosae parte vindicata pacisci.

§2. Quae si fecerint, nulla est pactio, et a iudice vel ab Ordinario poterunt poena pecuniaria mulctari; advocatus praeterea tum ab officio suspendi, tum etiam, si recidivus sit, destitui et titulo privari.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1666

Advocati ac procuratores qui ob dona aut pollicitationes aut quamlibet aliam rationem suum officium prodiderint, ab officio repellantur, et, praeter damnorum refectionem, mulcta pecuniaria aliisve congruis poenis plectantur.

The attorney as well as the counsel for the defence may be rejected by the judge, who in that case must issue a corresponding decree, either ex officio or upon demand of the party.

However, a just cause is required for such action. Such a cause would be the fact of relationship or suspicion of conspiracy or inability discovered later.

The counsel as well as the procurator may be discharged by those who appointed them, provided, of course, their salaries have been paid or guaranteed. Besides, since a mandate was given, the revocation must be intimated to the proctor or counsel and also to the judge and the other party, after the litis contestatio. After this stage it is generally supposed that a just reason is required for revocation because of the expenses already incurred and of the good name of the attorney and counsel.[14] No reason, however, is required if the party who has appointed a proctor or counsel dies before the case has taken a legal turn, i.e., before the judicial summons have been issued.

After the definitive or final sentence the attorney is entitled and obliged to appeal the case if his client does not object.

Attorney as well as counsel are forbidden to buy the case or to make an agreement as to large profit or part of the disputed object. Every such agreement is null and 14 Reiffenstuel, I, 38, n. 136.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

void, and the transgressor may, besides, be fined by the judge or Ordinary; the counsel may be suspended and, in case of relapse, be removed and deprived of his title.

Counsels or attorneys who allow themselves to be bribed by gifts or promises, or in any other way, thus betraying their trust, must be removed, condemned to repair the damage done, and fined by the court.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE V.

ACTIONS AND EXCEPTIONS

IN GENERAL

CAN. 1667

Quodlibet ius non solum actione munitur, nisi aliud expresse cautum sit, sed etiam exceptione, quae semper competit et est suapte natura perpetua.

CAN. 1668

§ 1. Qui ad rem sibi vindicandam, seu ad ius suum in iudicio persequendum titulo agit iuris auctoritate subnixo, actione dimicat quae petitoria dicitur.

§ 2. Si vero rei possessionem vel iuris quasi-possessionem postulat, eius actio possessoria vocatur.

CAN. 1669

§ 1. Actor pluribus simul actionibus, quae tamen secum ipsae non confligant, sive de eadem re, sive de diversis, reum convenire potest, si aditi tribunalis competentiam non egrediantur.

§ 2. Reus non prohibetur pluribus exceptionibus etiam contrariis uti.

CAN. 1670

§ 1. Actor potest una instantia cumulare actiones possessorias et petitorias, nisi spolii exceptio ex adverso opponatur.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Pariter fas est reo convento in petitorio, actorem reconvenire in possessorio; et viceversa, nisi res sit de spolio.

CAN. 1671

§ 1. Item fas est actori, antequam conclusum fuerit in causa, ab instituto iudicio petitorio regredi ad possessorium adipiscendae vel recuperandae.

§ 2. Imo ex iusta causa iudex etiam post conclusionem in causa, sed ante sententiam definitivam, hunc regressum permittere potest.

§ 3. Iudicis est, attentis partium allegationibus, aut utramque quaestionem unica sententia definire, aut prius uni, postea alteri satisfacere, prouti magis expedire ipsi videatur ad celeriorem et pleniorem iurium tuitionem.

What the Code sets forth in this title really forms part of the legal proceedings, because, according to the structure of the Roman trial, the actio as well as the exceptio were brought after the summons. However, they are appropriately treated here because they are remedies granted by law to redress grievances or injuries, and to reply to these by the defendant. For every right may be supported and sustained, not only by an action, but also by an exception, unless the law expressly forbids the latter.

Actio signifies the cause or legal demand of a right, either corporeal or incorporeal, spiritual or temporal. In Roman law it meant a certain prescribed form of words derived directly from the law upon which the claim was founded. To this form it was necessary to adhere strictly. The parties having appeared before the praetor, the plaintiff stated his claim (intentio) and asked leave to bring the suit into court (actionem postulabat). The defendant then either denied his liability or put in a plea in law (exceptio).[1] Such an exception or counter-charge is also admitted in ecclesiastical courts. It is always within the right of the defendant to put in this plea, which is by its very nature perpetual. Thus although prescription may eliminate penal action in criminal cases, yet the right of exception always remains intact ("temporalia ad agendum, perpetua sunt ad excipiendum").[2] This also holds good concerning possessory claims, as shall be seen under can. 1698.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There are two actions, especially in civil cases, which are here taken over from former law sources:[3] the one by which the plaintiff seeks to vindicate a thing in court or a right founded, as he believes, on the authority of law. This action is called petitory (actio petitoria). The other by which the plaintiff claims possession or quasi-possession of a thing (actio possessoria). For in every complete title to an object of right, either movable or immovable, two things are necessary: the possession or seisin, and the right or property, which in terms of old English law was called iuris et seisinae coniunctio.[4]

Possession or seisin may be severed from property, although in common parlance the two terms are used promiscuously. Possession is the retention of an object in which bodily and mental occupation concur with the law ("rei detentio corporis, animi, iuris adminiculo suffulta"). Ius here is taken, not in the subjective sense, to designate the moral faculty of holding a thing, but rather in the objective sense, to designate the law which 1 Cfr. Ramsay-Lanciani, Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 32 ff.; the five legis actiones were: sacramento, per judicis postulationem, per convictionem, per manus iniectionem, per pignoris captionem; later these were superseded to a great extent by the formula petitoria and by sponsio.

2 S. C. EE. et RR., March 8, 1898 (Coll. P. F., n. 1992).

3 See X, II, 12.

4 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., III, 176.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

protects the possessor.[5] Of course, where there is no title at all, either at the beginning or in the course of occupation, the ecclesiastical law (differing here from the Roman law) never defends possession, but the auctoritas iuris ceases.

The term quasi-possession in our Code indicates rights which are not properly possessed, but are incorporeal, for instance, the right of election. However, even in this case a visible or manifest assertion is required, as the text in the Decretals clearly proves.[6] Hence also in holding an immaterial right, a tangible proof or fact is necessary, and therefore the definition given above is to the point.

Property is a right to some thing, especially a corporeal object, by which the holder is empowered to dispose of it at his pleasure, to the exclusion of others. Property differs from possession in more than one way. Possession means the right of retaining a thing, whereas property is the title by which one vindicates something as his own. Again, property may be acquired by merely mental action, whereas possession requires actual holding, etc., etc.[7]

It is evident that the causa proprietatis is more important, but also more difficult to prove, than the causa possessionis, which, even though called momentary or transient, is more palpable.

If a plaintiff thinks he has several cases, either concerning the same object or different objects, he may bring them to court together, provided, of course, the respective tribunal is competent in all and there is no conflict between the different claims. On the other hand, the

5 Santi-Leitner, II, 12, n. 2.

6 C. 3, X, II, 12; the lower clergy of Sutri (in Italy) claimed the right of voting at the election of the bishop, and had exercised this right at the election of three bishops, — which was a manifestation of the title involved and was acknowledged by the pope; see c. 16, X, II, 2.

7 Reiffenstuel, II, 12, n. 30 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

defendant is allowed to put in a counterplea to all the cases brought against him. Thus an advowee may bring suit for the right of presentation and the support he thinks he is entitled to, if he was disturbed in his possession. The mere fact of such a suit could be taken cognizance of by a lay judge, but the ius patronatus or the right of property cannot be decided by the lay judge, who therefore lacks competency.[8]

The plaintiff may bring a possessory and a petitory claim at the same time and before the same judge. On the other hand, the defendant is allowed to oppose to the petitory claim of the plaintiff his counterclaim of possession, and conversely. This is called bulking, or cumulatio causae possessionis cum causa proprietatis. For instance, a pastor who has been removed for some reason, claims salary due him. To obtain full justice he may assert that he is still the lawful pastor and in possession of the parish, although removed. The petitory claim is the title to the pastorship, the possessory claim, the actual holding of the parish. His rival may be able to prove that N. is not the pastor, or that N. has never held the legal title. These two conflicting claims may be settled at the same trial. Nor is it useless to bulk both claims, because the question may thus be more speedily settled. Besides, there is question of restitution. For the plaintiff may be victorious as to the petitory claim, but not as to the possessory claim, and in that case the revenues are due to him from the time when the petitory claim was settled, but not for the previous period.[9]

Bulking is not permitted in cases of disseisin (causae spolii) because these require the return of the object vio-

8 Cc. 2, 3, X, II, 1; Santi-Leitner, II, 12, n. 12.

9 Cc. 2, 3, 4, X, II, 12; c. 1, X, II, 13; Santi-Leitner, II, 12, n. 13 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lently seized to the original possessor, or at least that it be put in a safe place.

The law also allows the plaintiff to change the sequence of his claims. Thus if he brought the petitory cause or claim to property first, he may waive it for a time and have the possessory right settled first. However, this may concern only the right of obtaining or regaining possession, but not of retaining it, because he who claims possession in law, is not supposed to be in possession. Besides, this change is allowed only before the conclusio causae, i.e., before all the proofs and depositions are given and the parties have renounced the right to produce additional evidence.[10]

The judge himself may, for a just reason, permit this change before the final sentence. Such a reason may be the quicker settlement of the disputed case and the saving of expense.

The judge may also decide a twofold controversy involving petitory and possessory claims by one sentence, if the allegations were such as to comprehend the whole case. Or he may first decide one claim and then the other, if he regards such action as conducive to the quicker and better defence of the rights at issue.

The Code now proceeds to consider various actions, or rather remedies of law and counterpleas, which must be settled before the final or definitive sentence can be rendered, and which tend to secure a full adjustment as well as security from damages and injuries while the case is pending.

10 Cfr. c. 36, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

SEQUESTRATION AND INHIBITION

CAN. 1672

§ 1. Qui ostenderit super aliqua re ab alio detenta ius se habere sibique damnum imminere nisi res ipsa custodienda tradatur, ius habet obtinendi a iudice eiusdem rei sequestrationem.

§ 2. In similibus rerum adiunctis obtinere potest ut iuris exercitium alicui inhibeatur.

§ 3. Sequestratio rei et inhibitio exercitii iuris a iudice decerni potest ex officio, instante praesertim promotore iustitiae aut defensore vinculi, quoties bonum publicum id postulare videatur.

CAN. 1673

§ 1. Ad crediti quoque securitatem sequestratio rei admittitur, dummodo de creditoris iure liquido constet et servata norma de qua in can. 1923, § 1.

§ 2. Sequestratio extenditur etiam ad res debitoris quae depositi causa aut quolibet alio titulo apud alias personas reperiantur.

CAN. 1674

Sequestratio rei et suspensio exercitii iuris decerni nullatenus possunt, si damnum quod timetur, possit aliter reparari et idonea cautio de eo reparando offeratur.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1675

§ 1. Ad custodiam rei sequestrationi subiectae idonea persona, proponentibus partibus, a iudice designetur, quae sequester dicitur; si partes inter se dissentiant, iudex ex officio sequestrem deligat.

§ 2. Sequester in re custodienda, curanda et servanda non minorem diligentiam adhibere debet quam suis adhibet rebus, eamque postea, cui iudex decreverit, reddere tenetur cum omni causa.

§ 3. Iudex congruam decernat mercedem sequestri, si eam petat.

A plaintiff, under the Roman law,[1] sometimes requested the praetor to issue an interdictum or summary order to secure his rights by preventing anything from being done to deteriorate or injure the object claimed. This, in ecclesiastical language, is termed sequestration. It is a writ issued by the judge to take a disputed object held by any one, whether the plaintiff or the defendant, and place it in the custody of a third party, called sequester, in order to prevent the object from being damaged.

A kind of sequestration is that of the exercise of rights otherwise acknowledged; this is called inhibition. Thus a beneficiary may be commanded by the ecclesiastical judge to suspend the exercise of his rights; a husband, the validity of whose marriage is disputed in court, may be commanded to let the wife go to a place of security, or a bride claimed by two rivals may be told to go to a convent, until the question is settled.

Sequestration and inhibition (or injunction) may be decreed by the judge ex officio whenever the public welfare is at stake and the promoter or defender demand it. It may also be decreed in case a creditor has a clear and proved title to the thing which requires security. And in that case all the things which the debtor has in his custody as a deposit or pawn, or under another claim, may be sequestered.

1 Cfr. Ramsay-Lanciani, l. c., p. 327; in English law it means taking property of the defendant in contempt; Blackstone-Cooley, III, 444.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But neither sequestration nor inhibition may be decreed if the danger of damage can be warded off otherwise and bail is given to cover possible deterioration or damage.

The sequester may be proposed either by the parties to the suit or by the judge if the parties cannot agree upon a fit person. The sequester must take care of the things entrusted to him as he would of his own belongings, i.e., he must bestow ordinary (not extraordinary) care on them and in the end restore them to those to whom the judge awards them. The judge shall decide, at the request of the sequester, what recompense is due him for his trouble.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

NOVI OPERIS NUNTIATIO AND DAMNUM INFECTUM

CAN. 1676

§ 1. Qui ex aliquo novo opere damnum timet suae rei obventurum, potest illud iudici nuntiare ut opus interrumpatur, donec utriusque partis iura, iudicis sententia, definiantur.

§ 2. Is cui intimata fuerit prohibitio, continuo ab opere cessare debet, sed, dummodo idonee caveat se in pristinum omnia restituturum si absoluto iudicio victus discesserit, poterit a iudice continuationem eiusdem impetrare.

§ 3. Nuntianti novum opus ad ius suum demonstrandum duo menses praefiniuntur; qui ex iusta et necessaria causa a iudice, audita altera parte, prorogari vel reduci poterunt.

CAN. 1677

Si vetus opus magna ex parte immutetur, idem ius esto quod de novo opere can. 1676 constitutum est.

CAN. 1678

Qui grave damnum rei suae imminere pertimescit ex alieno aedificio quod ruinam minatur, ex arbore aut ex alia re quacunque, actionem habet de damno infecto ad obtinendam periculi remotionem, aut cautionem de damno vel avertendo, vel compensando, si forte evenerit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Under the Roman law a citizen was obliged to give notice of a new structure to the prefect of the city, who could command it to be discontinued for good reasons. This law, says a Decretal, was initiated or adopted by the Church.[1] Hence anyone who fears that a new structure may be prejudicial to his interests, either material or spiritual (for instance, because it damages his property or curtails his jurisdictional rights or revenues), may denounce the same to the ecclesiastical judge and demand a decree ordering the work to be discontinued until the claims of both parties can be adjusted by a judicial sentence.

The one who receives notice of such a prohibitory decree must desist from the work begun. However, he may ask to continue on condition that he give bail and restore everything to the status quo if he should lose the trial.

The one who objects to a new structure has two months to prove his claim; but this term may, at the demand of the other party, be either prolonged or shortened by the judge. The same rule applies to substantial changes in an old structure.[2]

Those who are afraid that a decaying edifice may cause them damage, may institute an action de damno infecto, in order to have the danger removed or to obtain security against possible damage. This strictly belongs to the competency of the civil court.

1 Cfr. cc. 1, 2, X, V, 32.
2 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 21, 1838.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

ACTIONS OF "NULLITAS ACTORUM"

CAN. 1679

Si actus aut contractus sit ipso iure nullus, datur ei, cuius interest, actio ad obtinendam a iudice declarationem nullitatis.

CAN. 1680

§ 1. Nullitas actus tunc tantum habetur, cum in eo deficiunt quae actum ipsum essentialiter constituunt, aut sollemnia seu conditiones desiderantur a sacris canonibus requisitae sub poena nullitatis.

§ 2. Nullitas alicuius actus non importat nullitatem actorum qui praecedunt aut subsequuntur et ab actu non dependent.

CAN. 1681

Qui actum posuit nullitatis vitio infectum, tenetur de damnis et expensis erga partem laesam.

CAN. 1682

Nullitas actus a iudice declarari non potest ex officio, nisi aut publice id intersit, aut agatur de pauperibus vel de minoribus aliisve qui minorum iure censentur.

CAN. 1683

Iudex inferior de confirmatione, a Romano Pontifice actui vel instrumento adiecta, videre non potest, nisi Apostolicae Sedis praecesserit mandatum.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

An act is called null and void if its essential constituents, or any of the formalities or requisites prescribed by law under penalty of nullity, are wanting. Thus ordination performed under physical compulsion is null and void.[1] A marriage contracted under the influence of grave fear (can. 1088) is null and void. A religious profession made under similar circumstances is invalid.[2] In marriage the solemnities or conditions are manifest, because a marriage contracted without the prescribed form is null and void.[3] A division of parishes is void if made without canonical reason.[4]

However, from the fact that an act is null and void, it by no means follows that the preceding or following acts are also null and void, unless indeed they depend upon the void act itself. Thus in contracts, whatever depends on the agreement itself, must necessarily be tainted with the defects inherent therein. Independent acts, as also records and minutes, are valid if not essentially connected with the invalid act. For instance, borrowing money in view of a division of a parish would not be invalid, because not necessarily connected with the act of division.

If one of the interested parties (not a third person) wishes to bring suit against an act he considers null, he may ask the judge to declare it null and void. Take the example of a religious profession which is claimed to be null and void on account of fear. In that case the judge would have to demand proofs; for a mere assertion cannot be accepted before the law.

Under can. 1682, the judge cannot ex officio declare the nullity of an act, unless the public welfare is at stake,

1 Can. 103, § 1.
2 Can. 572.
3 Can. 1096 f.
4 Can. 1428.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and in case of minors. The public welfare is generally at stake in matrimonial cases, because marriage is a requisite of public order. The same is true of ordinations.

The judge may proceed ex officio in case of minors because these are under the special tutelage of the Church. Therefore, those who have not yet completed the age of twenty-one, as well as all ecclesiastical corporations and noncorporate entities,[5] enjoy the benefit of this law.

No judge who has common sense and a conscience will pronounce an act null, unless he has good reasons for doing so, for can. 1681 rules that he who acts invalidly is bound to indemnify the party injured by his invalid act.

It may be useful[6] to add that an act performed with deliberation (i.e., every human act), must be considered valid until the contrary is proved or is at least notorious. The nullity of an act can be easily proved if a substantial formality has been omitted, or if the act contravenes a prohibitory statute or law, or if it exceeds the limits of a faculty or mandate, or the wording of a rescript. Otherwise an act, even if doubtful, must be regarded as valid.

If the judge is not acting in the capacity of ordinary or independent judge, but as delegate or inferior judge, the rule holds: "Actus regulariter tribuitur ordinanti, non exequenti." This applies especially if the Roman Pontiff confirms an act or a document. The act of confirmation may concern an act of the judge (for instance, his sentence), a privilege, a contract (for instance, alienation), a statute or decree of appointment. If an inferior judge receives such a ratification from the Pope or from one of the S. Congregations or Tribunals, he must take cognizance of it, because the order of jurisdiction de-

[5] Can. 100, § 3.
[6] Cfr. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Axioma 13, s.v. "Actus"; cfr. can. 1625, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google mands that the authority of the inferior be silent when the superior places an act under his special protection. Hence the clause is sometimes added in rescripts: "sublata cuilibet aliter iudicandi atque interpretandi facultate." Yet, since the Roman Pontiff does not claim infallibility in matters of an individual nature and of a judiciary character, and since fraud may have been committed by the petitioner, a means is needed to recognize even apostolic letters. This is expressed in our text, can. 1683 as follows: "nisi Apostolicae Sedis praecesserit mandatum." It means that the judge, if he has a strong suspicion of fraud, can demand the aperitio oris, in order to be enabled to take cognizance of the facts and the proofs which elicited the confirmation. Thus are safeguarded on the one side the authority of the supreme judge and, on the other, the administration of justice.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

RESCISSORY ACTIONS AND RESTITUTION IN INTEGRUM

These are two actions, of which one is called ordinary, the other extraordinary, because the latter supposes, as it were, that all ordinary means for obtaining redress have been exhausted. Hence it is granted (can. 1687) only when ordinary means prove insufficient.

RESCISSORY ACTION

CAN. 1684

§ 1. Si quis motus metu gravi iniuste incusso, vel dolo circumventus actum posuerit vel contractum inierit qui ipso iure non sit nullus, poterit, metu vel dolo probato, obtinere actus vel contractus rescissionem actione quae vocatur rescissoria.

§ 2. Eadem actione intra biennium uti potest, qui gravem ex contractu laesionem ultra dimidium ex errore passus est.

CAN. 1685

Īnstitui haec actio potest:

1.° Contra eum qui metum intulit aut dolum patravit, quamvis ipse non in suum, sed in alterius commodum talia peregerit;

2.° Contra quemlibet malae fidei et etiam bonae fidei possessorem, qui res metu vel dolo extortas possidet, salvo iure regressus contra quemlibet usque ad ipsum metus vel doli auctorem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1686

Si is qui metum intulit aut dolum patravit, urgeat actus vel contractus exsecutionem, parti laesae seu deceptae competit exceptio metus vel doli.

Broadly speaking, a rescissory action is one brought to avoid an obligation or deed which follows an act or contract. Here the term is specially applied to an action based on fear or deceit (metus vel dolus). Canon 1684 says that one who acted under the influence of grave fear, unjustly inflicted, or who was deceived, is entitled to demand nullification of the act thus committed or the contract made. In order to understand this law it must be remembered that even grave fear does not render an act simply involuntary, but only secundum quid, unless the law makes a special exception, as, for instance, in favor of freedom of religious profession and marriage.[1] The conditions of fear have been explained elsewhere.[2] But a judge cannot proceed unless he has proofs as to the existence and degree of fear,— which proofs, as stated more than once, must be solid.

This actio ex metu vel dolo is also at the disposal of one who has by mistake sustained a loss of more than half of what was stipulated in a contract. In that case what is required is rather restitutio in integrum. However, the legislator appears to compare error to dolus, and, besides, the time is here split into half, so that this action may be brought within two years from the date when one obtained knowledge of the damage sustained.

Rescissory action may be brought, not only against the one who has threatened fear or committed deceit, but also against the one in whose behalf the threat was made. Be-

1 See can. 103, §2; can. 572; can. 1087.

2 Cfr. this Commentary, Vol. II, p. 29 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sides, it may be brought against any one who acted in bad faith or who, though in good faith, retains goods extorted by fear or deceit. However a possessor bonae fidei is entitled to retort the action upon the one who exercised the fear or deceit. Finally, if he who inspired fear or employed deceit should insist upon fulfillment of the contract or execution of the deed, the party who has been injured is entitled to put in a counterplea of fear or deceit (exceptio metus vel doli).

RESTITUTION IN INTEGRUM

CAN. 1687

§ 1. Minoribus vel minorum iure fruentibus graviter laesis eorumque heredibus et successoribus, ad laesionem reparandam ex negotio seu actu valido rescindibili, praeter alia ordinaria remedia, suppetit remedium extraordinarium restitutionis in integrum.

§ 2. Hoc beneficium maioribus quoque conceditur quos deficit rescissoria actio aut aliud ordinarium remedium, dummodo iustam subesse causam et laesionem sibi imputandam non esse probaverint.

CAN. 1688

§ 1. Restitutio in integrum peti debet ab ordinario iudice, qui competens est respectu illius, contra quem petitur, intra quadriennium ab adepta maioritate computandum, si agatur de minoribus, a die laesionis factae et cessati impedimenti, si de maioribus aut personis moralibus.

§ 2. Minoribus vel minorum iure fruentibus restitutio concedi potest a iudice etiam ex officio, audito vel instante promotore iustitiae.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1687–1689

Restitutio in integrum id efficit ut omnia revocentur in pristinum, idest restituantur in statum quo erant ante laesionem, salvis iuribus quae alii, bona fide, ante petitam restitutionem quaesiverint.

Restitutio in integrum is an extraordinary remedy of the law, by which a party grievously damaged or injured, is restored by the authority of the judge to his original condition (in statum quo ante laesionem).[3] The persons who are principally benefitted by this legal remedy are minors, and those who in law enjoy the privilege of minors, viz., ecclesiastical corporations and non-corporate juridical entities (pious foundations, religious), their heirs and successors.

The object of this remedy is to repair damage sustained by reason of a rescindible deed or act, even though this deed or act may in itself have been valid, and therefore obligatory. This return or restitution to the original condition or status (ante petitam restitutionem) restores all the rights acquired bona fide before the restitution was asked. Alienation furnishes an example. An administrator has alienated a piece of church property by selling it to a layman, who paid the price demanded. The promotor iustitiae or fiscal attorney perceives that the bargain was detrimental to the church or community and asks the ecclesiastical court for a restitutio in integrum. What must be done in that case? The administrator must restore the price paid for the church property and, besides, refund whatever expenses the layman may have incurred for improvements, etc.[4] Whether the layman

[3] Cfr. the commentators on X, I, 41 especially Boekhn and Reiffenstuel.

[4] C. 11, X, III, 13.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

has to restore the profit or interest received from the property after the expenses are repaid, is a controverted question, and therefore in the court of conscience the layman could hardly be held to restitution.

Attention may be drawn to the term: "ante petitam restitutionem." For it is not required that restitution be already granted, because if it was asked for, the bona fides of the possessor could hardly be sustained.

Can. 1688 rules that restitution must be asked from the judge who is competent with regard to the one against whom the injunction is asked, whether he be plaintiff or defendant.

In regard to the time within which the demand for an injunction is to be made, the text distinguishes, because, as stated under can. 1687, § 2, not only minors are granted the benefit of restitution, but also those who cannot avail themselves of rescissory action or other remedies under the law, provided they can prove that they have a just cause and have sustained injury or damage beyond their own responsibility or culpability; for instance, if one was lawfully absent, or detained by hostile forces, or deceived through ignorance.[5] Minors in the proper sense, i.e., those who have not yet completed the twenty-first year, must put in the demand for restitution within four years after they have completed the aforesaid age. This period of four years is here taken in the sense of tempus continuum, reckoning ferial days as well as days of absence, in other words, it runs continually, regardless of any obstacle that may suspend the use of time granted.

Those who are of age and all juridical persons have four years' time to demand an injunction, but this term runs from the moment the injury or damage was done and from the cessation of the impediment that prevented

5 Reiffenstuel, I, 41, n. 50 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

them from demanding restitution. By "dies laesionis factae" must certainly be understood not merely the time when the damage was done, but when it was realized or perceived.[6] This interpretation seems evident from the apposition: "cessati impedimenti," for one cannot realize an obstacle (for instance, absence or detention), if he does not realize or perceive the damage done.

Finally, the Code permits the judge to grant to minors and to those who enjoy the privileges of minors, the benefit of restitution also ex officio, upon the advice or demand of the promotor iustitiae. This may be favorable to religious, who in law are compared to minors; but they cannot be said to belong to those under age. When does the four years' term begin with them? Either at the same time as for those who are of age, or according to the decision of the judge.

[6] Engel I, 41, n. 11.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER V

COUNTER-PLEAS (ACTIONES RECONVENTIONALES)

CAN. 1690

§ 1. Actio quam reus coram eodem iudice in eodem iudicio instituit contra actorem ad submovendam vel minuendam eius petitionem, dicitur reconventio.

§ 2. Reconventio reconventionis non admittitur.

CAN. 1691

Actio reconventionalis locum habere potest in omnibus causis contentiosis, exceptis causis spolii; in criminalibus vero non admittitur, nisi ad normam can. 2218, § 3.

CAN. 1692

Proponenda est iudici coram quo actio principalis instituta est, licet ad unam causam dumtaxat delegato vel alioquin incompetenti, nisi sit absolute incompetens.

An action by which the defendant endeavors to stop, or at least to curtail, the plea or demand of the plaintiff, is called counter-charge or counter-plea if made before the same judge and during the same trial. Such a counter-plea cannot be upset by another counter-plea of the plaintiff; the reason probably is not to prolong the trial unduly.

A counter-plea is permitted only in civil matters, and in these to the whole extent, except in cases of disseissin. In criminal matters a counter-plea is permitted only where mutual injuries are charged, according to can. 2218.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

The counter-plea is to be made before the judge before whom the main suit was brought, even though he may be delegated for one special case only and may not be fully competent, provided, however, he be at least relatively competent, i.e., either by reason of the matter involved, or of the person.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VI

POSSESSORY ACTIONS

CAN. 1693

Qui ad possessionem alicuius rei adipiscendam, vel ad alicuius iuris exercitium obtinendum munitur titulo legitimo, petere potest, ut in rei possessionem vel iuris exercitium immittatur.

CAN. 1694

Non solum possessio, sed etiam simplex detentio praestat, ad normam canonum qui sequuntur, actionem vel exceptionem possessoriam.

CAN. 1695

§ 1. Qui annum integrum in possessione rei vel in quasi-possessione iuris manserit, si molestiam patiatur quominus suam possessionem vel quasi-possessionem retineat, habet actionem retinendae possessionis.

CAN. 1696

§ 1. Etiam qui vi, clam vel precario possidet, actione retinendae possessionis uti potest adversus quemlibet deturbatorem: non autem contra personam a qua ipse rem vi vel clam surripuit aut precario accepit.

§ 2. In causis quae ad bonum publicum spectant, iustitiae promotori ius est opponendi vitium possessionis adversus eum qui vi, clam vel precario possidet.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1697

§ 1. Si inter duos controversia oriatur uter eorum possideat, ille in possessione praeferendus est qui intra annum frequentiores et potiores possessionis actus exercuit.

§ 2. In dubio iudex possessionem pro indiviso utrique parti attribuat.

§ 3. Si rei vel iuris indoles aut contentionum et rixarum periculum non patiantur ut litigantibus pro indiviso possessio interim attribuatur, iudex rem apud sequestrem deponi, aut iuris quasi-possessionem suspendi iubeat usque ad iudicii petitorii exitum.

CAN. 1698

§ 1. Qui vi aut clam quoquo modo a possessione rei vel quasi-possessione iuris deiectus est, adversus quemlibet spolii auctorem vel rei detentorem habet actionem recuperandae possessionis vel de spolio et spolii exceptionem.

§ 2. Haec actio non admittitur praeterlapso anno postquam spolium passus rei notitiam habuit; exceptio, contra, perpetua est.

CAN. 1699

§ 1. Spoliatus adversus spoliantem excipiens et probans spolium, non tenetur respondere, nisi prius fuerit in suam possessionem restitutus.

§ 2. Spoliatus ut in possessionem restitutatur, nil aliud probare debet, nisi spoliationem ipsam.

§ 3. Sed si in restitutione rei vel exercitii iuris aliquod occurrat periculum (ex. gr., saevitiarum, cum vir contra uxorem postulat restitutionem coniugalis consortii), iudex, ad instantiam partis vel promotoris iustitiae, pro diversis personarum causarumve adiunctis decernat aut restitutionem suspendi, aut rem vel personam apud sequestrem custodiri, donec causa petitorio iudicio definiatur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1700

Iudicia possessoria absolvenda sunt, citata dumtaxat adversa parte in iudiciis retinendae vel recuperandae; citatis vero omnibus iis quorum interest, in iudiciis adipiscendae.

Possession, as distinguished from the right of property, is the holding of a thing by the concurrent operation of body, mind, and law. Hence either a real or fictitious [1] apprehension of the thing itself, or at least the aid of a law or statute, is necessary for possession. Possession presupposes a right, i.e., a just cause for possessing. But one may claim possession without reference to the title upon which it is based. It is this that constitutes what is known as actio possessoria.

If an object is claimed by one who is not yet in possession thereof, but thinks he is entitled to it, either by a fictitious or a statutory title, we have what is called actio rei adipiscendae.

Our text appropriately adds: " or to obtain the exercise of certain rights," for instance, that of election or presentation; and this is called quasi-possessio.[2]

In order to justify the act of quasi-possession three things are said to be required: (a) the exercise of the right through certain acts indicative of the same; (b) the 1 Fictitious is the apprehension which by a fiction of law is considered equivalent to real possession, for instance, the delivery of a document or a key.

2 C. 3, X, II, 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

knowledge and forbearance of the superior or those who might otherwise claim that right; (c) the intention of the one who exercises the right to claim it as his own.[3] However, it must be added that it appears unjustifiable to demand an exercise of a right (actus illius iuris) in order to insure the acquisition thereof, for instance, the right of presentation. This demand seems to be based upon a confusion of exercise with prescription. Electors may claim the right of voting by belonging lawfully to a chapter. Therefore the titulus legitimus must be sought in the fictitious or legal title which conveys the right to possession.

But not only the possession, but also the detention of an object or right entitles the detainer to a possessory action or exception. The one who wishes to possess the thing or right he claims, is put into possession, the detainer is detained in its possession. The plaintiff brings suit before the judge to obtain or acquire possession of the thing or right, and the judge issues an interdict or decree which secures possession to the claimant,[4] at least ad interim.

One who is in possession of a thing or right,— for instance, a beneficiary or owner of church property,— may suffer molestation from another. If the holder has been in possession for one full year, he may ask the judge to issue a decree "uti possidetis" or "utrobi" for either immovable or movable property. This writ has the same effect as an actio retinendae possessionis. But it must be brought within one year from the beginning of the disturbance, and against the disturber, so that he may stop the vexation.

3 Reiffenstuel, II, 12, n. 151.

4 There are five interdicti adipiscendae possessionis: interdictum quorum bonorum, interdictum quod legatorum, interdictum possessorium, interdictum sectorium, interdictum Salvianum; Santi-Leitner, II, 12, n.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

An actio retinendae possessionis may also be brought by one who forcibly, stealthily, or precariously (i.e., by begging), possesses a thing against the disturber, but not against the person from whom he has taken the thing in the above-named manner. This privilege was not granted formerly as an action proper, but was allowed in cases of violence or stealthy or beggarly possession. However, the legislator permits this action in order to avoid other acts of violence and fraud; but he also empowers the promotor iustitiae to take exception or oppose the crime of violent, stealthy, or beggarly possession against a possessor, if the public welfare demands such action.

If a controversy arises which of two possessors actually holds possession, that one is to be preferred who has exercised more frequent and conspicuous acts, for instance, of administration, or in acquiring a servitude or right of way.[5] If the judge is still in doubt to whom to adjudge the disputed property, he may grant it to both competitors pro indiviso, i.e., to each one full possession indivisibly. If this is infeasible on account of quarrels or contentions, he may command the litigants to deposit the disputed object with a sequester, and suspend quasi-possession until the petitory cause is settled.

A third action is that of recuperandae, i.e., having the possession or quasi-possession of an object adjudged to the one from whom it was forcibly or stealthily taken. To this corresponds the edictum "unde vi" of the judge against the author of disseissin or detainer of an object. But the latter may also put in a counter-charge of disseissin. The action proper may not be accepted after the lapse of one year, to be reckoned from the moment one has become aware of the disseissin. But the exceptio or counter-plea is perpetual, i.e., exception can be brought

[5] Cc. 3, 9, X, II, 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google against it at any time. The spoliatus or disseissined, who puts in the counter-charge, has only to prove the fact of disseissin and is not obliged to answer any questions until he has been put in possession, and to obtain that he has only to prove the fact of possession.

Sometimes the restitution of possession or quasi-possession may be dangerous. Thus if a woman (supposed wife) or a girl engaged to one man and claimed by another would have to be delivered to the so-called husband or bridegroom there might be danger of maltreatment.[6] In this case the judge shall suspend restitution or decide that the person or object be confided to a sequester until the petitory cause is settled. Thus he may decide that the woman be kept in custody by her relatives, or that the girl claimed by two rivals go to a convent until the claims are definitively adjudged.

Possessory actions which are retinendae and recuperandae must be settled by summoning the adversary, but actions called adipiscendae require that all interested parties be cited, because then more proofs are demanded, and proofs are not so easily adduced.

[6] Cc. 8, 3, X, II, 13; c. 14, X, II, 19; c. 14, X, IV, 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VII

EXTINGUISHMENT OF ACTIONS

CAN. 1701

In contentiosis actiones tum reales tum personales exstinguuntur praescriptione ad normam can. 1508–1512; actiones autem de statu personarum nunquam exstinguuntur.

CAN. 1702

Omnis criminalis actio perimitur morte rei, condonatione legitimae potestatis, et lapsu temporis utilis ad actionem criminalem proponendam.

CAN. 1703

Firmo praescripto can. 1555, § 1 de delictis Sacrae Congregationi S. Officii reservatis, tempus utile ad actionem criminalem proponendam est triennium, nisi agatur:

1.° De actione iniuriarum, quae uno anno perimitur;

2.° De actione ob delicta qualificata contra VI et VII divinum praeceptum, quae quinquennio perimitur;

3.° De actionibus ob simoniam vel homicidium, contra quae actio criminalis decennio perdurat.

CAN. 1704

Sublata per praescriptionem actione criminali:

1.° Non est hoc ipso sublata actio contentiosa, forte ex delicto orta, ad damna sarcienda;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Ordinarius remediis can. 2222, § 2 statutis uti adhuc potest.

CAN. 1701–1705

§ 1. Praescriptio in contentiosis currit ex quo actio primum potuit iure proponi; in criminalibus, a die patrati delicti.

§ 2. Si delictum habeat tractum, ut vocant, successivum, non currit praescriptio, nisi a die qua delicti tractus cessaverit.

§ 3. In delicto habituali vel continuato praescriptio non decurrit nisi post ultimum actum; et conventus ob aliquem criminosum actum non praescriptum, tenetur de antiquioribus, qui cum eodem actu connectuntur, etiamsi singulatim sumpti ob praescriptionem excluderentur.

Real as well as personal actions in civil cases are extinguished by prescription, as set forth under can. 1508–1512. But actions concerning the status of persons are never extinguished. An action is a demand of one's right, and a real action is one inherent in the thing, which it follows everywhere (actio in rem or vindicatio rei). A personal action (actio in personam) is directly aimed at a person by reason either of a contract or a crime. Although an object may be claimed, yet only the person who contracted or perpetrated a crime is responsible.[1] An example is stated in can. 1534 concerning alienation, where real action is permitted in case of an alienation that is null and void by law; and personal action in case of alienation lacking the formalities required by law.

The text adds: "actiones autem de statu personarum

1 Reiffenstuel, II, 3, n. 11 f. The English terminology wavers; see Stimson's Law Dictionary, s. v. "Actio," Action.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nunquam exstinguuntur." The status of men in Roman law[2] was twofold: freedom and slavery. The Canon Law recognized a threefold status: that of virgines, continentes, and conjugati.[3] From this we may surmise that personal status here means walk of life, as we say the clerical state, the lay state, the religious state, the married state. Now, then, an action may always be brought by one living in a state which he has good reason to believe was forced upon him or which he thinks he did not enter in a lawful manner. Thus, for instance, a cleric may bring action to be released from the clerical state and a married man may attack the validity of his marriage. The reason for this is that the state of any person interests not only that person himself, but society as a whole. Hence, too, no transactions are allowed concerning the personal state.[4]

A criminal action is quashed by the death of the culprit, by his condemnation on the part of lawful authority, or by the lapse of an equitable period of time, granted by law for bringing a criminal suit. The time is determined in can. 1703, which says that a criminal suit can be brought within three years. But this rule is liable to some exceptions, namely:

(a) All cases belonging to the Holy Office, and which this S. Congregation takes cognizance of itself or through inferior tribunals, according to can. 1555, § 1.

(b) Actions against iniuriae are prescribed after one year. Iniuriae are offences of a contumelious character against the honor and respect due to one's fellowmen. They may be either verbal or real, i.e., committed by word of mouth or by acts which are offensive, for instance, spitting in one's face or throwing mud. They

2 See Dig. I, 5, de statu hominum.
3 Reiffenstuel, I, 1, n. 149.
4 Wernz, l. c., V, n. 41.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google may also amount to defamation or slander and affect a man's calling [5] or official standing.

(c) Actions arising from qualified crimes against the sixth and seventh commandments of God are quashed after five years.

The Code does not state which delicta of those named are qualificata. In the source [6] from which our text has undoubtedly been taken, peculatus (embezzlement) stands for the seventh commandment and delicta carnis for the sixth. One might be tempted to identify a qualified crime with one that is usually called indictable; yet the decree in question mentions special classes which belong hither: raptus, stuprum per vim illatum, adulterium cum incestu coniunctum, which, it says, require a prescription of twenty years. Hence it may be that these are the qualified crimes, which, according to the Code, require only five years, whilst all other crimes against the two commandments mentioned are actionable only within the space of three years, according to the general rule. This interpretation is certainly acceptable, although it spells a mitigation of the former practice.

(d) Criminal actions based on simony and homicide are not admitted after the lapse of ten years. Note, however, that only criminal actions in the strict sense, i.e., such as directly aim at the punishment of the culprit and the satisfaction due to the public order, cease after the lapse of those various terms.

Civil actions brought in order to obtain indemnity or damages arising from a crime are not subject to prescription (can. 1704); for the main reason for admitting prescription against criminal action is the difficulty of 5 See Kenny, A Selection of Cases Illustrative of the English Law of Tort, 1904, p. 280.

6 S. C. EE. et RR., March 8, 1898 (Coll. P. F., n. 1992).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

properly proving the crime and defending the accused after a long period of time. This difficulty might prove fatal to the public authority if it condemned one not guilty of crime. Besides, criminal action has another object, viz., to repair scandal and to give satisfaction for a violation of the public order. This, too, seems no longer required for the benefit of society after the lapse of a considerable time.[7] The case is different with civil action, which is a more or less private affair depending upon the good pleasure of individuals. Hence one who has suffered from a crime may always bring a damage suit, though not a criminal action, against the criminal. The clergy have other remedies which the Ordinary may employ, as stated in can. 2222, § 2, such as forbidding the reception of higher orders, suspension ex informata conscientia, etc.

A more important question is the starting point from which the term of prescription may be reckoned. Can. 1705 answers this question first as to civil actions, the prescription of which begins to run from the moment the law permits action to be brought. In order to complete what was merely adverted to under can. 1508–1512, something may be added here concerning prescription.[8]

Prescription broadly signifies a legitimate means of acquiring a right or ridding oneself of an obligation by possession during the time and in the manner laid down by law. Here it means particularly the quashing of civil [7] Wernz, l. c., V, n. 768. Note, however, the passage in Kenny-Webb, Outlines of Criminal Law, 1907, p. 382: "Statutes of limitations (prescription) which bar the prosecution for certain crimes under certain circumstances, after specified periods of time have elapsed, have never been applied either in England or in the United States to the crime of murder;" instances are given where crimes were prosecuted after 30 and 35 years.

[8] Cfr. the commentators on lib. II, tit. 26 de praescript.; Slater-Martin, A Manual of Moral Theology, 1908, Vol. I, p. 376 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

action by the opposing term allowed by law. Thus a claim may become void if the creditor allows the term to expire before going to court. Our Code admits prescription according to the laws of different countries, but adds that the canons must be observed. Hence if the civil law should admit prescription in things excluded by the ecclesiastical law, or lay down a shorter time than the law of the Church, the civil law cannot be applied.

This premised, four conditions are necessary to render prescription lawful: prescribable matter, good faith, title, and continued possession.

(a) The matter which cannot be prescribed, according to the law of the Church, is determined by can. 1509.

(b) Good faith (bona fides) is required, because the one who holds a thing must be persuaded that he and none other is the owner thereof.[9] This is the animi possessio which cannot coexist with the conviction that the thing belongs to another. Ecclesiastical law[10] requires this persuasion, not only at the beginning, but as long as the period of prescription lasts.

But what if there is a doubt as to whether one has the right to the object? If this doubt is positive (not a mere scruple) and occurs at the beginning, the possessor has to relinquish the object, or at least investigate whether the other has a better title. If the doubt arises in the course of prescription, regula juris 65 in 6° may be applied: "Melior est conditio possidentis," at least until a counter-plea has been made and adjudged.

What if a prelate or administrator were under the wrong impression that he was allowed to alienate church property without observing the required formalities? In 9 Cfr. c. 2, X, II, 26; Engel, II, 26, n. 13.

10 See cc. 5, 20, X, II, 26.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this case there would be an error in law (error iuris), provided, of course, the law is clear and certain, and prescription would hardly be admissible because ignorance of the law cannot be effectively pleaded, and it is this ignorance of the law that proves hurtful, because who errs in regard to the law is not supposed to be in good faith.[11]

The authors solve another practical case: If a prelate of a church with a chapter is in bad faith concerning property, and nevertheless holds it; is the chapter able to prescribe? The answer is that the mala fides of the prelate, who is the head of the chapter, renders prescription invalid, so that the chapter cannot lawfully prescribe the property thus held.[12]

This principle is similar to that applied to heirs or successors in property held in bad faith by their predecessors; according to the Regula Iuris 46 in 6° the successor enters upon the rights and property with the same right as the predecessor.[13] However this may be, to us it seems rather queer that good faith should be denied to the successor if he has no inkling of bad faith on the part of his predecessor. Here the civil law may certainly be applied. Of course, prescription runs only from the moment of good faith.

Bona fides is also required when prescription is invoked to free one from an obligation. For instance, the Society of Jesus had a legal claim on the Olivetans of Palermo, who paid 2500 scudi interest to the Society until the latter's suppression, in 1773, and even afterwards to the Camera Spoliorum, until 1782, when they stopped payment. After the restoration of the Society of Jesus, in 11 Cfr. Reg. Iuris 82 in 6°: "Iuris ignorantia in usucapione negatur prodesse, facti vero ignorantia prodesse potest"; Engel, II, 26, nn. 79 ff.

12 Reiffenstuel, II, 26, nn. 79 ff.

13 Ibid., n. 131 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1814, the payment was naturally claimed by the Jesuits, and the S. Congregation decided in their favor, although the Neapolitan laws favored the claim of the Olivetans. The reason for this decision was that the documents showed that their opponents were aware of their duty, as they mentioned it in 1796, 1818, and 1823. Hence the bona fides required by Canon Law could not be proved.[14]

This case illustrates what is called positive liberation from an obligation. There is also a negative one, which specially concerns servitudes (leases) and criminal actions. For the prescription of these the authors do not require good faith, saying that one is not positively held to bring criminal action against the culprit, because there is question of a mere tolerance or non-use of a right which may be claimed or discarded.[15] But it may be added that the duty of prosecution lies primarily with the authorities, and that many are either not in a condition, or not disposed, to institute a criminal action. This view forestalls hatred and fanaticism. That no obligation of denouncing transgressors exists in regard to merely penal laws goes without saying.

(c) The next requisite is a titulus, which is defined as "causa de se habilis ad transferendum dominium." This is the legal evidence of one's right of property, or the legal claim to an acknowledged or alleged right. Such a title is any contract legally and lawfully entered. A title is called just if acknowledged by law; it is true when it is based upon the thing itself, without reference to the legal requisites; for instance, a donation or contract may have been made by two parties informally, i.e., without the observance of formalities, as an informal engagement. There is 14 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 23, 1836 (Bizzarri p. 426).

15 Cfr. Engel, II, 26, n. 18 ff.; Santi-Leitner II, 26, n. 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

also a colorable or putative title (titulus coloratus) which is acknowledged by law, although it may be tainted with an intrinsic defect, for instance, if the person, being a minor, was incapacitated for acting, such a title is sufficient for lawful prescription. For although the title may not be true, it is just, and it is only for the sake of public tranquillity that the law requires a certain lapse of time for a colorable title to become true and just. Otherwise prescription would effect nothing, because where there is a true and just title from the very beginning, prescription is not needed.[16]

(d) The last requisite is continued possession. A real hold on the thing, either by the person himself or by another in his name, is required, because without a manifest and palpable sign of the will of possessing a thing, possession cannot exist among men.[17] But possession must also be continued, not interrupted. Interruption, either natural or civil, is an obstacle which stays prescription in such a way that the time elapsed is no longer reckoned. Thus if three years are required, and the impediment occurs in the course of the third year, the term must be commenced anew. Natural interruption may be caused by supervening bad faith or by loss of possession. Civil interruption is caused by civil action begun with the summons (see can. 1725). Entirely different from interruption is suspension, which may happen, for instance, when a church is deprived of its pastor or prelate by death or superior force. In that case the duration of the suspension is subtracted, but the preceding and following time are counted.[18]

The time required for prescription is defined partly by 16 Engel, II, 26, n. 22 f.; Reiffenstuel, II, 26, n. 120 ff.; Santi-Leitner, II, 26, n. 23 ff.

17 Reg. Iuris 3 in 6°.

18 Santi-Leitner, II, 26, n. 31 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can. 1508, which admits the term acknowledged by civil law, partly by can. 1511, which establishes a period of 100 years for prescription against property and precious things belonging to the Apostolic See, and a period of 30 years with regard to ecclesiastical corporations, and partly by can. 1703, concerning criminal actions.

We proceed to can. 1705, § 1, which rules that prescription in civil cases runs from the moment the law permits prescription to be brought. Therefore the canons just mentioned, viz., 1508 and 1511, may be applied here, even after the time allowed by civil law for prescription has run out, except, of course, that the application of can. 1511 is a very delicate matter.[19]

Canon 1705 continues: in criminal cases prescription runs from the day when the crime was perpetrated, unless the crime is continuous (habet tractum successivum; for instance, rape or violent detention), in which case the prescription runs from the day the continuity ceases, i.e., after the completion of the last of a series of acts which form a whole.

§ 3 of can. 1705 makes a special regulation concerning habitual crimes,[20] against which prescription runs only from the last act not followed by another of the same species. If one has been accused of a criminal act not yet prescribed, he is also held responsible for coherent acts which antedate prescription, even though these former acts could not have been prosecuted because of prescription. Take, for instance, a husband accused of violence, whose wife seeks separation; there may be other crimes connected with the one alleged, though committed years ago.[21]

19 Because of the politico-religious aspects of the so-called Roman Question; cfr. can. 2345.

20 Such would be concubinatus, also non-residentia of clergymen.

21 For instance abortus resulting from acts of violence.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE VI

OPENING OF THE CASE

A trial may be considered to have three stages: the opening, the defence or pleading, and the sentence with its execution.

The first stage, or opening of the case, comprises two distinct acts: the statement of the case (libelli oblatio) and the summons (citatio).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE BILL OF COMPLAINT

CAN. 1706

Qui aliquem convenire vult, debet libellum competenti iudici exhibere, in quo controversiae obiectum proponatur, et ministerium iudicis ad deducta iura persequenda expostuletur.

CAN. 1707

§ 1. Qui scribere nescit, aut legitime impeditur quominus libellum exhibeat, oretenus petitionem suam coram tribunali proponere potest.

§ 2. Item in causis facilioris investigationis et minoris momenti ac propterea cito expediendis, iudicis arbitrio relinquitur petitionis admissio oretenus sibi facta.

§ 3. In utroque tamen casu iudex notarium iubeat scriptis actum redigere qui actori legendus est et ab eo probandus.

CAN. 1708

Libellus quo lis introducitur debet:

1.° Exprimere coram quo iudice causa introducatur, quid petatur, et a quo petatur;

2.° Indicare, generatim saltem, quo iure innitatur actor ad comprobanda ea quae allegantur et asseruntur;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Subscribi ab actore vel eius procuratore, appositis die, mense et anno, nec non loco in quo actor vel eius procurator habitant, aut residere se dixerint actorum recipiendorum gratia.

Can. 1709

§ 1. Iudex vel tribunal, postquam viderit et rem esse suae competentiae et actori legitimam personam esse standi in iudicio, debet quantocius libellum aut admittere aut reiicere, adiectis in hoc altero casu reiectionis causis.

§ 2. Si iudicis decreto libellus reiectus fuerit ob vitia quae emendari possunt, actor novum libellum rite confectum potest eidem iudici denuo exhibere; quod si iudex emendatum libellum reiecerit, novae reiectionis rationes exponere debet.

§ 3. Adversus libelli reiectionem integrum semper est parti intra tempus utile decem dierum recursum interponere ad superius tribunal: a quo, audita parte, et promotore iustitiae aut vinculi defensore, quaestio reiectionis expeditissime definienda est.

Can. 1710

Si iudex continuo mense ab exhibito libello decretum non ediderit quo libellum admittit vel reiicit ad normam can. 1709, pars cuius interest instare potest ut iudex suo munere fungatur; quod si nihilominus iudex sileat, lapsis quinque diebus a facta instantia, poterit recursum ad Ordinarium loci, si ipse iudex non sit, vel ad superius tribunal interponere ut vel iudex ad definiendam causam adigatur vel alius in eius locum subrogetur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A bill of plea, or original writ,[1] is a statement of the case made to the competent judge in order to ask him to prosecute or to grant redress.

It is not absolutely required that this bill be presented in writing. It may be that the plaintiff is illiterate or unable to write on account of a lawful obstacle, such as paralysis. If so, the plea may be made orally. Besides, the judge is free to accept an oral plea if the case is of minor importance and easily settled, or if quick action is required.

When the bill is not presented in writing, the judge shall command the notary or clerk to put it into writing and to read it to the plaintiff, so that he may approve of it.

The contents of the bill are:

(a) the name of the judge (or at least the court) before whom the case is to be tried; because, for reasons stated above, under can. 1560–1568, it is important to know whether the judge is competent;

(b) the object of the plea, for instance, whether it is a civil or a criminal case; also whether possession or ownership is claimed; in matrimonial cases, whether separation or complete divorce is asked;

(c) the name of the defendant, or adversary, or accused party (in criminal cases), for this is necessary to summon him;

(d) the law or reason on which the claim is based, at least in general, because this is the directing line along which the defence shall run. Thus a clergyman who asserts that force was used in his ordination may cite can. 214; a claim against unjust alienation may be based on can. 1532–1534; a suit against division of parishes on can. 1427 f.; an invalid profession on can.

1 Plaint and original writ are not entirely identical, but depend on the amount involved; Blackstone-Cooley, III, 273.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

572, etc., etc. But this allegation is to be made only in general terms, because the bill should be brief and not contain proofs and documents, etc.

The bill must contain the signature of the plaintiff or his proctor (attorney); the date (day, month and year), the place where the plaintiff or his attorney live or reside, or where they will be ready to receive judicial acts. An attorney may give his office address, so also the plaintiff, if he has one, because both may refuse to accept judicial documents in their homes for various reasons.

What is the judge to do with such a bill? He may either accept or reject it. After inspecting the bill he shall ask himself whether he is competent (can. 1560–1568) to take cognizance of and decide the case and whether the plaintiff is entitled to bring suit. Concerning the latter point he should look up can. 1646–1654.

Though the judge may be competent to accept the case and the plaintiff entitled to bring suit, the judge may reject the bill, not on account of a frivolous plea of incompetence, which is forestalled by can. 1625, but by reason of defects in the bill. It may be that the judge, without being a stickler or bent on "red tape," finds the bill in need of correction (ob vitia quae emendari possunt). "Correction" here is not identical with change, because emendatio means correction of an accidental mistake; thus it may be that the sum demanded is not correctly stated, or the demand is made in an obscure way, or the law is not quoted properly, or the names are illegibly written. The reasons why the bill is refused must be stated by the judge, not only if the refusal is based on purely material or formal grounds, but also if the judge believes himself incompetent or deems the plaintiff incapable of bringing suit. If the corrected bill is again rejected, the reasons must be restated, for after the first refusal of the bill on account of formal defects the plaintiff may offer a new, corrected bill.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Should the bill be refused a second time, the party may, within the space of ten equitable days, have recourse — not appeal — to the higher court which has to settle the question of refusal as soon as possible, after having heard the party, the prosecuting attorney, and the defensor vinculi.

But it may be that the judge to whom the bill was first presented, makes no move either to accept or to refuse it. In that case, after the expiration of a month from the date when the bill was presented, the plaintiff may insist that the judge perform his duty, and if he or his attorney knows the Canon Law, they may quote can. 1625 in order to make him act. If he continues inactive, the party shall wait five more days, and then have recourse to the local Ordinary. If the Ordinary himself is the judge, the plaintiff may appeal to the higher court, asking it to compel the judge to decide the case or to substitute another judge. This privilege was granted to expedite cases as much as possible.[2]

[2] Trid., Sess. 24, c. 20, de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

SUMMONS AND INTIMATION

CAN. 1711

§ 1. Libello vel orali petitione admissa, locus est vocationi in ius seu citationi alterius partis.

§ 2. Quod si partes litigantes sponte coram iudice se sistant ad causam agendam, opus non est citatione, sed actuarius significet in actis partes sponte sua iudicio adfuisse.

CAN. 1712

§ 1. Citatio fit a iudice, et libello litis introductorio inscribitur aut adiungitur.

§ 2. Denuntiatur autem reo, et, si sint plures, singulis.

§ 3. Debet insuper actori nota fieri, ut statuta die et hora ipse quoque coram iudice se sistat.

CAN. 1713

Si lis moveatur ei qui non habet liberam administrationem rerum, de quibus disceptatur, citatio denuntianda est ei qui ipsius nomine iudicium suscipere tenetur ad normam can. 1648–1654.

CAN. 1714

Quaelibet citatio est peremptoria; nec iteretur necesse est, nisi in casu de quo in can. 1845, § 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

After the plaintiff has presented his bill, or stated, and the competent judge has accepted, the case, the latter shall (as formerly the proctor), summon the defendant to appear in court. This was and is called in ius vocare or the summons made by the lawful judge to the other party, either plaintiff or defendant. This is the beginning of the judicial action. It may be omitted if both parties appear of their own accord before the judge; but in that case the clerk must record the fact that the parties appeared spontaneously at the trial, so as to preclude a plea of dilatory exception.

The citation or summons must be issued by the judge, and is to be written on the bill of plea, or added to it. This, in civil cases, is done in order to give the defendant a chance to know immediately the nature of the case and to prepare his defence. In criminal cases, however, this insertion into, or connection with, the bill of complaint is not only not required, but generally impractical, and may therefore be omitted, according to can. 1945, § 2 n. 3.

If there are several defendants, the summons is issued to each, otherwise only to the one. If a corporation is the defendant in the case, the summons is issued to the lawful superior, which is entirely sufficient.[1]

Can. 1713 rules that if minors, or corporate persons, or non-corporate entities, such as pious foundations, are sued, the summons must be issued to the respective superiors, guardians, or administrators, in a word, to their lawful representatives.

It is also required that the plaintiff himself be notified of the summons as soon as it has been made, so that he, too, may present himself in court on the day and at the hour set for the case.

1 Santi-Leitner, II, 3, n. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Every summons is peremptory, i.e., one citation suffices and is final and urgent, so that the defendant is held in contempt, or may at least be declared to be in contempt, if he ignores it. The only exception to this rule is when ecclesiastical censures are threatened, because in that case a second summons is required.

CONTENTS OF THE SUMMONS

CAN. 1715

§ 1. Citatio denuntietur per schedam, quae praeceptum iudicis parti conventae factum ad comparendum exprimat, idest a quo iudice, ob quam causam saltem verbis generalibus indicatam, quo actore, reus, nomine et cognomine rite designatus, conveniatur; nec non locum, et tempus, idest annum, mensem, diem et horam ad comparendum praefixam perspicue indicet.

§ 2. Citatio, sigillo tribunalis munita, subscribenda est a iudice vel ab eius auditore et a notario.

CAN. 1716

Citatio duplici scheda conficiatur, quarum altera remittatur reo convento, altera asservetur in actis.

As will be seen under can. 1723, the summons must comply with all the conditions prescribed by can. 1715. Hence it is important to explain the various elements distinctly:

1. The intimation must be made in writing (per schedam).

2. It must be a command of the judge to the defendant, and not a mere exhortation or friendly invitation.

3. The name of the judge must be clearly stated, so

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google that the defendant may know immediately whether the judge is competent or not; if the judge is delegated, he should have his credentials or letters-patent ready to show them to the defendant. If he does not prove his delegation, the summons is void.[2]

4. The tenor of the complaint at least in general terms according to the bill of plea or petition.

5. The name and surname of the plaintiff and the defendant, so that no mistake as to persons may void the summons.

6. The place where and the date when the defendant has to appear, giving year, day, and hour, all clearly and distinctly written.

7. The summons must be sealed with the seal of the court, and be signed by the judge or his auditor and the notary.

These are the essential features of the summons; the duplicates required by can. 1716 are not essential. One copy is to be delivered to the defendant, while the other is inserted in the records or acta and preserved.

INTIMATION OR CONVEYANCE OF SUMMONS

CAN. 1717

§ 1. Citationis scheda, si fieri poterit, per Curiae cursorem tradenda est ipsi convento ubicunque is invenitur.

§ 2. Ad hoc cursor etiam fines alterius dioecesis ingredi potest, si iudex id expedire censuerit et eidem cursori mandaverit.

§ 3. Si cursor personam conventam non invenerit in loco ubi commoratur, relinquere poterit citatoriam schedam alicui de eius familia aut famulatu, si hic eam

[2] C. 31, X, I, 29; c. 2, X, II, 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

recipere paratus sit ac spondeat se reo convento quamprimum schedam acceptam traditurum; sin minus eam ad iudicem referat, ut transmittatur ad normam can. 1719, 1720.

CAN. 1718

Reus qui citatoriam schedam recipere recuset, legitime citatus habeatur.

CAN. 1719

Si ob distantiam vel aliam causam difficulter per cursorem tradi possit reo convento scheda citatoria, poterit iussu iudicis transmitti per tabellarios publicos, dummodo commendata et cum syngrapha receptionis, vel alio modo qui secundum locorum leges et conditiones tutissimus sit.

CAN. 1720

§ 1. Quoties, diligenti inquisitione peracta, adhuc ignoratur ubi commoretur reus, locus est citationi per edictum.

§ 2. Hoc autem fit affigendo per cursorem ad fores Curiae schedam citationis ad modum edicti per tempus prudenti iudicis arbitrio determinandum et in aliqua publica ephemeride eam inserendo; si vero utrumque fieri nequeat, alterutrum sufficiet.

CAN. 1721

§ 1. Cursor, cum in manu rei conventi citationis schedam relinquit, debet eam subsignare, adnotatis die et hora qua reo tradita est.

§ 2. Idem peragat si eam relinquat in manibus

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

alicuius de familia aut famulatu rei conventi, addito insuper nomine personae cui schedam tradidit.

§ 3. Si citatio fiat per edictum, cursor in edicti calce signet qua die et hora edictum affixum ad fores Curiae fuerit et quandiu affixum manserit.

§ 4. Si reus receptionem schedae recuset, cursor schedam ipsam subsignatam, addita die et hora recusationis, iudici remittat.

CAN. 1722

§ 1. Cursor quae peregit ad iudicem referat in scriptis manu propria subsignatis, quae in actis serventur.

§ 2. Si per tabellariorum officium citatio transmittatur, asservatur in actis fides eiusdem officii.

A summons, as stated, is essential and must be delivered into the hands of the defendant and proof of the delivery furnished. The summons may be conveyed by a courier, or by means of a letter, or by public edict.

1. A courier[3] is the most reliable means of conveying an important message. He should be a trustworthy person and deliver the summons to the defendant, wherever the latter may be. For this purpose he may enter the boundaries of a strange diocese — which act is not, properly speaking, an act of jurisdictional exercise — if the judge deems it expedient and commands him to do so. After the courier has found the defendant and delivered the summons into his hands, he must sign the summons

[3] In our ecclesiastical courts, so far at least, apparitores were not employed; Messmer, l. c., p. 62. Although the Code does not reject the contrary custom, yet where these officers can be made use of, it should be done on account of the safety of conveyance. In England, according to Blackstone (III, 279), two of the sheriff's messengers delivered the summons either to the person himself or left it at his house.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google personally with the date and hour of delivery, after the manner of a telegraphic dispatch.

If the defendant refuses to accept the summons, the courier shall nevertheless sign the summons, as stated above, noting the day and hour of refusal, and return it to the judge. The effect of this refusal is that the defendant is considered as duly summoned, and may be declared in contempt of court.[4]

If the defendant is not at home, i.e., at his usual residence, office, shop, or store, when the courier arrives with the summons, the latter may leave the writ with a member of his family or one of his employees or servants, provided they are willing to accept it and promise to hand it to the defendant as soon as possible. If no such readiness is manifested, the courier must return the writ to the judge, in order that other means may be employed. But if the family or employees are willing to comply with the demand, then the courier may leave the summons in their hands, having signed it, noted the day and hour of delivery, and added the name of the person to whom the paper was delivered.

2. Another means of conveying the summons into the hands of the defendant is the public mail service. This may be resorted to when the distance is too great, or for other reasons, for instance, to avoid suspicion or gossip. But the letter containing the summons must be registered, and a return receipt must be demanded (ricevuta di ritorno).

3. When neither a courier nor the post office are able to locate the defendant, no other means is left than summons by edict. This is done by posting the summons at the outside door of the court for a period considered sufficient by the judge and by advertising in the public (not necessarily in the Catholic) press. If both of these expedients are impossible, one suffices. This is certainly the case if there is no proper court-room or established place for holding trials. If the edict is posted at the gate of the court-room, the officer who posts it must set down at the bottom of the edict the day and hour when he posted it, and later add the time during which it was publicly displayed. He must also make out a written report of the proceedings, and this document, properly signed, must be added to the judicial acts. If the summons was sent through the mail, the receipts must be kept in the records.

[4] C. 5, X, II, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

NECESSITY AND EFFECT OF SUMMONS

CAN. 1723

Si scheda citatoria non referat quae in can. 1715 praescribuntur aut non fuerit legitime intimata, nullius momenti sunt tum citatio tum acta processus.

CAN. 1724

Regulae superius statutae pro rei citatione, ceteris quoque iudicii actibus, pro diversa tamen eorum natura, accommodandae et applicandae sunt, ut decretorum vel sententiarum denuntiationi aliisque huiusmodi.

CAN. 1725

Cum citatio legitime peracta fuerit aut partes sponte in iudicium venerint:

1.° Res desinit esse integra;

2.° Causa fit propria illius iudicis aut tribunalis, coram quo actio institua est;

3.° In iudice delegato firma redditur iurisdictio ita ut non exspiret resoluto iure delegantis;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

4.° Interrumpitur praescriptio, nisi aliud cautum sit, ad normam can. 1508;

5.° Lis pendere incipit; et ideo statim locum habet principium: "lite pendente, nihil innovetur."

How necessary a carefully written and lawfully conveyed summons is, is apparent from can. 1723, which says that if the summons was omitted, the entire proceedings are null and void.

The rules laid down for the summons must be adapted and applied, with due consideration of their importance, to all the other judicial acts, e.g., the issuance of decrees made by the tribunal, the pronouncement of the sentence, and so forth.

The effects of a duly issued and legally served summons or of the spontaneous appearance of the parties in court are:

1. The case has taken a legal turn (res non amplius est integra).

2. The judge or court before whom the action was brought becomes competent, and hence incompetency cannot be asserted afterwards.

3. The delegated judge is confirmed or perpetuated, so that his jurisdiction does not cease even if the delegans dies or goes out of office.

4. Prescription is interrupted, not merely suspended, so that bona fides or title cannot be pleaded (see can. 1508).

5. The case or suit is now pending, and hence the principle: "lite pendente, inhil innovetur" goes into effect. How this is to be understood appears from the Decretals, which mention[5] especially: (a) change of possession, which cannot be transferred to another; (b) validity of [5] Cfr. cc. 1–4, X, II, 16; c. 17, X, I, 6; c. 9, X, III, 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rescripts, which are looked upon as obreptitious or subreptitious if no mention is made of the pending suit; (c) prohibition of alienation, and (d) the restitution of things to their former condition.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE VII

ISSUE IN PLEADING (LITIS CONTESTATIO)

Originally the phrase litis contestatio seems to have meant merely the notice given by both parties to their witnesses to appear before the judge. Later, however, the term came to comprise the whole of the proceedings before the prætor, i.e., in iure.[1] Our Code first explains the term, then considers some intricate and doubtful cases, and, finally, describes the effects of litis contestatio.

DEFINITION AND REQUISITES

CAN. 1726

Obiectum seu materia iudicii constituitur ipsa litis contestatione, seu formali conventi contradictione petitioni actoris, facta animo litigandi coram iudice.

CAN. 1727

Ad litis contestationem nulla necessaria est sollemnitas, sed sufficit ut partibus coram iudice vel eius delegato comparentibus, in actis inseratur petitio actoris et contradictio conventi, unde constet qua de re agatur seu quinam sint controversiae termini.

It is supposed that the defendant has received the original writ or plaint, understands the reason for which suit has been brought against him, and is ready to "fight the 1 Ramsay-Lanciani, Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 342 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google case," to use a common expression. Hence the issue in pleading is nothing else but a final denial or contradiction of the plaintiff's demand, coupled with the intention of prosecuting the case before the judge. By this general answer and denial of the defendant the matter of the trial is established. We purposely use the term "general" because it is not required that the defendant contradict every particular statement in the plea. Nor is an exception intended in the proper sense.[2] No special or set formality is required, and the issue in pleading is valid even if the words or terms or rejoinders are not pronounced or composed with technical correctness. It suffices that the plaintiff tell the judge or his delegate what the case is, and that the defendant deny the charge or refuse the demand of the plaintiff before the same judge or delegate. But both the demand and the refusal must be inserted in the records (acta), which must show what the points in controversy are.

INTRICATE AND DOUBTFUL CASES

CAN. 1728

In causis tamen implicatioribus, in quibus petitio actoris nec perspicua sit nec simplex vel contradictio conventi difficultatibus scateat, iudex, ex officio aut ad instantiam actoris vel conventi, partes citet ad rite definiendos controversiae articulos, idest ad causae dubia, ut dicitur, concordanda.

CAN. 1729

§ 1. Si die dubiis concordandis praestituta, pars in ius vocata non compareat nec iustam absentiae

2 C. 2, 6°, II, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

excusationem alleget, contumax declaretur, et dubiorum formula statuatur ex officio, parte, quae praesens fuerit, id postulante. Parti autem contumaci statim id notum fiat ex officio ut quas velit exceptiones contra dubiorum seu articulorum formulam possit proponere et a contumacia se purgare, intra tempus quod iudici congruum videatur.

§ 2. Partibus praesentibus et in formula dubiorum seu articulorum concordibus, si iudex, quod ad se attinet, nihil excipiendum putaverit, eius rei fiat mentio in decreto quo formula firmatur.

§ 3. Si vero partes dissentiant aut earum conclusiones iudici non probentur, iudex ipse controversiam dirimat decreto.

§ 4. Dubiorum seu articulorum formula semel statuta mutari non potest, nisi novo decreto, ex gravi causa, ad instantiam partis vel promotoris iustitiae, vel defensoris vinculi, audita utraque vel altera parte eiusque rationibus perpensis.

If the petition, or writ, or plaint of the plaintiff is obscure and complicated,[3] or the denial of the defendant offers serious difficulties, either because the facts are doubtful or the law is indefinite, the judge shall, either ex officio or at the demand of either party, command both parties to define the points at issue more clearly (ad concordanda dubia). This is done by means of a formal summons, in the shape of a decree issued by the judge, in which the parties are ordered to appear on the day and hour and at the place appointed.[4]

If a party thus duly summoned does not appear in 3 The Castellani-Gould case was proposed to the Roman courts three times.

4 This is the law with the Signatura Apostolica; see Regulae Servandae, March 6, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 196 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

court on the appointed day and gives no legitimate reason for his failure, he is to be declared in contempt, and the party who is present may demand that the doubts or doubtful positions be formulated ex officio. The party declared in contempt (see can. 1842 ff.) must be at once officially notified in order to be enabled to take exception to the doubts officially formulated and to "purge" himself of contumacy. For this purpose a sufficient space of time must be granted by the judge. If both parties are present and agree upon the disputed points, or rather on the manner in which they have been formulated, this fact must be put on record, provided the judge on his part is satisfied. If, on the other hand, there is disagreement among the parties as to the points in question, or if the judge is not satisfied, he may settle the controverted points himself, i.e., formulate them by a decree. Once the controversial points have been determined, no change is admissible, except for weighty reasons and upon the demand of the parties or of the promotor iustitiae or the defensor vinculi, after these have heard the parties or party and properly pondered the reasons proposed. But every change in the positions or controverted points requires a new decree.

EFFECTS OF THE LITIS CONTESTATIO

CAN. 1730

Antequam litis contestatio locum habuerit, iudex ad testium aliarumve probationum receptionem ne procedat, nisi in casu contumaciae, aut nisi testium depositionem recipere oporteat, ne ipsa ob probabilem testis mortem, ob discessum eiusdem vel ob aliam iustam causam recipi postea nequeat, aut difficulter possit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1731

Lite contestata:

1.° Haud licet actori libellum mutare, nisi, reo consentiente, iudex, iustis de causis, censeat mutationem esse admittendam, salva semper reo compensatione damnorum et expensarum, si quae debeatur. Libellus non censetur mutatus, si coarctetur aut mutetur probationis modus; si minuantur aut petitio aut accessoria petitionis; si facti adiuncta in libello pridem posita ita illustrentur, compleantur aut emendentur, ut controversiae obiectum idem remaneat; si in locum rei petatur pretium, foenus aut aliquid aequivalens;

2.° Iudex congruum tempus partibus praestituat probationibus proponendis et explendis; quod quiden poterit, instantibus partibus, arbitrio suo prorogare, dummodo ne lis, ultra quam aequum sit, protrahatur;

3.° Possessor rei alienae desinit esse bonae fidei; qua propter damnatus rem restituere, non solum rem ipsam, sed et rei fructus a litis contestatae tempore restituere tenetur et damna praeterea sarcire, si qua secuta fuerint.

The litis contestatio should establish the object or character of the suit. Therefore specified charges and answers must be preferred by both parties, at least in a general way. This purpose is served by the articuli, or controverted points, which must therefore be settled first and are settled by the issue in pleading, which is called the foundation and beginning of the trial. Before the trial has actually begun, the judicial procedure is not determined, nor is it certain that the defendant will prosecute. Hence:

1. Before the litis contestatio has been properly made and the controverted points have been fixed, the judge

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cannot lawfully proceed to hear the witnesses or receive proofs, depositions, reports of experts, etc.

But the Code, like the old law,[5] admits exceptions to this rule; viz.: (a) If the defendant has been declared in contempt, in which case it is not required that the suit be dispatched as quickly as possible,[6] the sole fact of contumacy being sufficient; (b) If the deposition is required on account of the condition of the witnesses. A witness may be in danger of death, or advanced in age so that his memory is weak; or he may have to depart suddenly on some urgent journey; or it may be doubtful whether he will be as willing to testify later as he is now.[7]

2. After the litis contestatio: (a) It is not allowed to change the original writ (libellus) unless the judge, for weighty reasons, deems a change necessary and the defendant consents, provided always that the latter be indemnified, if necessary. Note well the difference between correction (emendatio) and change (mutatio). Of the former mention was made under can. 1709, § 2. Here change in the proper sense is intended. A change means a substantial alteration of the case, for instance, if a possessory is changed into a petitory cause; or in matrimonial cases, if a divorce is asked for instead of a separation, or one impediment is substituted for another; or, in ordination cases, if the invalidity of an order is pleaded instead of freedom from its obligations. But, says the text by way of example, it is no change, if the mode of proof is limited or altered, for instance, as to the number and quality of witnesses; if less is asked either in the substantial demand or the accessories, especially in alienation or alimony; if certain facts alleged in the writ are

5 Title VI, Book II, is complete, amounting to a law.

6 C. 5, X, II, 6: celerem expeditionem.

7 Cfr. cc. 2, 3, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

made clearer, supplied and corrected, provided the point at issue, or meritum causae, remains the same; if, instead of the thing itself (for instance, a precious article which has been alienated), a certain sum, or an interest, or an equivalent is demanded. These are corrections, not changes.

(b) The judge shall set a certain term for proposing and completing the process or proofs. This term may, however, be prorogued at the demand of the parties, but not unduly (cfr. can. 1620, 1634).

(c) The possessor of property belonging to another ceases to be bona fide after the litis contestatio, and therefore, if he should lose his case, is bound to make restitution not only of the property or thing itself, but also of the interest or profit drawn from the moment of the litis contestatio, and shall also be held to indemnification, if an additional loss should occur either to the defendant or to the object.

In the Roman tribunals the sum to be deposited for the expenses is determined at this juncture.[8]

8 Reg. Sig. Apost., art. 37 (A. Ap. S., IV, 199).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE VIII

LITIS INSTANTIA OR PROCEEDINGS

There is no such title as this in the Decretals, nor could we find an adequate term for it in English law.[1] Perhaps pleadings would suit, but proceedings, if taken in the limited sense of judiciary acts which begin with the litis contestatio, conveys the idea of the title just as well. The text first defines litis instantia, and then explains the modes of interruption, abatement, and renunciation.

DEFINITION AND INTERRUPTION

CAN. 1732

Instantiae initium fit litis contestatione; finis autem omnibus modis, quibus iudicium terminatur, sed et antea non solum interrumpi, verum etiam finiri potest sive peremptione sive renuntiatione.

CAN. 1733

Si pars litigans moriatur aut statum mutet aut cesset ab officio cuius ratione agit:

1.° Causa nondum conclusa, instantia interrumpitur, donec heres defuncti aut successor litem instauret;

2.° Causa conclusa, instantia non interrumpitur, sed iudex procedere debet ad ulteriora, citato procuratore, si adsit, secus defuncti herede vel successore.

1 Cfr. Blackstone, III, 292 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1734

Si controvertatur cuinam ex clericis litigantibus ius sit ad beneficium, et alter, lite pendente, moriatur, aut beneficio renuntiet, instantia non interrumpitur, sed contra superstitem eam prosequitur promotor iustitiae qui pro beneficii aut ecclesiae libertate dimicet, nisi beneficium sit liberae collationis Ordinarii et hic praeferat causam ut victam superstiti adiudicare.

CAN. 1735

Procuratore aut curatore a munere cessante, tandiu interrupta manet instantia, quandiu pars aut ii ad quos pertinet novum procuratorem vel curatorem nominaverint aut per se ipsi in posterum agere se velle professi fuerint.

The instantia litis begins with the issue in pleading and ends with the final sentence. However, the whole proceeding may not only be interrupted, but also abated or renounced.

Interruption takes place when one of the parties dies, or changes his status, or goes out of the office in virtue of which he was a party to the case,— provided the pleadings have not yet been closed.

Statum mutare means to change from the lay to the clerical state, or from either the lay or the clerical to the religious state, because the religious form a state of their own, and, besides, are considered as minors in ecclesiastical law. This rule, however, does not apply to novices, because they still have their own free will (velle et nolle) and hence may stand judgment, at least by proxy.

Cessare ab officio in this case signifies giving up the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

office which involves one in the law-suit, for instance, that of administrator or ecclesiastical superior.

However, interruption lasts only until the litigant's heir or successor in office again takes up the case. If the pleadings have been closed, the proceedings are not interrupted, but the judge must proceed after having summoned the defendant, if alive and present, or else his heir or successor.

Can. 1734 refers to the special case of a benefice which is claimed by two clergymen, one of whom dies or resigns while the case is pending. To whom shall the benefice be adjudged? It is not a vacant benefice properly speaking, nor can it be resigned except in favor of the other litigant, which is not here supposed. In this case the proceedings are not interrupted, but continued by the promotor iustitiae, who defends the benefice or liberty of the church. This must be understood of all benefices not reserved to the Apostolic See.[2] If the benefice is of free collation, i.e., one to which the Ordinary may freely appoint, the same Ordinary may confer it upon the survivor or rather declare that the survivor has won the case and adjudge the benefice to him. If the proctor (attorney) or guardian (curator) goes out of office by death, resignation, or removal, the proceedings are interrupted until a new proctor or curator is appointed by those concerned or until the latter have formally declared that they themselves will prosecute the case.

ABATEMENT OF THE INSTANTIA

CAN. 1736

Si nullus actus processualis, quin aliquod obstet impedimentum, ponatur in tribunali primae instantiae

2 Cfr. c. 1, Clem. II, 5; can. 1435, § 1, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google per biennium aut in gradu appellationis per annum, instantia perimitur, et in altero casu sententia per appellationem oppugnata transit in rem iudicatam.

CAN. 1737

Peremptio obtinet ipso iure et adversus omnes, minores quoque aliosve minoribus aequiparatos, eaque ex officio etiam excipi debet, salvo iure regressus ad indemnitatem adversus tutores, administratores, procuratores qui culpa se caruisse non probaverint.

CAN. 1738

Peremptio exstinguit acta processus, non vero acta causae; imo haec vim habere possunt etiam in alia instantia, dummodo ea inter easdem personas et super eadem re intercedat; sed ad extraneos quod attinet, non aliam vim obtinet, nisi documentorum.

CAN. 1739

In casu peremptionis, quas quisque ex litigatoribus fecerit, has ipse ferat expensas perempti iudicii.

If, notwithstanding the fact that no lawful impediment can be alleged, no processual act has been undertaken by the first tribunal or the first instance within two years, the proceeding is abated or quashed. If the higher or second court does nothing within one year from the date of appeal, although no lawful obstacle is in the way,[8] the sentence attacked becomes res iudicata.

Abatement holds ipso iure and against all, even minors and those equal to minors under the law, and must also be made a case of exception ex officio; but the right of [8] See cc. 5, 8, X, II, 28 and the canons on appeal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

claiming indemnity against guardians, administrators, and procurators who cannot prove their innocence is reserved to all minors. This claim (regressus), we suppose, holds for the time during which the representatives of minors have been culpably idle. This would comprise the lucrum cessans as well as the damnum emergens.

Abatement quashes all acts of proceedings (acta processus), but not the acts of the case (acta causae), which remain effective for another instance (higher court), provided the case concerns the same persons and the same matter. For outsiders these acta causae have merely the value of documents (see can. 1812 ff.). In case of abatement the expenses must be shared by the litigants according to the measure in which they have incurred or made them.

RENUNCIATION

CAN. 1740

§ 1. In quolibet statu et gradu iudicii potest actor instantiae renuntiare; item tum actor tum reus possunt processus actis renuntiare sive omnibus sive nonnullis tantum.

§ 2. Renuntiatio ut valeat, peragenda est in scriptis, et a parte vel ab eius procuratore, speciali tamen mandato munito, debet subscribi, alteri parti communicari, ab eaque acceptari, vel saltem non impugnari, et a iudice admitti.

CAN. 1741

Admissa, pro actis quibus renuntiatum est, eosdem parit effectus ac peremptio instantiae: et obligat renuntiantem ad solvendas expensas actorum, quibus renuntiatum fuit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The plaintiff may renounce further proceedings at any stage or in any instance; and the plaintiff as well as the defendant may surrender the acta processus either totally or partially. Renunciation must, however, be made in writing and be signed by the party or his proctor acting under a special mandate. Besides, the renunciation must be communicated to, and accepted by the other party, or at least not objected to by the latter, and admitted by the judge. Valid renunciation has the same effect as abatement with regard to the acts renounced, and obliges the one who makes it to pay all the expenses thus far incurred.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE IX

QUESTIONING THE PARTIES

It is now supposed that the parties have been duly summoned or notified of the place and date of the trial, and the issue in pleading has begun. The parties may be represented by their attorneys or proctors, unless there be an injunction by the judge commanding them to be present personally according to can. 1647. The Code now proceeds to describe the questioning of the parties and the oath to be administered to them.

QUESTIONS TO BE PROPOSED

CAN. 1742

§ 1. Iudex ad eruendam veritatem facti quod publice interest ut extra dubium ponatur, debet partes interrogare.

§ 2. In aliis casibus potest unum ex contendentibus interrogare non solum ad instantiam alterius partis, sed etiam ex officio, quoties agitur de illustranda probatione adducta.

§ 3. Interrogatio partium fieri a iudice potest in quovis stadio iudicii ante conclusionem in causa; post conclusionem in causa servetur praescriptum can. 1861.

CAN. 1743

§ 1. Iudici legitime interroganti partes respondere tenentur et fateri veritatem, nisi agatur de delicto ab ipsis commisso.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Si pars legitime interrogata respondere recuset, quanti facienda sit haec recusatio, utrum iusta sit, an confessioni aequiparanda, necne, iudicis est aestimare.

§ 3. Pars, quae respondere debet, si illegitime respondere recusaverit aut si postquam responderit mendax reperta fuerit, puniatur, ad tempus a iudice pro rerum adiunctis definiendum remotione ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis; et si ante responsionem iusiurandum de veritate dicenda praestiterit, laicus interdicto personali, clericus suspensione plectatur.

The questions asked depend, of course, on the nature of the case. When the public welfare is at stake, the judge must question the parties concerning the facts in order that they may be ascertained. In other cases, i.e., contentious or civil or private matters, the judge may question one party at the demand of the other, or both ex officio, whenever he considers it necessary to corroborate or illustrate a proof alleged. Such questioning is admissible until the proceedings are closed; but after they have been finished (post conclusionem in causa), questioning is allowed only under the conditions mentioned in can. 1861.

In order to produce the required effect, questioning must be followed by the answers of the parties questioned. Hence as often as the judge is entitled to interrogate the parties, these are obliged to answer according to the truth. Only the criminal is not bound to confess his own guilt, because no one is supposed to condemn himself.

But what if the party questioned refuses to answer? Does this refusal amount to a confession? Certainly not in the case of a criminal, because he is under no obligation to admit his guilt. Hence the text says that it lies with the judge who lawfully questions the party to weigh the argument of silence or refusal, whether it amounts to a confession or not, etc. It may be that the judge takes a refusal to answer as equivalent to a confession,[1] except, of course, in criminal cases.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

To give greater weight to his authority and to the law the judge may punish the party who unlawfully refuses to answer a lawful question by denying him any legal action or, as we say, civic rights, which denial, however in this case only concerns the ecclesiastical sphere.[2] This punishment is to be administered by the judge according to the importance of the matter. The same punishment may be inflicted on one whose answer is found to be untruthful. A heavier penalty is to be inflicted upon a lay person who swears falsely: he is to be personally interdicted. A clergyman who perjures himself is to be suspended, i.e., totally, from office as well as benefice.[3]

THE OATH

CAN. 1744

Iusiurandum de veritate dicenda in causis criminalibus nequit iudex accusato deferre; in contentiosis, quoties bonum publicum in causa est, debet illud a partibus exigere; in aliis, potest pro sua prudentia.

CAN. 1745

§ 1. Tum actor tum reus invicem, tum etiam promotor iustitiae et defensor vinculi possunt iudici exhibere articulos, seu quaesita, super quibus pars interrogetur, quaeque vulgo positiones dicuntur.

1 The Regulae S. R. Rotae, § 139, read: "parte praecepto iudicis non obtemperante, facta habeantur uti vera et confessa."

2 Cfr. can. 2256, n. 2.

3 Cfr. c. 15, X, I, 11; can. 2278, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. In positionibus exarandis, admittendis et parti proponendis regulae cum proportione serventur quae in can. 1773–1781 statutae sunt.

CAN. 1746

Ad iusiurandum praestandum vel interrogationibus respondendum partes personaliter coram iudice se sistere debent, exceptis iis de quibus in can. 1770, § 2, nn. 1, 2.

According to the Decretals [4] an oath was administered to both parties; it was called iuramentum calumniae, and in it the parties declared that they were prosecuting the case in good faith and merely with the intention of defending their presumptive right, without malice, vexations, or fraudulent delays. This oath was not an absolute requirement, but could be remitted by tacit renunciation. Our Code knows no such oath. The one mentioned here is an oath to tell the truth, and resembles that taken by the witnesses. It must not be demanded in criminal trials, lest the defendant be exposed to the danger of perjury. However, in civil cases which concern the public welfare, like matrimonial and ordination cases, the judge must demand this oath of the parties. Culpable or negligent omission of this requirement does not, however, affect the validity of the acts. In other cases the judge may demand this oath whenever he deems it necessary.

In order to facilitate and systematize the proceedings, the questions to be proposed should be formulated or specified; and in that form are called positiones. These positiones are to be drawn up, admitted, and presented to the parties in approximately the same way as the questions put to the witnesses (can. 1773–1781).

[4] Lib. II, tit. 7, de iuramento calumniae.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

To give oath and to answer the questions thus formulated, the parties must present themselves personally before the judge. This rule applies to all except cardinals, bishops, illustrious personages (can. 1770, § 2, n. 1) and those who are prevented from coming to court personally by sickness or their state of life.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE X

PROOFS

This title is one of the most important in legal procedure, because the issue of the trial naturally depends on the validity of the evidence.

The Code first mentions three kinds of facts which need no proof; then it states who has the duty of proving, and finally regulates the delay of proofs.

PRELIMINARY RULES

CAN. 1747

Non indigent probatione:

1.° Facta notoria, ad normam can. 2197, nn. 2, 3;

2.° Quae ab ipsa lege praesumuntur;

3.° Facta ab uno ex contendentibus asserta et ab altero admissa, nisi a iure vel a iudice probatio nihilominus exigatur.

CAN. 1748

§ 1. Onus probandi incumbit ei qui asserit.

§ 2. Actore non probante, reus absolvitur.

CAN. 1749

Probationes quae ad moras iudicio nectandas postulari videntur, ceu examen testis longe dissiti, aut cuius domicilium nescitur, vel cognitio documenti

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google quod cito haberi non potest, iudex ne admittat, nisi hae probationes necessariae videantur quia ceterae deficiant aut satis non sint.

A proof is the judicial demonstration of the truth of a disputed assertion or fact.[1] It is not concerned with texts, for these are supposed to be safe and evident, but turns about a controversial point or criminal fact which must be proved to have happened and in the manner it is alleged to have happened. Evidence and proof are not identical, for there may be evidence without proof, but there is no proof without evidence.[2]

In regard to the weight of proof the Code speaks of plena and semiplena probatio, or plenam and semiplenam fidem facere. Full proof is one which convinces the judge and prompts him to give sentence without further investigation. A probatio semiplena or half-proof is one that leaves room for reasonable doubt. In a wavering state of mind no one should pronounce judgment.

That even full proofs may differ as to degree, is clear from such terms as probationes apertissimae, plenissimae, luce clariores, praesumptivae, etc., used in canon law. Psychologically speaking, a full proof always excludes the contradictory proposition and therefore must be called sufficient in any case; what is full in its kind cannot be fuller. But it remains true that different kinds of proof carry unequal weight and may produce various states of mind, from mere presumption to absolute certainty. This truth is illustrated by the following verses:

"Aspectus, sculptum, testis, notoria, scriptum, Iurans, confessus, praesumptio, fama probavit."

1 See the commentators on lib. II, tit. 19 Decretal., especially Reiffenstuel, Santi-Leitner, and Wernz (Ius Decret.), Vol. V.

2 Messmer, l. c., p. 91 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Of these nine kinds of evidence the Code mentions some explicitly, whereas others are implied under other species. Confessus or confession occurs in chapter I of this title; iurans (oath), testis (witness), and fama (rumor) are treated in chapter II, on witnesses;[3] aspectus doubtless refers to experts and ocular inspection; sculptum, i.e., monumentary proof, must be combined with scriptum or documentary proof. Praesumptio is treated in ch. VI; notorietas is mentioned in can. 1747.

Of notorious facts, provided they be such as defined in can. 2197, n. 2, 3, the text says that they need no proof. Notoriety may be either of law or of fact. The former arises from adjudged matter and confession; the latter from that kind of publicity which no artifice can hide or law protect.[4]

No proof is required, secondly, for facts which are presumed by the law; see chapter VI, on presumptions.

Finally, proof is superseded by judicial confession; see chapter I of this title.

The next question that arises is: Who is obliged to furnish proof? It is the one who asserts a right or fact, not the one who denies it. For a mere denial is no proof.[5] Since the plaintiff generally is the one who asserts a right or fact, he must furnish proof, as in petitory and possessory trials.[6] However, if the defendant sets up an exception or makes a counter-charge, and thereby becomes a plaintiff (reus excipiendo fit actor), he must furnish proof of his exception or counter-charge. Those, for instance, who oppose the excommunication of witnesses, or of parties, or of the judge, must prove

3 The oath refers to witnesses; see ch. VII.

4 Cfr. cc. 8, 10, X, III, 2; c. 23, X, I, 6.

5 See l. 2, Dig. 22, 3; c. 23, X, I, 6; c. 5, X, I, 9: "negantis factum, per rerum naturam, nulla est directa probatio."

6 C. 3, X, II, 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that it was inflicted.[7] Those who oppose prescription must prove the title, if the law is against them as in case of titles; those who pretend exemption must prove the privilege by showing or proving prescription.[8]

If the plaintiff fails to furnish proof, the defendant goes free. By proof is here understood full proof (plena probatio), for, as will be seen from can. 1829 ff., a half-proof may be supplied by an oath. Besides, the proof must concern the action intended; for instance, if the plaintiff brings suit against disseissin, and proves only possession and disseissin, but not ownership (petitorium), he is victorious in the former two points, but not as to the latter.[9] The merit of the cause must be proved. Thus if a donation is attacked, the instrument of donation, or the proof that the donation has been made, is the point at issue, not some attached condition, which has perhaps been verified in the meanwhile.[10] Therefore the principle asserted in can. 1748, § 2 must be understood in this sense, that the defendant is absolved to the extent that the plaintiff fails to furnish proof (in hac parte).[11] Only if the plaintiff fails entirely in furnishing proof for his accusations is the defendant fully free, even though he made no use of counter-defence.[12] But a mere assertion or confession of the plaintiff, even though it may reflect on his character, is not sufficient to equal full proof. Thus if one confessed adultery with his brother's wife, and then (after her husband's death) married her, but wished to have the marriage dissolved, his confession would not be sufficient.[13]

Can. 1749 is intended to expedite trials, i.e., to finish them as quickly as the case permits. Hence it ordains

7 C. 1, 6°, II, 12; c. 2, 6°, V, 11.
8 C. 1, 6, II, 13; c. 7, 6°, V, 7.
9 C. 3, X, II, 12; c. 3, X, II, 19.
10 C. 3, 6°, II, 14.
11 C. 15, X, II, 1.
12 C. 36, X, II, 24.
13 C. 3, I, X, IV, 13.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that the judge should not admit evidence that is apparently demanded for no other purpose than to delay the sentence, unless such evidence is required because of the lack or insufficiency of the other proofs. Proofs which have this dilatory effect are the testimony of a witness who lives far away from the court or whose domicile is unknown, and the examination of a document which cannot be easily and quickly obtained. There is always room for the suspicion that such witnesses and documents are demanded with a sinister intention or frivolously, and they are therefore sometimes called futilia documenta, which the ponens may and should reject.[14]

The Code then proceeds to describe the different means of obtaining evidence. They are: confession, the testimony of witnesses, the declarations of experts, judicial inspection, documents, presumptions, and oaths.

[14] Cfr. c. 5, X, II, 14; Lex propria S. R. Rotae, can. 27, § 3 (A. Ap. S., I, 27).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

CONFESSION

CAN. 1750

Assertio de aliquo facto, in scriptis aut oretenus ab una parte contra se et pro adversario coram iudice, sive sponte, sive iudice interrogante peracta, dicitur confessio iudicialis.

CAN. 1751

Si agatur de negotio aliquo privato et in causa non sit bonum publicum, confessio iudicialis unius partis, dummodo libere et considerate facta, relevat alteram ab onere probandi.

CAN. 1752

Pars, aliquid confessa in iudicio, non potest contra confessionem suam venire, nisi aut in continenti hoc faciat, aut probet confessionem ipsam vel carere conditionibus in can. 1750 expressis vel errori facti esse adscribendam.

CAN. 1753

Confessio sive scriptis, sive oretenus, ipsimet adversario aut aliis extra iudicium facta, dicitur extraiudicialis: eaque in iudicium deducta, iudicis est,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

perpensis omnibus rerum adiunctis, aestimare quanti facienda sit.

Confession is here understood in the judicial, not in the sacramental sense. It is called judicial because given before the judge sitting in tribunal. If the judge delegates a notary or an auditor to receive a confession, it is nevertheless judicial, because the notary acts in the name of the judge.[1] But a confession made before a lay judge cannot be accepted as such by an ecclesiastical judge, and the latter may not pronounce sentence on the strength of it.[2]

Confession, therefore, may be defined as a statement, oral or written, made before the ecclesiastical judge by one party against itself and in favor of the other, spontaneously or upon the demand of the judge. The text allows not only spontaneous, but also elicited confession. That one may confess a deed of his own accord is evident. But fraud, deceit, or captious words are not admitted in a spontaneous confession. On the other hand, the judge may solicit a confession; but he must proceed lawfully, and lawful proceeding requires that the party to be questioned is under his jurisdiction, and that, in a criminal case a denunciation at least, if not a formal inquisition, was previously made. Besides, the judge is not free to act like a shrewd lawyer, extorting a confession by misleading or suggestive questions, by cross-examination, by captious and ensnaring remarks, unworthy trickery, etc.[3]

The judge being entitled to solicit a confession, it follows that the party is obliged to answer truthfully, because right and duty are correlative. Besides every one is obliged to obey his superior when he lawfully

1 Reiffenstuel, II, 18, n. 9.
2 C. 4, X, II, 1.
3 Cfr. Messmer, l. c., p. 97; Santi-Leitner, II, 18, n. 15.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google commands, and the judge is supposed to proceed lawfully.[4]

The plea of "not guilty," with the mental restriction, "because not convicted" or the like, is not admitted by Canon Law.

Entirely different from this is the question whether the defendant is in conscience bound to confess in reply to a true question which would condemn him in the external forum, although in the court of conscience he could not be condemned. Let us give an instance. James feigned a promise of marriage to Gemma (ficte promisit matrimonium), and now, at the trial, he is asked by the judge: Did you promise to marry Gemma? What is his duty? The more probable answer to this question is that James may deny the proposition, i.e., he may answer negatively, because in doing so he does not tell an objective untruth, since not the material words are to be considered, but the intention, and he never intended to marry Gemma, but feigned the promise. Of course, we suppose that the judge was under the impression of a false presumption when he asked the question.[5]

Another question: Is the proctor allowed to make a confession for his client? Although the text mentions only the party himself, yet if the proctor would confess in the presence of his client, and the latter would not contradict him, or if the proctor had a special mandate to that effect, his confession could not be rejected.[6]

The effect of a judicial confession, made freely and deliberately, is very moderately stated in can 1751: "it frees the other party from the burden of proof." Hence,

4 Messmer, l. c., p. 101.

5 Cfr. c. 11, C. 22, q. 5; Reiffenstuel, II, 18, n. 171 ff., who could quote Sanchez, Lugo, and others in favor of this view.

6 Cfr. C. 28, Dig. 2, 14; C. 6, § 4, Dig. 42, 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if the defendant confesses his obligation or guilt, the plaintiff has won the case, and, in civil or private matters ("in negotio privato") the judge may proceed to pronounce sentence.[7] In cases affecting the public welfare, such as matrimonial and criminal cases, the confession of the party does not produce full proof.[8]

Another effect of confession is stated in can. 1752, namely, the party who has confessed something at the trial, is not allowed to retract his confession. The reason is because a confession is supposed to be made deliberately and with due reflection, and without any intention of deriding the judge. However, there are exceptions to this rule. A confession may be retracted:

1. In continenti, i.e., immediately after the confession has been made, and before it is taken down in writing, or before leaving the court, if the judge is willing. In this case it is not necessary to prove the mistake, but it is sufficient simply to recall the previous statement or to correct the error.[9]

2. If the party who confessed can prove that the confession was not made legitimately, according to can. 1750, for instance, that the judge proceeded unlawfully.

3. If an error in fact (error facti)—not in law—is proved, for instance, if an administrator or procurator momentarily forgot the exact sum or date.[10]

Can. 1753 mentions extrajudicial confession, i.e., confession made privately to one's adversary or to others, say the judge or notary, or an attorney outside the court or tribunal. The proof that such a confession was made could be furnished by the free admission in court that it had been made, or by two witnesses who heard it.[11]

7 C. 10, X, I, 36; c. 6, X, I, 9.
8 C. 5, X, IV, 13; c. 5, X, V, 1.
9 See c. 7, X, II, 21; Reiffenstuel, II, 18, n. 77 f.
10 C. 4, X, II, 18.
11 C. 23, X, II, 20; Santi-Leitner, II, 18, n. 7.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The value or effect of such an extrajudicial confession is not judical per se, because it is at the most only half-proof, which does not free the plaintiff from the burden of supplying the remaining half by other means. It rests with the judge to weigh the value of such a confession, and in doing so, he shall consider all the circumstances of the case. Circumstantial evidence may often be helpful. For instance, if a boy was for a long time called the child of a certain man and acknowledged as such by the putative father, even though the latter did so only upon the insistence of the mother, the presumption is in favor of his paternity, even if the mother afterwards denies it under oath.[12]

[12] C. 10, X, II, 19.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

WITNESSES AND TESTIMONY

As in the Roman,[1] so in Canon Law, witnesses have always played a conspicuous part. The contestatio litis already introduced witnesses, and in the course of the trial, their testimony was instrumental in deciding the case.

A witness is a person who has seen or knows a fact about another person, and is therefore competent to give evidence concerning the same. A testimony (attestatio) is a more or less solemn statement, made in court, concerning a fact seen or known by another, for no one can be a witness in his own case. Our Code in two preliminary canons regulates the admission of witnesses and defines their obligation.

ADMISSION AND OBLIGATION OF WITNESSES

CAN. 1754

Probatio per testes in quibuslibet causis admittitur, sub iudicis tamen moderatione, secundum modum praefinitum in canonibus qui sequuntur.

CAN. 1755

§ 1. Testes iudici legitime interroganti respondere et veritatem fateri debent.

1 See Dig. 22, 5; Cod., IV, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 2. Salvo praescripto can. 1757, § 3, n. 2, ab hāc obligatione eximuntur:

1.° Parochi aliique sacerdotes quod attinet ad ea quae ipsis manifestata sunt ratione sacri ministerii extra sacramentalem confessionem; civitatum magistratus, medici, obstetrices, advocati, notarii aliique qui ad secretum officii etiam ratione praestiti consilii tenentur, quod attinet ad negotia huic secreto obnoxia;

2.° Qui ex testificatione sua sibi vel consanguineis vel affinibus in quolibet gradu lineae rectae et in primo gradu alineae collateralis infamiam, periculosas vexationes, aliave mala valde gravia obventura timent.

§ 3. Testes iudici legitime interroganti scienter falsum affirmantes aut verum occultantes puniantur ad normam can. 1743, § 3; eademque poena mulctentur omnes, qui testem vel peritum donis, pollicitationibus aut alio quovis modo inducere praesumpserint ad falsum testimonium dicendum aut ad veritatem occultandam.

Canon 1754 repeats the old saying of Arcadius[2] that witnesses may be admitted in all trials, whether criminal or civil. The same jurisconsult adds that the judge should control the witness-stand and admit only as many witnesses as are necessary to bring out the truth. This is here expressed by the phrase "sub iudicis moderatione," and the mode or manner is governed by the following canons.

Witnesses, when called upon legitimately by the judge, are obliged to answer and to speak the truth. For the office of witness is one of public interest and affects the public welfare. Therefore the ecclesiastical law per-

2 L. 1, Dig. 22, 5; cfr. c. 13, X, II, 19. Some canonists denied that witnesses could be compelled to give testimony in criminal cases; see Reiffenstuel, II, 21, n. 18 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mits the judge to employ penalties in order to compel persons to act as witnesses. But they must be warned before penalties are inflicted.[3] Besides, the judge must question them lawfully, i.e., he must be competent and summon them according to the rules which follow.

Not all persons who are otherwise qualified, are to be compelled to take the witness stand. The following are excepted:

1. Confessors, who, according to can. 1757, § 3, n. 2, are incapable of giving testimony in regard to matters learned through sacramental confession.

2. All persons whose knowledge is privileged, or who are bound by official secrecy, even though this be imposed only by reason of advice. This includes pastors and priests who have knowledge of the matter in question only by reason of, and in connection with, their sacred ministry, even though such knowledge was gained extra-sacramentally; also civil magistrates, physicians, midwives, lawyers (attorneys), notaries, and other persons bound by official secrecy.[4] This law was made to safeguard public trust and confidence in public or semi-public persons.

3. All who would sustain damage if forced to give testimony. Hence all persons who reasonably fear that their testimony will render themselves or their relatives, either by consanguinity or affinity in every degree of the direct line and up to the first degree of the collateral line, infamous, or cause themselves or the aforesaid relatives dangerous vexations or other probable disadvantage, cannot be forced to give evidence. As to infamy,

[3] C. 1–5, X, II, 21.

[4] This also in English law, according to Blackstone, Comment., III, 370; Ibid., note 24, Cooley adds: "In several of the U. S. statutes have been passed extending similar protection to the communications made to physicians and clergymen."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

it is certain that no man can be compelled to prove his own infamy or to answer any questions which may tend to incriminate himself, or render him liable to punishment.[5] Such vexations and evil may be of the moral or the material order.

The question may arise: Is a witness, who is otherwise capable and not excused, bound to speak the truth, if he has sworn to keep it secret (secretum commissum et iuramento firmatum)? The answer is, yes, because such an oath was either rash or illicit, and therefore contrary to good morals. If the oath is publicly known, the judge may publicly declare it null and void, in order to prevent danger of scandal arising from presumptive perjury.[6]

§ 3 of can. 1755 establishes the penal sanction against perfidious witnesses. The judge who proceeds lawfully in questioning witnesses, may inflict upon those who knowingly tell an untruth, or conceal the truth, the same penalties as are threatened in can. 1743, § 3, against the parties who tell a lie. But the untruthfulness of the testimony must be either notorious or juridically proved.[7]

The same penalty may be meted out under the same condition to those who bribe witnesses or experts with gifts and promises, or in any other way (for instance, by threats or fear) endeavor to induce them to make a false statement or to hide the truth. Thus in the case of a divorce obtained by perjury or false testimony, the bribed witnesses had to do penance and were no longer admitted as witnesses.[8] This, we are sorry to say, still happens in connection with affidavits and other testimony. Severe punishments were formerly visited

5 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 22 ff.; see also Blackstone-Cooley, l. c.

6 Reiffenstuel, II, 21, n. 43 ff.; Santi-Leitner, II, 21, n. 7.

7 C. 17, X, I, 11.

8 C. 9, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google upon higher and lower clerics who perjured themselves: they were deposed, relegated to a monastery, or reduced to the lay state.[9] Perjurers were excommunicated, or declared infamous, and their testimony rejected.[10] This was done to safeguard the public welfare and the dignity and authority of the courts.

Art. I

WHO MAY BE WITNESSES

Can. 1756

Omnes possunt esse testes, nisi expresse a iure repellantur vel in totum vel ex parte.

Can. 1757

§ 1. Ut non idonei repelluntur a testimonio ferendo impuberes et mente debiles.

§ 2. Ut suspecti:

1.° Excommunicati, periuri, infames, post sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam;

2.° Qui ita abiectis sunt moribus ut fide digni non habeantur;

3.° Publici gravesque partis inimici.

§ 3. Ut incapaces:

1.° Qui partes sunt in causa, aut partium vice funguntur, veluti tutor in causa pupilli, Superior aut administrator in causa suae communitatis aut piae causae, cuius nomine in iudicio consistit, iudex eiusve assistentes, advocatus aliique qui partibus in eadem causa assistunt vel astiterunt;

2.° Sacerdotes, quod attinet ad ea omnia quae ipsis

[9] C. 7, Dist. 50.
[10] C. 9, C. 3, q. 3; c. 20, C. 24, q. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ex confessione sacramentali innotuerunt, etsi a vinculo sigilli soluti sint; imo audita a quovis et quoquo modo occasione confessionis ne ut indicium quidem veritatis recipi possunt;

3.° Coniux in causa sui coniugis, consanguineus et affinis in causa consanguinei vel affinis, in quolibet gradu lineae rectae et in primo gradu collateralis, nisi agatur de causis quae ad statum civilem aut religiosum personae spectant, cuius notitia aliunde haberi nequeat, et bonum publicum exigat ut habeatur.

CAN. 1758

Non idonei et suspecti audiri poterunt ex decreto iudicis, quo id expedire declaretur; sed eorum testimonium valebit tantummodo ut indicium et probationis adminiculum, et generatim iniurati audiantur.

The general rule is that all whom the law does not debar, either entirely or partially, may be witnesses. The law always supposes two qualities in a witness, viz., first, knowledge of the facts to which he was to bear witness, and, secondly, probity or uprightness of character.

The Code distinguishes a threefold class of persons who are, or may be, excluded from the witness-stand; they are the unfit, the suspected, and the incapable. The former two classes may be said to constitute the relatively unfit, and the last the absolutely unfit witnesses; or, as the Code says, ex parte and in totum.

The difference is explained in can. 1758, which declares that the relatively unfit, i.e., the unfit and suspected, may be admitted as witnesses if the judge considers that for one reason or another they are necessary. However, their testimony has no value except as an indication or a sign which may eventually lead to the establishment of complete evidence and to strengthen the proof by corroborating the testimony of other witnesses. Relatively unfit witnesses should, as a rule, be heard without being put under oath (iniurati audiantur). Thus in the case of procedure against presumptive heretics witnesses are admitted who are or were the companions and friends of the accused.[11] Thus, also, perjurers are admitted as witnesses by the S. Roman Rota, but their testimony is treated as a mere indicium, more especially in causis spiritualibus.[12] Conspirators in the same case are generally repelled.[13]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Unfit (non-idonei) to act as witnesses are boys who have not yet completed the fourteenth, and girls who have not yet completed the twelfth year of age (impuberes). Also the feeble-minded (mente debiles). To this class belong idiots, mentally deranged persons, and those who are under the influence of magic, or hypnotism, or drugs, or intoxicating liquor. Those who are merely defective in hearing, sight, or speech, are not excluded, provided that the mental condition of this class of non-idonei was defective at the time the fact occurred or the act was committed, regarding which they would testify.[14] That they must be mentally normal when they are called upon to give testimony goes without saying.

2. Suspected witnesses are:

a) All excommunicated and infamous persons as well

11 Cfr. cc. 5, 8, 6°, V, 2.

12 Reg. Servandae, Aug. 4, 1910, § 114, n. 1 (A. Ap. S., II, 820).

13 C. 22, X, II, 27.

14 A loose statement is that of Santi-Leitner, II, 20, n. 15: "quando autem testis adducitur ad probandum actum, eius idoneitas requiritur tempore probationis." Does that probatio go back to the time the act was committed? If so, all right; but if probatio is taken to mean the witness-stand, the statement is ambiguous; for if he was not fit to witness the act, he cannot testify regarding it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as perjurers against whom a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been duly pronounced. Note that vitandi and tolerati are equally included under excommunicati, and the Constitution of Martin V (" Ad evitanda," 1418) cannot be applied in this case. As to perjurers, a special penalty may be meted out to those who perjure themselves outside of a trial court by the Ordinary,[15] who can deprive them of the right and capacity to give testimony if he sees fit. In our case, either the Ordinary or the judge would have to issue a declaration to the effect that perjury was committed, and that the perjurer will not be admitted as a witness; the law permits the issuance of such a sentence.[16]

Concerning infamous persons observe that the infamy implied is infamy in law as well as in fact, but the persons in question must have sustained a condemnatory or declaratory sentence to that effect according to the penal code (can. 2293) of the Church. If the civil authorities have pronounced sentence of infamy, the sentence is valid under the ecclesiastical law if the Ordinary approves it.[17]

A special class of infamous persons (infames infamia iuris) are those who fight a duel and their seconds.

In all the above-mentioned cases mere notoriety is not sufficient, but a formal sentence, either declaratory or condemnatory, is required.[18]

b) Another class of "suspected" persons debarred from testifying at ecclesiastical trials are those whose character is such as to render them untrustworthy. This

15 Can. 2323.

16 Cfr. c. 9, C. 3, q. 5; c. 9, X, II, 20.

17 Cfr. c. 17, C. 6, q. 1; can. 2293, § 3.

18 S. C. C., Aug. 9, 1890 (A. S. S., XXIII, 234 f.); but compare can. 2351, § 2; when this canon is verified, the so-called Mensuren of the Austrian and German students render the participants infamous.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is a rather vague rule, the application of which is left to the judge. It appears to comprise the two classes formerly [19] known as criminosi and personae viles sive pauperes. Criminals are here understood, not such as are infamous in fact,[20] because these are comprised under the preceding number. However, as long as no declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been issued, even those stained with infamia facti may reasonably be included here. Hence all persons who have lost the esteem and respect of their fellowmen, and have not amended their lives, are included in the phrase: "qui ita abiectis sunt moribus," etc., also the class formerly styled personae pauperes et viles, because, as the Roman law [21] says, paupers and persons of low condition are apt to commit a crime for filthy lucre's sake, or, in other words, are more easily bribed than others. Yet this statement needs some modification, for a poor man may be as honest as a rich man, and if there is no proof of his having been bribed on former occasions, he cannot justly be excluded. It must not be forgotten that the Christian religion has raised the lowly (slaves, serfs, and villains) to a higher moral standard than the Roman law could reasonably assume. But proved bribery would certainly be sufficient to exclude one from the witness-stand.[22]

c) Still another class of persons excluded from testifying at ecclesiastical trials consists of those who have publicly fostered hatred and enmity against the party against whom they are called to testify. This exclusion is based on common sense and has been generally adopted by civil codes. This class of witnesses was not admitted even in exceptional judgments, either civil or criminal, and was excluded also in inquisitorial proceedings.[23]

19 C. 54, X, II, 20; c. 3, C. 4, q. 2 et 3; see l. 3, Dig. 22, 5.
20 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 55.
21 L. 3, Dig. 22, 5.
22 C. 9, X, II, 20.
23 C. 32, X, V, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But there are three limitations established by the Code:

1) The enmity must be public, i.e., divulged, or at least easily and readily known from the circumstances of the case.[24] Thus a former lawsuit or the threat of bodily violence, blackmail, serious quarrels or fights would be indicative of an existing enmity. This enmity must furthermore be

(2) Deadly or grievous, which means that the enemy would inflict a grievous mental, spiritual or physical evil on his adversary if it were in his power to do so.

(3) The enmity must finally be limited to one of the litigant parties, viz., the one against whom testimony is to be given. For if the witness would be an enemy to both the plaintiff and the defendant, his testimony could not be rejected.[25]

3. The following are also incapable of being witnesses:

a) Those who are parties to the same cause or act in the name of the litigant parties; such as tutors in the case of their wards, superiors or administrators in the case of their communities or pious foundations, judges and their assessors, attorneys and others who assist or have assisted their clients in the same case. All these are presumed to be engaged in a common cause, and therefore to be personally interested. Hence the maxim: "No one may be plaintiff and witness or judge and witness"[26] at the same time and in the same case. However, this, too, must be taken with a grain of salt. For a prelate, either secular or regular, may testify in the case of his own church or community, as long as he is not plaintiff, defendant, or proctor; canons and capitulars may testify in civil matters concerning their chapters, provided only the chapter as such, and no personal in-

24 See can. 2197, n. 1.
25 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 132 f.
26 Cfr. c. 6, X, II, 20; Santi-Leitner, II, 20, n. 9.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

terests, are involved.[27] This applies to all instances (first, second, last), through which the case may run.

b) Priests are rejected as witnesses in whatever concerns knowledge gained through sacramental confession, even though the parties have given them permission to speak. This principle applies to anyone who, whether cleric or layman, has in any way acquired knowledge through sacramental confession; the testimony of such a one cannot be accepted even as a presumptive indication of truth. Thus bystanders at the confessional or chance hearers of a sacramental confession cannot be admitted as witnesses to a fact thus perceived or learnt.

c) By reason of natural affection, which may influence the judgment, the following are excluded: the husband in case of his wife and vice versa, those who are related to one another by consanguinity and affinity in every degree of the direct line and in the first degree of the collateral line, i.e., brothers and sisters, brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, whenever their relatives are concerned.[28]

Yet even these are not entirely and in every case rejected; for if relatives wish to testify to the civil or religious state of the defendant, they may be admitted, provided the required testimony cannot be obtained otherwise and the public weal demands that it be obtained. Thus parents may testify to the baptism, or to the legitimacy, or to the clerical, religious or married state, or to the age of their children; spouses are also admitted, for they are supposed to know their pedigree better than outsiders.[29] However, no full proof could be construed from the deposition of such witnesses,[30] unless no other 27 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, 197 ff.

28 Cfr. c. 3, C. 4, q. 2 et 3; c. 78, C. 11, q. 3.
29 C. 5, X, II, 20; c. 3, X, IV, 18.
30 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 119.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google proof were available and the public welfare required that proof be secured.

ART. II

BY WHOM, HOW, AND HOW MANY WITNESSES ARE TO BE INTRODUCED, AND WHO ARE TO BE REJECTED

CAN. 1759

§ 1. Testes a partibus inducuntur.

§ 2. Possunt quoque induci a promotore iustitiae et defensore vinculi, si id ad causam intersit.

§ 3. Sed ipse iudex, quoties agatur de minoribus aliisve qui minoribus aequiparantur, et generatim quoties publicum bonum id exigat, potest testes ex officio inducere.

§ 4. Pars, quae testem induxit, potest eius examini renunciare; sed adversarius postulare potest ut, hac non obstante denuntiatione, testis examini subiiciatur.

CAN. 1760

§ 1. Si quis sponte compareat testimonii reddendi gratia, iudex poterit eius testimonium admittere vel repellere prout expedire censuerit.

§ 2. Debet autem testem, qui se sponte obtulerit, repellere cum comparere sibi videatur moras iudicio nectendi causa vel iustitiae et veritati quoquo modo officiendi.

This whole article might be simply inscribed: "De Productione Testium," which is nothing else but a petition offered to the judge to admit witnesses of the party who wishes to prove an action or exception.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The parties may introduce witnesses, who are received after the issue in pleading.[31]

2. The promotor iustitiae and the defensor vinculi may also call in witnesses if they deem them necessary.

3. The judge, too, may demand witnesses, if minors and such as are compared to minors in law are concerned in the trial, or whenever the public welfare requires witnesses, as in matrimonial cases.

4. The party who produces a witness may forego the privilege of examining him, although this does not affect the right of the opponent to do so.

It may happen (can. 1760) that some one offers himself as a witness of his own accord. But since there is room for suspicion as to the motives of such a testis ultroneus, the judge is free either to admit or to reject him. He must reject him if it becomes apparent that the object of the spontaneous witness is simply to delay the trial or to obstruct justice.

HOW WITNESSES ARE PRODUCED

CAN. 1761

§ 1. Cum probatio per testes postulatur, eorum nomina et domicilium tribunali indicentur; praeterea exhibeantur positiones seu articuli argumentorum super quibus testes sint interrogandi.

§ 2. Si ne intra diem quidem peremptorium a iudice praestitutum, obtemperatum fuerit, postulatio deserta censetur.

If witnesses are demanded, their name and domicile must be indicated and the questions or points upon which they are to be examined must be handed to the tribunal.

31 Cfr. X, II, 6: "Ut lite non contestata non procedatur ad testium receptionem;" see can. 1730.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The obligation of making known these things, viz., the names and points, lies with those who demand witnesses, either the party, or others.[82] If this obligation has not been complied with within the time set by the judge, the demand is quashed.

The litigant parties must make known to each other the names of their respective witnesses before these are examined; if this would prove a great inconvenience, the manifestation may be made before the testimonies are published (can. 1763).

The summoning of witnesses is done by the judge, who issues a decree to that effect. The summons must be served like the citation of the parties, as stated in canons 1725 sqq. When duly served, it entails the obligation of appearing in court (can. 1766); in case of inability, the judge must be informed of the reason. This rule must be understood in the light of can. 1755, § 2.

That there is a strict obligation cannot be denied, since the law provides a punishment for refusal. § 2 of can. 1766 states that if a witness proves recalcitrant or disobedient to the summons duly served, and fails to appear in court without a lawful reason, the judge may inflict a suitable punishment and fine him for the amount of damage caused to the parties by his unreasonable conduct. The same penalty may be inflicted upon those who appear in court but refuse to answer lawful questions put to them, or to take the oath, or to sign the witness papers.

No distinction is made on this head between clergymen and laymen. Clergymen, when summoned to the ecclesiastical court, should set an example of obedience to laymen.

82 Regulae S. R. Rotae, Aug. 4, 1910, § 114, n. 3 (A. Ap. S., II, 821).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A written excuse should be sent in if the witness summoned is unfit, suspected, or incapable of testifying, so that the judge may take note thereof in the acts.[33]

THE NUMBER OF WITNESSES

CAN. 1762

Iudici ius et obligatio est nimiam multitudinem testium refrenandi.

CAN. 1763

Partes debent sibi invicem nota facere testium nomina antequam eorum examen inchoetur, aut, si id, prudenti iudicis existimatione, fieri sine gravi difficultate nequeat, saltem ante testificationum publicationem.

In order that the trial be not unnecessarily prolonged, the judge is empowered and obliged to restrict the number of witnesses (can. 1762). The admissible number was fixed in one Decretal as fourty for each party.[34] However, the text may have another meaning, viz., as regulating the number of times a witness may be produced. An ancient law says that a witness may be produced only three times and that a special solemnity is required for the fourth time.[35] But this Decretal would rather seem to refer to the examination of witnesses. That is now regulated by can. 1781. Our text probably refers to the number of witnesses, which is left to the judge to fix, except when there is question of "seven 33 It is quite true (see Messmer, l. c., p. 112) that certain witnesses should not be called, but courtesy as well as despatch would seem to counsel the interpretation given in the text.

34 C. 37, X, II, 20.

35 C. 36, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google hand" testimony in case of non-consummation of marriage; this the judge is not at liberty to curtail.[36]

WHICH WITNESSES ARE TO BE EXCLUDED

CAN. 1764

§ 1. Testes debent ex officio excludi, si iudici liquido constet eos a testimonio ferendo prohiberi, salvo praescripto can. 1758.

§ 2. Ast etiam, postulante adversario, testes excludendi sunt, si iusta exclusionis causa demonstretur, quae exclusio dicitur reprobatio personae testis.

§ 3. Pars nequit reprobare personam testis quem ipsa induxit, nisi nova reprobationis causa supervenerit, quamvis possit eius dicta reprobare.

§ 4. Reprobatio testis fieri debet intra triduum postquam testium nomina cum parte communicata fuerunt, nec postea facta admittatur, nisi a parte demonstretur vel saltem iuramento affirmetur defectum testis antea sibi notum non fuisse.

§ 5. Iudex autem reprobationis discussionem in finem litis reservet, nisi contra testem stet praesumptio iuris, aut defectus sit notorius vel statim ac facile probari possit vel postea probari nequeat.

CAN. 1765

Citatio testium fit ministerio iudicis, decreto interveniente, et intimanda est testibus ad normam can. 1715–1723.

1. The judge must ex officio exclude from the witness-stand all incompetent witnesses, those entirely incapable, [36] See cc. 5, 7, X, IV, 15; can. 1975.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and the unfit and suspected, who may, however, be admitted to give presumptive evidence (can. 1758).

2. No witnesses may be admitted to whom the opponent reasonably takes exception. The reprobatio personae testis is a kind of exception, but neither dilatory nor peremptory in the proper sense, for it may be made at any time before the publication of the testimonies or depositions. But it properly turns about the person of the witness whose unfitness, incapacity, etc., may be objected to, according to can. 1757.

3. However, if a party has introduced a witness to testify for himself, he cannot reject that witness, because the very fact of his producing him argues that he is willing to accept him and approves of his qualifications. Only if a reason to object to the witness developed after he was summoned, would the party who produced him be allowed to put up an exception.[87] Thus if a witness called and proposed by a party should become that party's bitter enemy, or perjure himself, or become infamous, the party could take exception to him. Besides, although a witness was introduced by the party himself, and no new reason for his rejection has arisen, the producing party may contradict or reprove anything the witness may say against him, because, although the party may know the person, he may not know his intentions or what he is going to say.

4. However, the rejection of a witness or exception to the same must be made within three days after the names of the witnesses have been communicated by the parties to each other and cannot be admitted afterwards unless the party can prove, or at least affirms under oath, that some defect in the witness, i.e., unfitness, incapacity, etc., was unknown to him before.

87 C. 31, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5. The judge may put off the discussion of exceptions taken to witnesses to the end of the trial. This is the rule, which, however, must not be applied to certain exceptional cases, namely:

a) If the presumption of the law is against the witness; this would be the case if a witness were unfit, as defined in can. 1757, § 3;

b) If the defect in a witness is notorious and could easily and immediately be proved, for instance, by producing the sentence of excommunication issued against a vitandus;

c) If the defect could not be proved afterwards, i.e., after some delay, for instance, if the witness were dangerously ill or about to depart for a distant country.[38]

Art. III

THE OATH TAKEN BY WITNESSES

Can. 1767

§ 1. Testis, antequam testimonium edat, iusiurandum praestare debet de tota ac sola veritate dicenda, salvo praescripto can. 1758.

§ 2. Partes earumve procuratores praestationi iurisiurandi testium assistere possunt, salvo praescripto can. 1763.

§ 3. Testibus, si de iure partium mere privato agatur, poterit iusiurandum, utraque parte consentiente, remitti.

§ 4. Sed etiam cum iusiurandum a teste non exigitur, iudex testem commonefaciat gravis obligationis, qua semper tenetur, veritatem dicendi.

38 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 546 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1768

Testes, tametsi iusiurandum praestiterint de veritate dicenda, poterunt nihilominus pro prudenti iudicis arbitrio, absoluto examine, adigi ad iusiurandum de veritate dictorum sive circa omnes positionum articulos sive circa aliquos tantum, quoties gravitas negotii et editae testificationis adiuncta id postulare videantur.

CAN. 1769

Testes adigi etiam iureiurando possunt ad secretum servandum circa propositas interrogationes dataque interrogationibus responsa, usque dum acta et allegata publici iuris fiant; imo etiam perpetuo ad normam can. 1623, § 3.

1. All witnesses, except the unfit and suspected, must swear that they will tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth. This so-called iuramentum veritatis was always considered so necessary that the saying is: "A witness not sworn proves nothing."[39] The oath is to be administered before the examination, generally by the judge or his auditor.[40]

If the litigants or their proctors wish to be present at the ceremony, they are at liberty to do so, provided they come before the examination begins. But no plea of exception can be construed from their voluntary or involuntary absence.

The phrase: "de tota ac sola veritate," must be understood in the sense that they bind themselves to answer truthfully the questions proposed, concealing nothing and asserting no falsehood. But they are not bound to say more than the questions imply. At least this is the pres-

39 Cfr. cc. 10, 39, 51, X, II, 20. 40 Cfr. Messmer, l. c., p. 116.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ent practice of courts.[41] But the oath includes another element, viz., that they speak the truth for motives of truthfulness, that they harbor no sinister intention, and that they have not been bribed.[42]

Both parties consenting, this oath may be omitted in all private trials where the public weal is not at stake. The oath is administered in favor of both parties, and hence may be remitted, without the intervention of the judge, by both. However, the text clearly states that this may be done only when private interests are at stake. In matrimonial cases, therefore, when the validity of a marriage is threatened, and in criminal and beneficiary matters the oath may never be omitted.[43] When the oath is not administered to a witness, the judge shall not omit to warn him of the grave obligation incumbent upon him to tell the truth.

Concerning the formalities of the oath see can. 1621.

2. There is, as can. 1768 points out, another oath, called de veritate dictorum, which is administered after the examination, even in cases where the oath de veritate dicenda has already been taken. This oath refers either to all the answers that have been given to the questions proposed, or only to certain important questions. The judge may demand the iusiurandum de veritate dictorum whenever, according to his prudence and practical insight, the importance of the matter or the circumstances of the testimony require it. This is a new regulation in ecclesiastical jurisprudence,[44] which was made necessary by intricate cases and to control the testimony of witnesses who vacillate under cross-examination.

41 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 466.

42 C. 47, X, II, 20.

43 C. 39, X, II, 20; Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 485 f.

44 C. 5, X, II, 20 mentions two oaths, which, however, were comprised in one, de veritate dicenda; but the Regulae S. R. R. enumerate these two oaths; Aug. 4, 1910, § 114, n. 2 (A. Ap. S., II, 820).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. The witnesses may be bound by oath to keep secret the questions proposed and the answers given, until the whole proceedings are published, or forever, if the good name of others is endangered or quarrels and scandals are to be feared from a divulgation (can. 1623, § 3), as is generally the case in criminal procedure and where persons of the "weaker sex" are concerned.[45]

ART. IV

THE EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES

The Code now proceeds to lay down the rules for the examination of witnesses: where and in whose presence they must be examined, the character and substance of the interrogations and answers, how they must be taken down by the clerk, and, finally, repeated questioning.

THE PLACE OF EXAMINATION

CAN. 1770

§ 1. Testes sunt examini subiiciendi in ipsa tribunalis sede.

§ 2. Ab hac generali regula excipiuntur:

1.° S. R. E. Cardinales, Episcopi et personae illustres quae suae civitatis iure eximuntur ab obligatione comparendi coram iudice testificandi causa: ii omnes eligere ipsi possunt locum ubi testificentur, de quo iudicem certiorem facere debent;

2.° Qui morbo aliove corporis vel animi impedimento aut conditione vitae, uti moniales, tribunalis sedem adire nequeunt; ii domi audiendi sunt;

3.° Qui extra dioecesim degentes, in dioecesim reverti et ad tribunalis sedem accedere sine gravi in-

[45] Messmer, l. c., p. 116.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

commodo nequeunt; ii audiendi sunt a tribunali loci in quo commorantur ad normam can. 1570, § 2, secundum interrogationes et instructiones a causae iudice transmissas;

4.° Qui in dioecesi quidem commorantur, sed in locis ita dissitis a tribunalis sede, ut sine gravibus impensis neque ipsi iudicem adire, neque a iudice adiri possint. Hoc in casu iudex debet propiorem aliquem sacerdotem dignum et idoneum deputare, ut cum assistentia alicuius, qui actuarii munere fungatur, examen horum testium perficiat, transmissis pariter eidem interrogationibus faciendis, datisque opportunis instructionibus.

The general rule is that witnesses must be examined in court, i.e., on the witness-stand. From this rule the legislator exempts the following persons:

1.° Cardinals, bishops and illustrious personages,[46] who, by virtue of their civic prerogatives, are exempt from appearing in court; all these may choose a place convenient to them for giving testimony, but should inform the judge to that effect.

2.° All those who are detained from personally appearing by sickness or any other physical or mental impediment, or by their state of life (for instance, cloistered nuns and the inmates of state asylums). These may give testimony at their respective residences, and the judge may send the notary or auditor or two deputies to receive their deposition.[47]

3.° Those who dwell outside the diocese and cannot conveniently return and appear in court. Their deposi-

46 The illustres held first place in the official hierarchy of the (reorganized) Roman empire, which was composed of illustres or Right Honorable, of spectabiles or Honorable, and of clarissimi or Worshipful gentlemen. To the class of illustres belonged the thirteen cabinet ministers of the West; see Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, 1892, 2nd ed., Vol. I, p. 603 f.

47 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 506.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tions, according to can. 1570, § 2, must be received by the local tribunal in accordance with the formulary of interrogation and the instructions sent to it by the judge in case.

4.° Those who live in the diocese, but so far away from the court that it would be expensive for them to come to court, or for the judge to reach them. In such cases the judge shall appoint a worthy and fit priest who lives near the place, to take the testimony with the help of another person, who may act as clerk. To that priest must be forwarded the interrogatories and such instructions as may be deemed necessary.

IN WHOSE PRESENCE THE WITNESSES ARE TO BE EXAMINED

CAN. 1771

Examini testium partes assistere nequeunt, nisi iudex eas admittendas censuerit.

CAN. 1772

§ 1. Testes seorsim singuli examinandi sunt.

§ 2. Prudenti tamen iudicis arbitrio relinquitur post edita testimonia testes inter se aut cum parte conferre, seu, vulgo, confrontare.

§ 3. Id autem fieri poterit si haec omnia simul concurrant, scilicet:

1.° Si testes inter se aut cum parte in re gravi et causae substantiam attingente dissentiant;

2.° Si nulla alia facilior ad veritatem detegendam suppetat via;

3.° Si scandali vel dissidiorum periculum non sit ex collatione pertimescendum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1773

§ 1. Examen fit a iudice, vel ab eius delegato aut auditore, cui assistat oportet notarius.

§ 2. In examine interrogationes non ab alio quam a iudice vel ab eo qui iudicis locum tenet, testibus deferendae sunt. Quapropter si partes, vel promotor iustitiae, vel defensor vinculi examini intersint et novas interrogationes testi faciendas habeant, has non testi, sed iudici vel eius locum tenenti proponere debent, ut eas ipse deferat.

1. The parties to the trial are not allowed to be present when the witnesses are examined, in order that they may not be influenced or disturbed. However, the judge may give them permission to assist, especially if only questions of patrimony or money are at issue.[48]

2. Each witness must be examined separately. This rule must not be interpreted so strictly as if the validity of the examination were impaired in case of its non-observance.[49] If the judge deems it prudent, the witnesses may be confronted one with another and with the parties, to compare their statements. But such confrontation is permitted only when the following conditions concur:

a) If the witnesses disagree among themselves, or with the party they testify for, in a serious and substantial point;

b) If, in the opinion of the judge, no better expedient can be found to discover the truth;

c) If no danger of scandal or quarrel is likely to arise from the comparison of the various statements.

48 Reg. S. R. Rotae, Aug. 4, 1910, § 114, n. 6 (A. Ap. S., II, 821).

49 Instructio S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 17; Messmer, l. c., p. 117.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. The examination of witnesses must be performed by the judge or his delegate or auditor, assisted by the notary.

Here it may not be amiss to repeat what the Holy Office [50] enjoined concerning the examination of women who have been "sollicitatae in confessione." They may be heard in the sacristy or in some other unsuspected place, in the presence of the appointed judge and a clerk (both ecclesiastics). Each sollicitata must be examined cautiously and separately, not in company with others, because the secret is inviolable.

The interrogatories or questions are to be put to the witnesses by the judge or his locum tenens. If the parties, or the promotor iustitiae, or the defensor vinculi should wish to ask other questions, these questions must be proposed to the witness through the judge or his delegate, not directly.

NATURE OF THE INTERROGATORIES AND ANSWERS

CAN. 1774

Testis primo interrogari debet non modo de generalibus personae adiunctis, hoc est, de nomine, cognomine, origine, aetate, religione, conditione, domicilio, sed etiam quae ipsi cum partibus in causa sit necessitudo; deinde deferendae sunt interrogationes quae causam ipsam respiciunt et sciscitandum unde et quomodo ea quae asserit, habeat cognita.

CAN. 1775

Interrogationes breves sunto, non plura simul complectentes, non captiosae, non subdolae, non sug-

[50] S. O., July 20, 1890 (Coll. P. F., n. 1732).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gerentes responsionem, remotae a cuiusvis offensione et pertinentes ad causam quae agitur.

CAN. 1776

§ 1. Interrogationes non sunt cum testibus antea communicandae.

§ 2. Attamen si ea quae testificanda sunt ita a memoria sint remota, ut nisi prius recolantur, certo affirmari nequeant, poterit iudex nonnulla testem praemonere, si id sine periculo fieri posse censeat.

CAN. 1777

Testes oretenus testimonium dicant, et scriptum ne legant, nisi de calculo et rationibus agatur; tunc enim adnotationes, quas secum attulerunt, poterunt consulere.

1. The questions to be proposed are partly general and partly special.

a) Of a general character are the preliminary inquiries regarding the personal circumstances of the witness. Hence, as in our courts, he must be asked his full name (nomen et cognomen), parentage, age, religion, condition or profession, domicile or residence, and also about his connection with the parties in the case.

This latter question will lead to the discovery of blood relationship or any interest the witness may have in the case. Hence the witness must be asked: Do you know the parties? If so, how long? What is your connection with them? etc.

b) The special questions touch the merits of the case. The first is as to the source of knowledge (unde) and how it was obtained. The judge is entitled to know the source of one's knowledge, and if he demands it, the witness is bound to answer.[51] Then the judge shall ask the witness whether he has direct knowledge of the fact he is to testify to. If he answers yes, he must be looked upon as a first-class witness, or a witness de scientia, who has witnessed the fact or perceived it immediately through his senses, for instance, if he has seen homicide or adultery committed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the witness has no immediate or direct knowledge, then he is only an indirect witness, and the question quomodo (how he has obtained his knowledge) must be put.

a) He may say: "This is my opinion," and therefore testify de sua credulitate, or what he believes to be a fact or a conclusion from conjectures and circumstantial evidence, the weight of which is enhanced by presumption.[52]

b) Or he may say that he had heard a report of the fact or incident from trustworthy persons. Witnesses of this class are called testes de auditu and much depends on from how many they heard the report; for if the report or story was spread by one and the same person, this amounts only to one witness, even though forty others repeat it from hearsay. Witnesses de auditu can be admitted only if the original reporter or narrator is dead, absent, or not to be found.[53]

c) Finally there are witnesses who can only testify that a rumor was spread and is believed by the people; these are testes de fama. Rumor itself merely creates presumption if it is spread by and among sober and

51 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 511 f.

52 Cfr. c. 12, X, II, 23; see this Commentary, Vol. V, p. 371.

53 Cfr. c. 47, X, II, 20; see the case stated under Title XXXI, where eighty witnesses testified against a pastor, but all had heard the story from an old woman; the pastor was declared innocent.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prudent men. Therefore the origin of the rumor has to be inquired into, and if its authors cannot be found out, the rumor must be rejected. The vox populi sometimes is, not vox Dei, but faex populi.

2. The questions asked must be brief and simple, i.e., not combining many things in one. The judge is not allowed to make use of captious, cunning or suggestive questions, to ensnare or compel the witness to answer according to a preconceived idea. This would embarrass the witness and curtail his freedom. Besides the judge must abstain from offensive questions and from asking questions which have nothing to do with the case.

3. The questions on which a witness is to be cross-examined must not be communicated to him beforehand, i.e., before he has been sworn and put on the witness-stand; for this might lead to collusion and also to mental restrictions when giving oath. However, the judge may intimate beforehand some questions which depend on the memory and could not easily and truthfully be answered without due preparation, because the facts happened a long time ago, and so forth. But the danger of fraud or collusion must always be avoided as effectively as possible.

4. The answers or statements of the witnesses must be made orally, not read off a paper. Yet if numbers or dates or calculations of a mathematical nature are involved, the witness may make use of notes.

ANSWERS TO BE PUT IN WRITING AND READ

CAN. 1778

Responsio ex continenti redigenda est scripto ab actuario non solum quod attinet ad substantiam, sed

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

etiam ad ipsa editi testimonii verba, nisi iudex, attenta causae exiguitate, satis habeat unam depositionis substantiam referri.

CAN. 1779

Actuarius in actis mentionem faciat de praestito, remisso aut recusato iureiurando, de partium aliorumque praesentia, de interrogationibus ex officio additis et generatim de omnibus memoria dignis quae forte acciderint, cum testes excutiebantur.

CAN. 1780

§ 1. Testi, antequam ab auditorio discedat, debent legi quae actuarius de iis quae ipse viva voce testatus est, scripto redegit, data eidem testi facultate addendi, supprimendi, corrigendi, variandi.

§ 2. Denique actui subscribere debent testis, iudex et notarius.

1. All answers must be immediately set down in writing by the clerk, not only substantially, but verbally, as given, unless in the view of the judge the matter is of small importance, in which case a summary note would suffice.

2. The same clerk (actuarius) must also state in the minutes whether the oath was taken, refused by, or remitted to, the witness, whether the parties were present, whether other questions had been officially asked, and, generally, everything that is worth putting on record, as uttered during the examination of the witness.

3. Before the witness leaves the stand the minutes of his testimony must be read to him, and he may, if he chooses, add, suppress, correct, or change any statement

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

he has made. Afterwards this is no longer permitted. Then the witness must sign his name to his deposition as recorded by the clerk, and the judge and notary should also sign their names, after that of the witness.

REPEATED EXAMINATIONS

CAN. 1781

Testes, quamvis iam excussi, poterunt, parte postulante aut ex officio, antequam acta seu testificationes publici iuris fiant, denuo ad examen vocari, si iudex id necessarium vel utile ducat, dummodo tamen omnis collusionis vel corruptelae adsit periculum.

Under can. 1762 it was remarked that repeated examinations of the same witnesses are permissible. The old law [54] permitted a tertia and quarta productio testium, but no more. The Code fixes no limit. Therefore, if one of the parties insists, or the judge deems it necessary or useful, a witness may be examined repeatedly, provided no collusion or bribery is to be feared. However, in order not to prolong the trial, such repetition should be permitted only before the testimonies have been officially made known (antequam acta seu testificationes publici iuris fiant).

ART. V

PUBLICATION OF TESTIMONIES AND THEIR REJECTION

As soon as the witnesses in a case have been heard, or the parties concerned have declared that they have no more witnesses to produce, the testimonies may be published. This means that the answers or depositions of

[54] C. 37, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the witnesses given to the questions proposed may be publicly read. When this is to be done and what effect it produces, especially as to exceptions and the calling-in of witnesses, is the subject of Article V.

WHEN THE TESTIMONY MAY BE PUBLISHED

CAN. 1782

§ 1. Cum partes aut earum procuratores examini non interfuerunt, testimonia statim post absolutum omnium testium examen poterunt, decreto iudicis, evulgari.

§ 2. Sed poterit iudex differre testimoniorum evulgationem in tempus quo cetera probationum capitula fuerint absoluta, si id e re existimet.

1. If the parties or their proctors (attorneys) were not present at the examination, publication of the testimony may be made immediately after all the depositions have been taken down. It makes no difference whether the absence was voluntary or per contumaciam. In any case, for contempt virtually equals presence, the publication may be insisted upon by the other party, or by the judge, who should advise the litigants to renounce further examination if the points have been sufficiently cleared up. The judge must issue a formal decree ordering the depositions published. He himself or a notary shall read them to the parties present. However, two things must be observed:

1. This publication is not essential to the validity of the acts, hence our text simply says: "poterunt evulgari," they may be published;

2. The judge may, if he thinks it advantageous, delay the publication until all the proofs have been gathered.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXCEPTION TO DEPOSITIONS

CAN. 1783

Post testificationum evulgationem:

1.° Cessat facultas reprobandi testis personam, excepto casu de quo in can. 1764, § 4;

2.° Sed est ius reprobandi testes sive quod attinet ad modum examinis, cum scilicet obiiciuntur regulae iuris in examine peragendo neglectae, sive quod attinet ad testificationes ipsas, cum nempe testimonia impugnantur de falso aut de variatione, contradictione, obscuritate, defectu scientiae et similibus.

CAN. 1784

Reprobationem iudex decreto suo reiiciat, si eam futili inniti fundamento aut ad retardandum iudicium factam animadvertat.

CAN. 1785

Si iudicium reprobationis admittatur, iudex brevem terminum parti postulanti praestituat ad probandam reprobationem, et deinde procedat uti in aliis incidentibus causis.

1. One of the effects of the publication of the testimony is that neither party can any longer object to the witnesses except in the case mentioned under can. 1764, § 4. However, although the witnesses cannot be rejected, their depositions may be attacked for two reasons:

a) That the examination was not conducted legally;

b) That the testimony contains falsehoods, contradictions, obscurities, etc., or betrays a change or defect of knowledge. Concerning this second point more will be

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

said under Art. VII. As to the first point, the exceptions may be based on the assertion that the judge was not competent, or on any point laid down in Art. IV.

2. However, if the judge is aware that these exceptions are futile or only intended to protract the trial, he may issue a decree rejecting the exceptions.

3. If, on the other hand, exceptions are admitted, the judge shall set a brief term for proving them and in the meanwhile proceed as in other incidental questions.

REPEATED CALLING OF WITNESSES

CAN. 1786

Post evulgatas testificationes, testes iam auditi denuo super iisdem articulis ne interrogentur, neque novi testes admittantur, nisi caute et ex gravi ratione in causis quae nunquam transeunt in rem iudicatam; ex gravissima ratione in ceteris; et in quolibet casu omni fraudis et subornationis periculo remoto, altera parte audita, et requisito voto promotoris iustitiae vel defensoris vinculi, si hi iudicio intersint; quae omnia iudex decreto suo definiat.

The general rule is that after the publication of the testimony the witnesses should not again be asked the same questions which they have already answered,[55] and that no new witnesses should be introduced. By consenting to the publication the witnesses are supposed to have renounced further examination. Note well that the same questions only are forbidden. If a new and necessary question would occur, for instance, concerning a baptismal record which could not be obtained before, or a lately found privilege,[56] this rule would not apply.

55 Cc. 19, 25, X, II, 20.

56 Cc. 19, 42, X, II, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There are two exceptions to the rule just stated:

1. In cases which never pass into the adjudged stage, witnesses already examined and new ones may be introduced cautiously and for a grave reason. Matrimonial, clerical, and religious trials never become res iudicatae,[57] and in all such cases a grave reason is all that is required to admit of repeated examination. Such a reason would be if testimonies had been lost,[58] or also, as stated above, if new proofs could be furnished, or by the common consent of the litigants.

2. In certain other cases, e.g., if the reason is gravissima, as, for instance, if malice or negligence on the part of the judge prevented a full examination, or if one of the witnesses was convicted of perjury.[59]

But it is required that everything be done cautiously, so that no danger of fraud or subornation enters the new hearing. Besides, the other party must be heard, and the promotor iustitiae and defensor vinculi must be asked for their opinion, if they are present; and, finally, the judge must issue a decree to that effect, mentioning all important details.

Art. VI

COMPENSATION OF WITNESSES

Can. 1787

§ 1. Testis ius habet ad petendam compensationem impensarum, quas sustinuerit ratione itineris et commorationis in loco iudicii, et ad congruam indemnitatem pro interruptione sui negotii vel operis.

§ 2. Iudicis est, auditis parte ac teste, et, si opus sit,

57 See can. 1902 f.
58 C. 15, X, II, 19.
59 See cc. 9, 48, X, II, 20; Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 156 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

etiam peritis, taxare indemnitatem et impensas testi solvendas.

CAN. 1788

Si intra peremptorium terminum a iudice praestitutum congrua pecuniae quantitas de qua in can. 1909, § 2, ab eo qui testes inducere vult deposita non sit, is testium examini renuntiasse censeatur.

The Roman as well as ecclesiastical law,[60] from which modern civil codes hardly differ in this matter, demand that witnesses be proportionately recompensed for the expenses incurred.

In reckoning the sum, the distance from which they came (mileage), living expenses, and indemnity for interrupted business or work must be considered. The judge shall adjudge the expenses and indemnities. He should, however, hear the parties and witnesses, and may also, if necessary, consult experts as to the amount to be allowed. The judge may also demand that the sum for all these expenses be deposited with the clerk or that security (bail) be given guaranteeing payment.[61] If the parties refuse to comply with this demand within the term peremptorily assigned, they are supposed to have renounced the examination of the respective witnesses.

WEIGHT OF TESTIMONIES

CAN. 1789

In aestimandis testimoniis iudex prae oculis habeat:

1.° Quae conditio sit personae, quaeve honestas et an aliqua dignitate testis praefulgeat;

60 Cfr. c. 3, C. 4, q. 2 et 3. 61 Can. 1909, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Utrum de scientia propria, praesertim de visu et auditu proprio testificetur, an de credulitate, de fama, aut de auditu ab aliis;

3.° Utrum testis constans sit et firmiter sibi cohaereat, an varius, incertus, vel vacillans;

4.° Denique utrum testimonii contestes habeat, an sit singularis.

CAN. 1790

Si testes inter se discrepent, iudex perpendat utrum edita ab eis testimonia sibi invicem adversentur, an sint dumtaxat diversa vel adminiculativa.

CAN. 1791

§ 1. Unius testis depositio plenam fidem non facit, nisi sit testis qualificatus qui deponat de rebus ex officio gestis.

§ 2. Si sub iuramenti fide duae vel tres personae, omni exceptione maiores, sibi firmiter cohaerentes, de aliqua re vel facto in iudicio testificentur de scientia propria, sufficiens probatio habetur; nisi in aliqua causa iudex ob maximam negotii gravitatem, vel ob indicia quae aliquod dubium de veritate rei assertae ingerunt, necessariam censeat pleniorem probationem.

Now the legislator proceeds to weigh the testimonies and to state the effect of the evidence after it has been duly pondered. Let it be said right in the beginning, however, that these criteria are tentative or relative rather than absolute and not entirely conclusive in every instance. Besides these characteristics cannot be overlooked by the judge, because they are based on common and long-standing practice. The criteria or momenta by which the weight of evidence is measured, may be reduced to four: moral, mental, material, and numerical.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The moral weight refers to the person of the witness; hence the text says that his condition, character, and dignity should be considered. Conditio here means status, ecclesiastical or lay, and, in a layman, vocation.[62] But it also includes character as a witness (cfr. can. 1757, § 1, § 3). Honestas refers properly to the moral quality of the person, as stated in can. 1757, § 2. The testimony of a citizen whose moral reputation is beyond suspicion and that of one who has a bad name, are manifestly of unequal value.

Dignitas refers,[63] not only to ecclesiastical, but also to civic dignity. The assumption is that dignitaries are less likely to perjure themselves than ordinary mortals.

2. Mental or intellectual weight must be measured according to can. 1774. For direct witnesses, who testify to what they have personally seen or heard — also called eye-witnesses — are certainly to be preferred to indirect witnesses, who merely express their opinion or repeat what they have learned from hearsay or rumor.

3. The material weight of the testimony lies in the mode in which it is produced. Much depends on whether a witness is steady and consistent, or wavering and contradictory. A testis varius is one who makes different statements on the same subject in different stages or instances of a trial. A testis incertus, also called contrarius, is one who makes contradictory answers in the same instance or stage of trial. Vacillans may refer to the wavering, uncertain mode of answering, which seems to indicate some doubt or unbelief. Such a testimony should not be accepted at all.[64] If, how-

62 The testimony of slaves was formerly admitted only if given under torture; c. 7, C. 2, q. 1: corporali discussione.

63 C. 3, C. 4, q. 2 et 3: utrum decurio an plebeius sit.

64 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 317.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ever, trembling or sweating is a mere concomitant or sign of a nervous disposition, and does not create a positive doubt, the testimony may be accepted, if fortified by conjectures or other proofs. A testimony called contrary, i.e., one which contradicts another statement of the same witness, cannot be admitted, unless it admits of correction. Of two contradictory answers given to the same question it must be held that, as a rule, the first stands, unless the error is immediately corrected and recalled, and the second appears more probable.[65]

4. The numerical weight of a testimony depends on whether several witnesses agree in their depositions or whether they differ from one another. Witnesses whose testimony differs one from another, are called singulares. If testimonies agree, their weight must be judged according to can. 1791, § 2. The depositions of single witnesses are to be weighed according to can. 1790, to wit:

a) If they conflict with one other, the general rule must be applied that they prove nothing; because a single witness is but one witness, and in the case of conflict one excludes the other; this is called singularitas obstativa.[66]

b) If the witnesses testify to facts or circumstances which, though true themselves, have no connection with one other, their testimony is called diverse (singularitas diversificativa). However, it is evident that they must bear on the case on trial, otherwise they would be irrelevant. Thus, for instance, the case of sollicitatio mentioned in the Constitution of Gregory XV, is referred to one and the same priest, whom diverse persons 65 Ibid., 2, 326 f.

66 C. 9, X, II, 19; Santi-Leitner, II, 20, n. 21; Messmer, l. c., p. 106 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

accuse of different crimes.[67] Such testimonies are accepted, if circumstantial evidence corroborates the depositions.

c) If the witnesses testify to facts or circumstances which bear on one another, like cause and effect, their testimony is called adminicular (singularitas adminiculativa). This is the weightier, the more witnesses report the same fact or circumstance, and may be admitted as full proof, at least in civil matters (in criminal cases it would not be accepted fully).[68]

The numerical weight of witnesses whose evidence is concordant, neither varied nor wavering, is stated in can. 1791, according to the old rules, thus:

a) One witness alone does not afford full proof, because even an upright witness may err in regard to facts and be prompted by personal motives. There is, however, an exception to the rule stated in our text: one qualified witness may furnish full proof when he makes deposition concerning acts which he himself performed ex officio. This is called qualification. Thus experts, as described in the following chapter, official couriers, public notaries, court clerks, are qualified witnesses, whose testimony concerning their official acts is accepted as full proof.[69]

b) The testimonies of two or three persons is considered full or sufficient proof,

a) If they have been duly sworn;

b) If they are beyond suspicion and exception;

c) If their testimony is consistent, and

d) If they make judicial (not extrajudicial) deposi-

67 "Universi Dominici," Aug. 30, 1622, § 5.

68 C. 9, X, II, 19; Santi-Leitner, II, 20, n. 22 f.

69 See cc. 10, 23, X, II, 20; c. 13, X, II, 26.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion concerning a thing or fact which they themselves have witnessed (de scientia propria).

Yet it may happen that the matter is of exceptional importance, or that the judge has reason to doubt the truth of such testimony; in that case he may demand fuller proof.

Concerning matrimonial cases of non-consummation, the seven-hand testimony remains. On the other hand, the greater number of witnesses required by the former law against bishops and clerics [70] is no longer demanded by the Code.[71]

70 See cc. 2, 3, C. 2, q. 4, where more than three against a clergyman, and seventy-two against a bishop are required; see also c. 19, C. 2, q. 5.

71 Santi-Leitner, II, 20, n. 17; Messmer, l. c., p. 106.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER III

EXPERTS

That experts, or specialists, i.e., persons learned or skilled in their own science or profession, especially midwives in cases of non-consummated marriage, were not wholly unknown to the Decretals,[1] appears from the fact that proof from such persons was admitted. Now-a-days their part in settling litigation has become even more conspicuous and frequent. The Code on this head adopts most of the rules laid down for the S. Romana Rota.[2]

WHEN, BY WHOM AND FOR WHAT PURPOSE EXPERTS ARE CHOSEN

CAN. 1792

Peritorum opera utendum est quoties ex iuris vel iudicis praescripto eorum examen et votum requiritur ad factum aliquod comprobandum vel ad veram alicuius rei naturam dignoscendam.

CAN. 1793

§ 1. Iudicis est peritos eligere vel designare.

§ 2. Hanc designationem in causis mere privatis iudex facere potest rogatu utriusque partis vel etiam alterutrius, altera tamen consentiente; in causis vero bonum publicum respicientibus, audito promotore iustitiae aut vinculi defensore.

1 C. 14, X, II, 19.
2 A. Ap. S., II, 822–826; § 120–136.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Prudenti iudicis arbitrio relinquitur unum pluresve peritos eligere pro causae natura et rei difficultate, nisi lex ipsa numerum peritorum praefiniat.

CAN. 1794

Peritorum est peritiam suam ad veritatis et iustitiae leges exigere, neque falsum affirmando neque verum occultando; in quo si deliquerint, puniantur ad normam can. 1743, § 3.

Experts are selected as often as the law (for instance, in matrimonial cases),[8] or the judge demands them, in order to prove a fact or to establish the true nature of a thing, as in the matter of reading a difficult document. Their office and duty, therefore, consists in applying their skill or science to the subject in dispute, according to the rules of truth and justice. Hence scientific equipment is the first qualification of an expert. From a physician, e.g., we demand above all medical knowledge and experience. This, however, does not exclude, but rather implies, honesty and conscientiousness.

Experts are witnesses in the true sense of the word, and hence, if they are untruthful, may be punished like witnesses or delinquents, according to can. 1743, § 3.

WHO MAY BE CHOSEN

CAN. 1795

§ 1. Ad periti munus, ceteris paribus, deligantur, qui competentis magistratus auctoritate idonei fuerint comprobati.

§ 2. Qui a testimonio ferendo excluduntur ad

8 Cfr. can. 1976 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

normam can. 1757, ne ad peritorum quidem officium assumi possunt.

CAN. 1796

§ 1. Easdem ob causa quibus testes, possunt et periti recusari.

§ 2. Iudex suo decreto edicat utrum sit admittenda recusatio, necne, et, recusatione admissa, in locum periti recusati alium sufficiat.

All other things being equal, those should be chosen as experts who hold a certificate or diploma as to their fitness from a competent public authority. For, generally speaking — except where the evil of "graft" is deeply rooted and widely spread, and where bigotry is rampant — diplomas are a safe indication of one's skill and experience. The phrase "ceteris paribus" means that a Catholic who is an acknowledged authority in his branch may be chosen, even though the judge does not "favor" him.

One who is not qualified to be a witness, according to can. 1757, cannot be called in as an expert, and the parties may, therefore, take exception; but no exception is admissible on the one sole plea that a man has no public certificate. If an expert is lawfully refused, it becomes the duty of the judge to issue a decree substituting another one in his place.

DUTIES OF EXPERTS TOWARDS JUDGE AND PARTIES

CAN. 1797

§ 1. Periti demandatum munus suscipere censentur praestatione iurisiurandi de munere fideliter implendo.

§ 2. Partes non solum interesse possunt iurisiurandi praestationi, sed etiam exsecutioni muneris perito

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

demandati, nisi aliud rei natura vel honestas exigat aut lex vel iudex statuat.

CAN. 1798

Post iusiurandum praestitum, si periti intra praefinitum tempus mandato non paruerint aut sine iusta causa exsecutionem defugiant, tenentur damnorum.

CAN. 1799

§ 1. Iudex, attentis iis quae a litigantibus forte deducantur, omnia et singula capita decreto suo definiat circa quae periti opera versari debeat.

§ 2. Tempus intra quod examen perficiendum est et votum proferendum, si necessarium vel opportunum iudici videatur, potest ab ipso iudice praefiniri et etiam, auditis partibus, prorogari.

An expert is supposed to assume his office by taking the oath to perform his duties conscientiously.

The litigant parties may assist not only at the ceremony of administering the oath, but also when the expert performs his duty. However, there are delicate cases, especially of a criminal nature or demanding ocular inspection, which make the presence of the parties undesirable. Hence the law itself, as, for instance, in the case of non-consummation (can. 1979) or solicitation, forbids their presence, and the judge may positively exclude them.

The judge should define as nearly and as clearly as possible the exact purpose for which the aid of the expert is asked; and in so doing he should take into consideration the suggestions made by the parties.

The time within which the examination must be made

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google and the report handed in, may be fixed by the judge, who, after hearing the parties, may also prorogue the term.

If the expert, after having taken the oath, does not go to work within the time established, or fails to perform his duty without reason, he is obliged to make good the loss that may be caused by his neglect or delay.

CRITICAL INVESTIGATION OF PAPERS

CAN. 1800

§ 1. Si dubitetur quis scriptum aliquod exaraverit, iudex praeter scripturam quaestioni obnoxiam assignet peritis, proponentibus partibus, scripturas cum quibus illa comparari et conferri debeat.

§ 2. Si de scripturis, quae sint inter se comparandae, partes dissentiant, iudex seligat, comparationis gratia, eas, quas pars ipsa alias recognovit, aut quas qui accusatur auctor scripturae controversae, scripsit ut persona publica et in archivis aut alio publico tabulario custodiuntur; aut eius subscriptiones quas ex fide notarii vel personae publicae constet coram ipsis fuisse exaratas.

§ 3. Quod si scripturae a partibus et a iudice pro comparatione designatae, peritorum iudicio, investigationi non sufficiant, et is cui scriptura controversa tribuitur, in vivis sit, iudex ad instantiam partis aut etiam ex officio eum citet, ut manu propria coram iudice vel eius delegato scribat quidquid periti, iudex ipse, eiusve delegatus dictaturi sint.

§ 4. Recusatio scribendi, non probata legitima recusationis causa, habetur ut confessio genuinitatis scripturae controversae in praeiudicium recusantis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In deeds, last wills, and other documents, in fact in every kind of writing, there may be calligraphic or palaeographic difficulties which create doubt in the mind of the judge as to the original writer. If that be the case, the judge may command the parties to submit the doubtful writing to experts for examination.

Suppose there is a last will written in the hand of John, who is supposed to have drawn it up. The specimens of John's handwriting produced by the parties differ among themselves, the g or h or other letters not being written in the same way as in the document attacked by one of the parties. What is to be done? In that case: (a) papers which are recognized by the defendant as in the genuine handwriting of John, or (b) papers which John certainly wrote in an official capacity and which are kept on file in public places, or (c) signatures which are officially acknowledged as in John's own writing should serve as means of comparison. If the experts declare that the writings thus submitted for comparison are not sufficient to form an opinion, the judge shall, either ex officio or at the demand of the parties, summon the supposed author of the disputed document and command him to write in presence of the judge or his delegate, whatever the experts, the judge himself, or his delegate, shall dictate. If he refuses to write without good reason, his very refusal must be taken as a confession that the disputed writing is not genuine.

REPORTS OF THE EXPERTS AND NON-EXPERTS

CAN. 1801

§ 1. Periti votum suum vel in scriptis proferre possunt, vel oretenus coram iudice; sed si ore

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proferatur, statim in scriptis redigi debet a notario et a peritis subscribi.

§ 2. Peritus autem, praesertim si sententiam suam in scriptis protulerit, accersiri potest a iudice ut explicationes, quae ulterius necessariae videantur, suppeditet.

§ 3. Periti debent indicare perspicue qua via et ratione processerint in explendo munere sibi demandato et quibus potissimum argumentis sententia ab ipsis prolata nitatur.

Can. 1802

Periti suam quisque relationem a ceteris distinctam conficiant, nisi, lege non contradicente, iudex unam a singulis subscribendam fieri iubeat; quod si fiat, sententiarum discrimina, si qua fuerint, diligenter adnotentur.

Can. 1803

§ 1. Si periti inter se discrepant, licet iudici aut peritioris suffragium super relatis a primis peritis exquirere aut novos de integro peritos adhibere.

§ 2. Eadem facultas iudici est quoties periti post electionem in suspicionem inciderint vel impares atque non idonei muneri perspecti fuerint.

Can. 1804

§ 1. Iudex non peritorum tantum conclusiones, etsi concordes, sed cetera quoque causae adiuncta attente perpendat.

§ 2. Cum reddit rationes decidendi, exprimere debet quibus motus argumentis peritorum conclusiones aut admiserit aut reiecerit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Experts must, as a rule, make their report in writing. If it is made orally to the judge, it should be immediately put into writing by the notary, and signed by the expert.

The latter may, however, especially after having made a written report, be called upon by the judge to give further explanations which may appear necessary.

The report shall contain an account of how the experts proceeded, what system or method they employed, and also give their reasons (i.e., scientific or professional reasons) for adopting the view expressed in their report.

Each expert must write out his own report, unless, the law permitting, the judge demands one report to be made by several; in which case all experts engaged in the matter must sign this one report and, besides, carefully state wherein their views differ.

If the experts differ, the judge may ask another more skilled expert for his opinion on the report submitted, or call in an entirely new set of experts.

He has the same power whenever the experts have become suspected or rendered themselves unfit for the work in hand.

The judge shall carefully ponder, not only the conclusions of the experts, but also the other circumstances of the case. He is not, however, bound to accept the experts' view. If he decides to give the reasons for his decision (which, however, he is not bound to do, because the text only says, cum reddit, when or if he does), he should explain why he admitted or rejected the conclusions of the experts.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

EXPENSES OF EXPERTS

CAN. 1805

Peritorum expensas et honoraria iudex, receptam uniuscuiusque loci consuetudinem prae oculis habens, ex bono et aequo taxare debet, salvo iure recursus ad normam can. 1913, § 1.

The expenses and salaries of experts should be fairly and squarely fixed by the judge, in conformity with local custom. Recourse, but no appeal, is permitted to the parties within ten days after the sentence has been pronounced.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER IV

ACCESSUS AND RECOGNITIO

LOCAL INSPECTION

CAN. 1806

Si ad controversiae locum iudex accedere atque ipsam rem controversam inspicere necessarium existimet, decreto id praestituat, quo ea quae in accessu praestanda sint, auditis partibus, summatim describat.

CAN. 1807

Iudex recognitionem peragere potest vel ipse per se vel per auditorem aut iudicem delegatum.

CAN. 1808

§ 1. Iudex, rem vel locum recognoscens, peritos adhibere potest, si ipsorum opera necessaria vel utilis videatur.

§ 2. Si periti adhibeantur, serventur, quantum fieri potest, quae praescripta sunt can. 1793–1805.

CAN. 1809

Si iurgii vel perturbationis periculum pertimescendum iudici videatur, poterit ipse prohibere ne partes vel earum advocati iudiciali recognitioni intersint.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1810

Iudex testes, vel ex officio accitos vel a partibus ante recognitionem rite productos, potest in ipso iudiciali accessu examini subiicere, si id expedire videatur ad pleniorem probationem aut ad removenda dubia ob quae recognitio decerni debuit.

CAN. 1811

§ 1. Notarius diligenter curet ut constet ex actis qua die et hora recognitio facta sit, quae personae interfuerint, quae, recognitione durante, aut dicta aut peracta aut a iudice decreta sint.

§ 2. Peractae recognitionis instrumenta tum iudex tum notarius subscribant.

Cases[1] have occurred and still occur which require a personal and local inspection. Hence our Code lays down rules for this judicial procedure.

1. If the judge deems local inspection necessary, he must issue a decree to that effect in which he summarily states the points to be examined. This he does after having heard the parties.

2. The judge may hold this inspection himself or entrust it to his udiator or a delegate. Besides, he may, if he deems it necessary or useful, employ experts, concerning whom the rules laid down in the preceding chapter must be observed as strictly as feasible.

3. However, if the judge should apprehend any quarrel or disturbance between the parties, he may forbid them or their attorneys to be present at the local inspection.

4. If the judge deems it expedient for fuller proof

1 Cfr. c. 9, X, II, 26: agrimen-sores or surveyors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google and for the dispersion of doubts, he may examine the official witnesses and the other witnesses produced by the parties on the spot where the judicial inspection is held.

5. The notary shall keep a careful record of the day and hour when the inspection was held, stating who was present, what was done or said during the process, and what was decreed by the judge. This record must be signed by the judge — or, we presume, by the auditor or legate, if these take the judge's place — and the notary.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

DOCUMENTARY PROOF

Besides the oral evidence of witnesses there is another class of evidence recognized by law, namely, written evidence, which the Decretals (II, 22) treat under the title "De fide instrumentorum."

ART. I

NATURE OF DOCUMENTS

CAN. 1812

In quolibet iudicii genere admittitur probatio per documenta tum publica tum privata.

CAN. 1813

§ 1. Praecipua documenta publica ecclesiastica haec sunt:

1.° Acta Summi Pontificis et Curiae Romanae et Ordinariorum in exercitio suorum munerum authentica forma exarata, itemque attestationes authenticae de iisdem actibus datae ab illis vel eorum notariis;

2.° Instrumenta a notariis ecclesiasticis confecta.

3.° Acta iudicialia ecclesiastica;

4.° Inscriptiones baptismi, confirmationis, ordinationis, professionis religiosae, matrimonii, mortis, quae habentur in regestis Curiae vel paroeciae, vel religionis, et attestationes scriptae ex iisdem desumptae

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

et a parochis, vel Ordinariis, vel notariis ecclesiasticis confectae aut earum exemplaria authentica.

§ 2. Documenta publica civilia ea sunt quae secundum uniuscuiusque loci leges talia iure censentur.

§ 3. Litterae, contractus, testamenta et scripta quaelibet a privatis confecta, privatorum documentorum numero habentur.

The title of this chapter is: De Probatione per Instrumenta, which might apply to oral as well as written evidence. But the Code plainly intends written proofs only. Hence can. 1812 simply states that proofs by documents are admitted in all kinds of trials, both civil and criminal, and that these documents may be either public or private.

A public document is one composed by an official in his official capacity, with due observance of the prescribed formalities, or at least in official style.[1] The official style requires the signature of an officially acknowledged person, his seal or at least that of the office (for instance, the diocesan or episcopal seal, the parish seal, the monastery seal, etc.), and the date and place of issuance.

A private document is a writing executed by private persons or by officials in their private capacity only. Thus a pastor or notary public may give a receipt (apocha), or make a bilateral contract (syngraphum), or write a letter, which are entirely private.

There occur in this chapter two terms which have been variously explained for various purposes; they are: authentic and genuine. Authentic[2] here generally oc-

1 If it is stated that among the solemnities required are the invocation of the Divinity, the signature of at least three witnesses, etc. (Santi-Leitner II, 20, n. 2), this cannot be applied now-a-days in ecclesiastical courts.

2 Authentic is derived from αὐθέντης or αὐτὸ εἶς, ἐς, the archaic form for esse, to be; hence eum qui ipse est vel agit, the one who has written the document. Thus by an authentic gospel we mean a gospel attributed to one of

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

curs in the phrase, "forma authentica," and therefore can only mean that the legal form in the execution of a document was duly observed. Genuine, on the other hand, refers to the origin or authorship of a writing, although we candidly admit that "genuine" in can. 1814 could just as well be taken for "authentic."

So far as the juridical effects are concerned, there is no difference between a public and an authentic document, because every public document is authentic, but not conversely.[3] Private documents may also be authentic, and if they are, they produce the same juridical effect as public documents.

It may be worth while to state some of the marks which render private documents authentic. A private document may become authentic by the signature of one's own hand, together with the signature of three living witnesses, or by affixing to it the official seal of a public (ecclesiastical or civil) magistrate, by being found in the public archives, by long-standing recognition, or by custom.[4]

This premised, let us hear what can. 1813 has to say about the chief public ecclesiastical documents; these are:

1.° The acts of the Sovereign Pontiff, of the Roman Court, and of the Ordinaries, when issued in authentic form in the exercise of their office; also authentic attestations or copies of such acts given by themselves or their notaries.

A perusal of the Acta Apostolicae Sedis shows how authentic Roman documents look. They are signed by the head of the Congregation and its Secretary with the L(oco) S(igilli), place and date of issuance. An epis-the four evangelists. A genuine writing is not necessarily the work of a certain author (Epistle of Barnabas), but only one belonging to a certai · age or century.

3 Reiffenstuel, II, 22, n. 14 f.

4 Ibid., II, 20, n. 143 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

copal document should be issued in the same way, signed with the bishop's name.

"Attestationes" may be either identic copies of the original text, or extracts therefrom. They, too, must be authenticated by being signed and sealed by the respective officials or their notaries.

2.° Documents issued by ecclesiastical notaries. Concerning these the commentators[5] are rather lavish in their demands, which may be briefly reduced to the following:

a) The document itself must contain the date and place of issuance according to the customary manner. The year must be reckoned not from the Incarnation, but according to the civil calendar.[6] The seal of the notary must be affixed if he has a special seal; otherwise his personal signature will suffice.

b) The notary must be lawfully appointed, not removed from office,[7] and should sign his name always in the same way for the sake of comparison. The notaries of exempt clerical institutes are entitled to issue authentic documents concerning their orders.[8]

3. Judicial ecclesiastical acts, because they possess all the requisites of authentic documents.

4. The original records of baptism, confirmation, ordination, religious profession, matrimony, and death, which are kept on file in the ecclesiastical courts, in the archives of parishes and religious institutes; also the testimonies or certificates taken from these original registers and issued by pastors, Ordinaries, or ecclesiastical notaries, as well as copies of these attestations; but the latter must be authenticated, as explained above, i.e., they must

5 Cfr. Engel, II, 20; Reiffenstuel, II, 20 ff.

6 Pius X, "Sapienti consilio," June 29, 1908, III, 5 (A. Ap. S., I, 17).

7 Can. 372 f.

8 Can. 503.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google contain date and place of issuance as well as the official seal.

A doubt may naturally arise as to our assistants or curates,— whether they may issue authentic certificates of baptism or marriage, etc., because the text only mentions the pastors. To answer this question is not as simple as it would appear, and therefore we state our personal opinion only. An assistant or a curate who takes the place of his pastor (e.g., during a vacation) is certainly entitled to issue such a certificate. But a merely casual or accidental absence of the pastor would not render the assistant a locum tenens. An assistant cannot per se issue a certificate, because the Decretals [9] as well as our text exclude him,— a curate not being an official in such matters. However the law [10] admits exemplaria or copies (certificates) made by the authority of the judge or his delegate, provided there be a just reason and at least one of the parties asks for it. Besides, as the Gloss says,[11] it is not necessary that the copy or certificate be made by a public person, if only the official seal is appended. From this, then, and considering the rules of delegation, we conclude that an assistant may in urgent cases be delegated, and even presume delegation, provided he uses the parish seal and issues such papers in the name of the pastor.[12]

We believe that if the local Ordinary or the diocesan court would call upon an assistant to issue a certificate, the latter would act officially and could therefore freely use the parish seal.

§ 2 of can. 1813 then mentions civil public documents which must be accepted as authentic if issued according

9 C. 16, X, II, 22.

10 Ibid.

11 Ad c. 16, l. c.; Reiffenstuel, II, 22, n. 60.

12 Of course, the assistant should also put down his own name: v. g., J. J. Murphy, Pastor, per J. J. Hogan, Assistant.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to the laws of the respective country. In the U. S., as also in England, affidavits are frequently used as public and legal evidence. An affidavit is a written declaration or statement, made before a magistrate or other person legally authorized to administer an oath, the truth of which statement is confirmed either by an oath or a solemn affirmation. Such affidavits, and certified copies thereof, constitute prima facie evidence in most matters before the civil courts.

Besides, the Revised Statutes of some States, e.g., Missouri, admit the registers of religious societies as evidence.[13]

§ 3 of can. 1813 states that letters, contracts, last wills and all other writings which are written or drawn up by private persons, as such, must be regarded as private documents. To this class belong the private letters written by persons in public office. Last wills may be drawn up by private persons, but if they are made before a notary public and two witnesses, all of whom sign their names, they are public documents.

13 Rev. Stat. Mo., 1899, Sect. 3102: "When, by the ordinance or custom of any religious society or congregation in this state a register is required to be kept of marriages, births, baptisms, deaths or interments, such registers shall be admitted as evidence." Sec. 3103: "Copies of the register referred to in the preceding section, certified by the pastor or other head of any such society or congregation, or by the clerk or other keeper of such register, and verified by his affidavit in writing, shall be received in evidence." From this law we may deduce a corollary concerning copies or certificates of baptismal registers issued by ministers of non-Catholic denominations. They are admitted as evidence by the civil court if issued under affidavit. Therefore they may lawfully be compared to, and treated as, civil documents, in spite of the sad fact, which a defensor vinculi once deplored, that the parties sometimes are not at all conscientious in stating the facts and often deceive their ministers.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

AUTHORITY OF DOCUMENTS

CAN. 1814

Documenta publica sive ecclesiastica sive civilia genuina praesumuntur, donec contrarium evidentibus argumentis evincatur.

CAN. 1815

Recognitio aut impugnatio scripturae proponi potest in iudicio tum incidenter, tum ad instar causae principalis.

CAN. 1816

Documenta publica fidem faciunt de iis quae directe et principaliter in eisdem affirmantur.

CAN. 1817

Documentum privatum, sive agnitum a parte sive recognitum a iudice, probat adversus auctorem vel subscriptorem et causam ab eis habentes, perinde ac confessio extra iudicium facta; sed per se non habet vim probandi adversus extraneos.

CAN. 1818

Si abrasa, correcta, interpolata aliove vitio documenta infecta demonstrentur, iudicis est aestimare an et quanti huiusmodi documenta facienda sint.

Public documents, ecclesiastical as well as civil, are presumed to be genuine as long as the contrary is not evidently proved. They prove what is directly and principally affirmed in them. In other words, such documents afford prima facie evidence. The phrase, "quae

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

directe et principaliter in eisdem affirmantur," must be understood of the intention of the plaintiff or the direct object of the action to be proved by a document. For instance, a baptismal record proves that baptism has been conferred, but it does not prove the validity of the baptism, and a marriage certificate issued by a recorder proves that the parties have gone through the ceremony required by civil law, but it does not prove the validity of the marriage from the ecclesiastical point of view.

Even a public document, may, however, be attacked. Can. 1815 says: A document may be acknowledged or attacked at a trial, either incidentally, or as the principal action. It is a mere incidental or side issue if it only leads to establishing the main question or meritum causae; it is the principal issue, if the whole trial revolves around it. Thus a last will depends chiefly on the document, although perhaps later on the plaintiff may attack either the mental or the juridical capacity of the testator.[14]

The attack may be made on different grounds, either because the writer was not an official person, or was no longer in office when the document was drawn up; or because of a lack of the required formalities, or because the document was made fraudulently.[15]

But to prove the spuriousness or falsity of a document at least two classical witnesses (omni exceptione maiores) are required. These witnesses may be either instrumental or extraneous; they are instrumental if they are mentioned in the document as witnesses or if they assisted at the drafting of the paper or signed it. Extraneous witnesses are such as are mentioned in the document but did not sign it. Two witnesses, either instru-

14 We know of a lawsuit that lasted twelve years and depended on a last will; after the will was declared authentic, the capacity of testating and accepting the legacy was attacked.

15 Cfr. Santi-Leitner, II, 22, n. 19 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mental or extraneous, if they have the necessary qualities, are sufficient to render a document useless for proof. Of course, if two witnesses would testify in favor of the validity of a document, and two against it, these depositions would not affect the weight of a public or authentic document.

Since the seal is a strict requisite of an authentic document, this, too, may be the object of rebuttal. For the seal must be genuine, i.e., it must be that of the official who is supposed to have impressed it on the paper. The inscription of the seal, or the letters around it, must be legible and as clearly expressed as possible. The seal should not be torn or broken.[16]

Private documents, says can. 1817, whether acknowledged by the party or accepted by the judge, have the weight or value of an extrajudicial confession,[17] which may or may not be admitted by the judge against the plaintiff, or against the signatory, or against those whose cause is bound up with that of the plaintiff and the signatory. Thus one who has gone security or furnished bail is bound up with the person in whose favor he has done so.

Can. 1818 mentions defective documents, viz., such as bear the signs of erasure, interpolation or correction. It is left to the judge whether and how far to accept such documents.

The erasure, to render a document defective, must occur in a notable or substantial place, as in the date or place when and where it was drawn up, in the name of the drafter, or in a dispositive part of the document itself. However, if it can be proved that the notary himself caused the erasure, the authenticity of the document can not be doubted.

16 Reiffenstuel, II, 22, n. 72 f. 17 Cfr. can. 1753.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Interpolation means the insertion by another than the authorized hand, of matter or names foreign to a document. This defect, too, must be judged according to what was said of erasure.

The same applies to corrections, whether in date, place, names, or matter. All three of these processes render a document somewhat suspect, until the doubt has been cleared away by experts or by comparison, according to can. 1800.

Art. II

EXHIBITION OF DOCUMENTS AND CLAIM THERETO

The first three canons of this Article regulate the shape and form in which the documents must be "shown," whilst the following three determine the claim and duty to exhibit them. The title of the Article styles the latter actio ad exhibendum, because a refusal to exhibit document may call for a judiciary settlement, which may amount to an action.

ORIGINAL AND AUTHENTICATED DOCUMENTS

Can. 1819

Documenta vim probandi in iudicio non habent, nisi originalia sint aut in exemplari authentico exhibita et penes tribunalis cancellariam deposita, exceptis documentis quae publici iuris sunt, ceu leges rite promulgatae.

Can. 1820

Documenta in forma authentica sunt exhibenda et in iudicio deponenda, ut a iudice et ab adversario examinari possint.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1821

§ 1. Si dubium excitetur utrum fideliter exscriptum sit exemplar, an non, iudex ad instantiam partis vel etiam ex officio decernere potest, ut ipsum documentum exhibeatur, unde exemplar est desumptum.

§ 2. Si id fieri aut minime aut valde difficulter possit, iudex potest auditorem delegare aut loci Ordinarium rogare pro examine et collatione documenti, praescribens quibus de articulis et quemadmodum fieri debeat collatio; collationi vero utraque pars assistere potest.

Documents furnish judicial proof only if they are exhibited in their original form, or in an authentic copy, and are deposited with the chancery of the tribunal. An authentic copy is one made by a notary public and sealed with his official seal.[18] The visum of an official is sufficient if that official has personally inspected the original and compared the copy with it.[19] But even in this case his official signature and his seal would be required, testifying to the conformity of the copy with the original document; because signature and seal are the usual signs of an official certificate. For affidavits an oath would be necessary.

Such formalities, says the text, are not required if the documents have been published (quae publici iuris sunt) and therefore made the common property of all, as is the case, e. g., with laws when they are promulgated. By-laws, statutes, charters, also decisions and documents published in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, and official 18 C. 2, X, II, 22: the fact alone that it is made by a public person or has the authentic seal; we joined both by the particle and, because the official seal can be validly attached only by an official person, or at least with his consent or by his command.

19 C. 16, X, II, 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

civil publications, are public documents which require neither to be authenticated nor to be deposited with the tribunal, although the latter may demand a copy of civil publications. The Acta Apostolicae Sedis may be supposed to be on file in every ecclesiastical court.

Documents, says can. 1820, must be exhibited in an authentic form and deposited in court, so that they may be inspected by the judge and the other party. This is the case also with privileges and indulgences which exempt religious may oppose to Ordinaries.[20]

If the judge has a doubt as to the correctness and trustworthiness of a copy exhibited in court, he may, either officially, or upon the demand of the other party, decree that the original document be produced from which the copy (exemplar) was made. However, if there may be great inconvenience in complying with this demand (because the original writ will not stand being exposed to the light, or because it is so frail and delicate that transportation would injure it), or if the civil authorities forbid the removal of original documents from their places (this would be a case of impossibility), the judge may delegate his auditor or ask the local Ordinary to have the document examined and collated with the copy presented in court.

¶ ACTIO AD EXHIBENDUM

CAN. 1822

Documenta communia quaeve de communi agunt negotio, ut testamenta et instrumenta quae respiciunt successiones, bonorum partitiones, contractus aliaque huiusmodi de quibus lis est inter partes, quilibet ex

20 C. 7, 6°, V, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

litigantibus potest postulare ut in iure exhibeantur ab ea parte quae illa possidere dicitur.

CAN. 1823

§ 1. Nemo tamen exhibere tenetur documenta, etsi communia, quae communicari nequeunt sine periculo damni ad normam can. 1755, § 2, n. 2 aut sine periculo violationis secreti servandi.

§ 2. Attamen si qua saltem documenti particula, quam produci intersit, describi possit, et in exemplari exhiberi sine memoratis incommodis, iudex decernere potest ut eadem exhibeatur.

CAN. 1824

§1. Si pars exhibere recuset documentum de iure producendum, quod ipsa fertur possidere, iudex, altera parte postulante, auditoque, si opus sit, promotore iustitiae vel vinculi defensore, interlocutoria sententia statuat, an et quomodo eiusdem documenti exhibitio facienda sit.

§ 2. Parte parere recusante, iudicis est aestimare quanti haec recusatio facienda sit.

§3. Quod si pars documentum apud se esse neget, iudex poterit eam examini subiicere et ad iusiurandum de ea re praestandum adigere.

The question arises whether there is any obligation to exhibit or produce documents which are necessary to settle a disputed point in court. And here a distinction is drawn, not between public and private documents as such, but between the contents of such documents and the parties' mutual claim on them.

Can. 1822 mentions documenta communia, i.e., docu-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ments which are the common property of both litigants. This condition may be achieved by mutual agreement or the common payment of the expenses incurred for drawing up a paper, for instance, by each party paying its share to the notary public.

Documents may also be common by reason of the common interest both parties have in them, as is usually the case in legacies, last wills, and contracts. Common documents, lastly, are such as are drafted by official persons, such as judicial acts or official documents drawn up by notaries public which concern the two parties, also the account-books kept by administrators of minors or corporations.[21] All such documents, not being exclusively private property or involving a criminal or incriminating action, are common to both parties and must, therefore, be produced at the trial by the party who happens to be in possession of them.

Aside from this no one is bound to exhibit a document which may place him or his nearest relatives (can. 1755, § 2, n. 2) in danger of infamy, or cause him or them great trouble and vexation. Neither is there any obligation of producing such documents, even though they be common, if there be danger of violating a secret imposed either by the natural law or by one's office.

But the judge may decree that, if these inconveniences are not to be feared, parts at least of the documents, which are important, be copied, and the copy presented at the trial.

Should a party refuse to show a document in his possession, the judge shall decide whether and how the document must be exhibited, provided the other party insists on its exhibition. In that case, therefore, the judge issues an interlocutory decree, after having consulted, 21 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 22, n. 246 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if necessary, the promotor iustitiae and the defensor vinculi. A refusal by the party in possession of the document must be weighed by the judge as to its juridical value. If the party denies possession of the document, he may be cross-examined under oath.

A word concerning the account-books of ecclesiastical corporations. These furnish proof, not in favor of, but against these corporations,[22] unless they have been audited by a public auditor, in which case they deserve great credit and constitute circumstantial evidence.[23] It may be added that the fiscus is entitled to inspect these account-books and also all common documents produced at trials.[24]

22 C. un. Clem. V, 5.
23 Santi-Leitner, II, 22, n. 10.
24 Reiffenstuel, II, 22, n. 251 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VI

DE PRAESUMPTIONIBUS, OR CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

CAN. 1825

§ 1. Praesumptio est rei incertae probabilis coniectura; eaque alia est iuris, quae ab ipsa lege statuitur; alia hominis, quae a iudice coniicitur.

§ 2. Praesumptio iuris alia est iuris simpliciter, alia iuris et de iure.

CAN. 1826

Contra praesumptionem iuris simpliciter admittitur probatio tum directa tum indirecta; contra praesumptionem iuris et de iure, tantum indirecta, hoc est contra factum quod est praesumptionis fundamentum.

CAN. 1827

Qui habet pro se iuris praesumptionem, liberatur ab onere probandi, quod recidit in partem adversam; qua non probante, sententia ferri debet in favorem partis pro qua stat praesumptio.

CAN. 1828

Praesumptiones, quae non statuuntur a iure, iudex ne coniiciat, nisi ex facto certo et determinato, quod cum eo, de quo controversia est, directe cohaereat.

Next in value to positive proofs is presumption or circumstantial evidence, which is here (can. 1825) defined as a probable conjecture concerning an uncertain fact or thing. From circumstances which either necessarily or usually attend a fact we conclude to the existence of the fact itself. The conclusion is, therefore, based on certain indicia, or signs, indications or circumstances which influence the judge's mind either for or against the party who brought suit. A presumption is called legal (a lege), if expressed in and admitted by law; it is called made by the judge or jury (ab homine), if it arises from the mental operation of the judge, but is not especially pointed out in law. It is natural for any man, and especially for a judge, to form a judgment from usual occurrences. This presumption is called natural, although it might just as well be styled ethical, whilst the praesumptio a lege might be named juridical or legal presumption.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Legal presumption is twofold: iuris, simply, when introduced and admitted and expressed as such by law; iuris et de iure, when not only expressed and acknowledged by law, but when the law is based upon the presumption. The legislator, perceiving that certain circumstances tend to prove an event or fact, often uses this fact as a basis for the law. There are in our Code two canons which establish a praesumptio iuris et de iure, viz., can. 1904, a matter adjudged, and can. 1972, concerning a marriage not disputed during life. The praesumptio iuris tantum is treated in three canons, viz., can. 1015, § 2, which presumes the consummation of a marriage duly celebrated, with the added clause: "until the contrary has been proved;" can. 1086, § 1, where the internal consent to marriage is presumed in conformity with the external manifestation; and can. 1814, which presumes ecclesiastical and civil public documents to be genuine.

Can. 1826 determines the weight of legal presumption, stating that against a praesumptio iuris simpliciter direct

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as well as indirect proofs are admissible; whilst against a praesumptio iuris et de iure direct evidence only may be admitted, i.e., a proof overthrowing the fact upon which the presumption is based. The Code does not define the different species of direct and indirect proofs, nor do the commentators [1] offer any light on this subject. Hence it appears rather risky to venture upon an adequate discrimination. However, some examples may illustrate the distinction. Take can. 1972, concerning a marriage not disputed, which creates a praesumptio iuris et de iure. What is to be done in that case? The legitimacy of the children is involved directly, whilst the validity of the marriage can be attacked only indirectly. But the question will necessarily turn about an existing impediment. For although the presumption for the validity of a marriage which has not been disputed by both or one of the parties during their lifetime is so strong that the tie cannot be directly impugned, yet if the legitimacy of a child is in question, for instance, on account of an inheritance or title, the question of validity will naturally enter the fact at issue (factum probandum). Therefore, the plaintiff, who attacks the legitimacy of a child on the ground that the marriage from which this child was born was invalid, must prove that either before or during the marriage there existed a diriment impediment which had never been removed.[2] Hence we may say that direct evidence is evidence admitted by reason of the contrary evidence which is produced against the merits of the case itself; whereas indirect evidence is admitted only by rea-

1 They generally distinguish between iudicialis and extra-iudicialis, plena and semi-plena, naturalis and artificialis, simplex and mixta, probatio and reprobatio; cfr. Wernz, V, n. 594, p. 450 ff. Of all these divisions the last-named would come nearest to direct and indirect.

2 Concerning a title-case see Kenny-Webb, Outlines of Criminal Law, 1907, p. 325 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

son of the case being connected with another. Another difference can hardly be established. For it is customary to classify evidence according to the differences in its logical bearing upon the question to be decided, and from this point of view all evidence is either direct or indirect. Direct evidence is testimonial evidence to one or more of the facta probanda, i.e., those facts which, if all of them are proved, legally necessitate a decision favorable to the person producing them. All other evidence is circumstantial, which includes real as well as personal evidence.[3] From this it will be readily perceived that the directa and indirecta probatio of our text has nothing in common with this division. For the fact to be proved against a violent presumption may be produced directly as well as indirectly.

Can. 1827 lays down the effects of legal presumption. And if we say legal presumption, we include, because the text draws no distinction, the praesumptio iuris tantum as well as the praesumptio iuris et de iure. Legal presumption frees the party from the burden of proof, which is thus devolved on the adversary. Thus the presumption of receiving tithes is in favor of the pastor against strangers who claim the tithe in the parish subject to that pastor, for it is very unlikely (inverisimile) that strangers in a parish [4] are entitled to the tithes of the same. Thus also the presumption is in favor of the bishop's right to appoint to benefices in his diocese, until the contrary is proved.[5] Consequently, if either party, plaintiff or defendant, has not proved his intention against the rival, the judge must pronounce in favor of the one for whom the legal presumption stands, because the law is in his favor and as long as the contrary is not evident, the law

3 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 322 f.
4 C. 2, 6°, II, 5; c. 16, X, II, 23.
5 See can. 1432, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

must be upheld. But the judge must act altogether differently when natural or ethical evidence, not expressed in law, is to determine or influence his decision. For such a presumption can only be gathered from certain and determined facts which directly bear upon the factum probandum. This is expressed by a learned modern writer thus: The jury or judge has to depend on the cohesion of each circumstance in the evidence with the rest of the chain of circumstances of which it forms a part.[6]

Here is introduced the praesumptio hominis, which has been divided into three classes: levis, gravis, violenta or gravissima. Light presumption is based on indications which seldom or hardly ever permit us to conclude that a fact really happened; for instance, if one would surmise evil by seeing a clergyman talking with a woman. Such a presumption is frivolous and must be discarded. It should rather be called rash judgment. The praesumptio gravis occurs when the indications or circumstances are of such a nature that they permit us to infer a usual and ordinary occurrence. A case of this kind is mentioned in the Decretals.[7] A young man was seen in frequent company with a girl, "per plana et nemora, vias et invia, pluries convagantes." A violent presumption is one which, though not expressed, creates such a firm conviction in the mind that it cannot be resisted, although perhaps a slim evasion may be possible.[8]

These evidences, then, must be weighed and compared with the fact at issue. The rule advanced by barristers, that no conviction is allowed unless the fact in question

6 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 324.

7 C. 13, X, II, 23; but both swore se carnaliter cognovisse, therefore a case of the former illicit affinity.

8 An example in c. 12, X, II, 23; concerning adultery: solum cum sola, nudum cum nuda in eodem lecto.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

has been fully proved,[9] may safely be accepted by the ecclesiastical court.

Here we will add some rules concerning the prevalence and weight of circumstantial evidence, as laid down by canonists.[10]

a) Legal presumptions are weightier than natural ones, and must therefore be preferred.

b) A special circumstance connected with the fact at issue has more value than a general presumption, according to reg. juris 34 in 6°: "Generi per speciem derogatur."

c) Presumptions which are in favor of the established laws of nature and society and conformable to natural tendencies, must be preferred, as a rule, to circumstances which indicate unnatural excess; thus temperate habits in youth and manhood create a favorable presumption for old age, provided all other things are equal.

d) Presumptions in favor of the validity of an act already posted are weightier than those in favor of its invalidity. Hence the axiom: "Baptismus valide censendus in ordine ad matrimonium." A violent presumption of this kind is mentioned in the Decretals,[11] where Innocent III decided that Baptism may be violenter presumed in one who was born of Christian parents and lived faithfully among Christians; although in case he was not baptized, he was not ordained validly.

e) Where the evidence is equally compatible with either view, the judge is not competent to leave the matter to the jury,[12] or to decide the case. For equal presumptions, like equal proofs, kill each other, and a judge cannot decide whilst he is in a doubtful frame of mind.

9 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 329.

10 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 23, 73 ff.; Santi-Leitner, II, 23, n. 13; Messmer, l. c., p. 126 f.

11 C. 3, X, III, 43.

12 Cfr. Kenny, A Selection of Cases Illustrative of the English Law of Tort, 1904, p. 548.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VII

THE OATH OF THE PARTIES

The last means of proof is the oath or invocation of the Divine Name in testimony of the truth. The Code distinguishes three kinds of oaths: the supplementary, the estimatory, and the decisive oath.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY OATH

CAN. 1829

Si habeatur semiplena tantum probatio nec alia probationis adiumenta iam supersint et iudex aut iubeat aut admittat iusiurandum ad probationes supplendas, hoc iusiurandum dicitur suppletorium.

CAN. 1830

§ 1. Huic iuriiurando vel maxime locus est cum adiuncta, quae civilem vel religiosum personae statum respiciunt, aliter comperiri nequeunt.

§ 2. Sed eodem abstineat iudex tum in causis criminalibus, tum in contentiosis, si de iure vel re magni pretii agatur aut de facto nimii momenti, aut si ius, res, factum non sit proprium personae cui iusiurandum esset deferendum.

§ 3. Deferri autem hoc iusiurandum potest sive ex officio, sive ad instantiam alterius partis, vel promotoris iustitiae, vel defensoris vinculi, si iudicio intersint.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. Regulariter deferatur ei qui planiores habet probationes.

§ 5. Iudicis tamen est decreto definire an et quando adiuncta concurrant, cur iusiurandum suppletorium deferri debeat.

CAN. 1831

§ 1. Pars cui iusiurandum suppletorium defertur in rebus quae ad eius statum civilem vel religiosum non pertinent, potest ex iusta causa illud recusare vel in adversarium referre.

§ 2. Quanti autem haec recusatio facienda sit, utrum iusta sit, an potius confessioni aequiparanda, iudicis est aestimare.

§ 3. Iusiurandum suppletorium, ab una parte praestitum, potest ab altera impugnari.

The supplementary oath supplies a missing proof and therefore takes the place of a witness or other instrument of evidence. It may be that the plaintiff has produced one witness who was not rejected, but has none other at his disposal to prove his contention. Or the parties may grow weary of a protracted trial, and therefore resort to this last expedient. The judge, too, may have exhausted all the means of evidence. In this case he may permit, nay even command, the oath to be taken in order to supply the wanted evidence.

The cases in which this oath may or may not be administered are the following:

1. When the personal status of a person, either civil or religious, cannot otherwise be determined, i.e., whether one is a layman, legitimate or illegitimate, a clergyman or a religious, married or unmarried, free or slave, possessed of a title or not. This is rather new legislation,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for the commentators [18] generally contended that the supplementary oath could not be administered in cases concerning the personal status, although in matrimonial cases they limited this exception to a marriage to be solved. Our text admits the oath even in these cases, provided no other evidence can be obtained.

2. In criminal cases the judge shall not admit the oath. Among these the authors also reckon the so-called causa famosa, which involved infamy by law.[14] The judge shall furthermore abstain from demanding this oath in civil matters if:

a) the right or thing involved is of great value, or the fact, i.e., the case itself, is of great importance; or if

b) the right, object or case concerns, not the party to whom the oath should be administered, but another. As to a) there can hardly be any doubt that matrimonial cases fall under this heading, because of their importance; besides magni pretii applies to alienations, which substantially change the condition of a church or corporation. And the latter case should also be applied to b) because it concerns administrators and guardians.

3. This oath may be administered either ex officio or upon the demand of the other party, or of the promotor iustitiae or the defensor vinculi, if present at the trial.

4. As a rule this oath is administered to the party who has furnished fuller or better proofs. The reason for this ruling is that the oath is privileged evidence, but supplementary only. Hence on one side some proofs are required, because if no proofs at all are given, the defendant must be absolved; and on the other, even semi-proofs, which ordinarily would justify the administration of the oath, may be shaky or weakened by contrary evi-

18 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 24, n. 219; Santi-Leitner, II, 24, n. 27.

14 Reiffenstuel, II, 24, n. 217.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dence. It does not matter whether the plaintiff or the defendant has furnished the better evidence.

5. The judge must decide by a formal decree whether and when the circumstances are such as to admit a supplementary oath. A slight presumption will not move a conscientious judge, who may, however, proceed according to the rules of probabilism, provided he takes into account the preceding canons. Strong evidence, and especially a violent presumption in favor of this privileged proof, would certainly suffice.[15] The next question, according to can. 1831, is the acceptance or refusal of the oath and the weight of a refusal.

The party to whom the oath is to be administered, may refuse to accept and rebut it, if there is a just reason, and the oath does not concern the civil or religious status of the person. Omitting this last clause concerning the status of a person, concerning which the legislator does not admit a refusal, there may be good reasons for refusal. Such a reason would be if the party had sufficiently proved the action or exception, or if nothing had been proved against him, or if the oath would refer to matters unknown by personal experience (de scientia propria) because the oath, being an accessory testimony, must have reference to one's own knowledge (de proprio auditu aut visu); or if one of the reasons for the matter itself, as stated in can. 1830, § 2, would exist.[16]

How much weight should be attributed to such a refusal, is the reason just, and may the refusal be equal to self-confession? are questions which depend on the judge.

The oath given by one party may be attacked by the other, for the very same reasons which prompted refusal. Besides, since this oath supplies the deficiency of wit-

15 Reiffenstuel, II, 24, nn. 174 ff. 16 Santi-Leitner, II, 24, n. 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nesses, the qualifications of a witness may here be brought into play.

IURAMENTUM AESTIMATORIUM

CAN. 1832

Si de iure ad damni reparationem constet, sed quantitas damni aestimari certe non possit, iudex potest parti quae damnum passa est, iusiurandum deferre, quod aestimatorium dicitur.

CAN. 1833

In deferendo iureiurando aestimatorio:

1.° Iudex a parte, quae damnum passa est, petat ut sub iurisiurandi sanctitate designet res sibi ablatas vel dolo perditas, earumque pretium et valorem secundum probabilem suam aestimationem exprimat;

2.° Si taxatio iudici nimia videatur, eam ad aequitatem reducat, prae oculis habens omnia indicia et argumenta usu comprobata, adhibitis etiam, si opus sit, peritis, quo magis veritati et iustitiae consulatur.

If the right to indemnity is established, but the amount of the damage cannot be ascertained, the judge may demand an oath of the injured party. This oath is called estimatory. The party who suffered the damage swears as to what has been taken from him either by violence [17] or fraud and states the price and value of these things according to the best of his knowledge.

If the estimate is deemed excessive by the judge, he shall reduce it according to the most probable indications and customary methods of appraising; he may also employ experts in order to find out the truth and be just to both parties.

17 Cfr. c. 7, X, I, 40; c. 32, X, II, 24 (usury).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

IURAMENTUM DECISORIUM

CAN 1834

§ 1. Non solum ante initam litem partes convenire possunt ut controversia per iusiurandum ab alterutra praestandum transigendo dirimatur, sed pendente quoque lite et in quolibet eius momento et statu, altera pars potest, iudice probante, alteri iusiurandum deferre, ea conditione ut quaestio, sive principalis sive incidens, secundum iusiurandum decisa habeatur.

§ 2. Iusiurandum huiusmodi dicitur decisorium.

CAN. 1835

Decisorium iusiurandum deferri nequit, nisi:

1.° De re, in qua cessio et transactio admittitur, et quae pro litigantium personis non sit nimii momenti seu pretii;

2.° Ab eo qui cedere aut transigere potest;

3.° Ei, qui cedere vel transigere valet, quique pariter pro se non habeat plenam probationem;

4.° De mera notitia facti aut de facto, quod proprium sit illius, cui iusiurandum defertur.

CAN. 1836

§ 1. Hoc iusiurandum potest a parte, a qua delatum est, revocari quousque praestitum non fuerit, et ab altera parte acceptari et praestari, vel minus, aut referri in adversarium.

§ 2. Praestito iureiurando, quaestio secundum iuratam formulam finita est, perinde ac si cessio aut transactio iudicialis intercessisset.

§ 3. Si iusiurandum recusetur nec referatur in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

adversarium, iudicis est aestimare quanti facienda sit recusatio, utrum iustis innitatur causis an potius confessioni sit aequiparanda.

§ 4. Si in adversarium referatur, hic debet illud praestare, secus causa cadit.

§ 5. Ut iusiurandum in adversarium referri possit, eaedem illae concurrant conditiones necesse est, quae ad illud deferendum requiruntur, atque idem intercedat iudicis ministerium.

This oath is called decisive because it decides between victory and defeat and its effect consists in settling the trial or controversy. It may concern the principal issue or merit of the cause (causa principalis) or it may refer only to an incidental matter related to the point at issue. But it rests upon a mutual agreement between the parties. If the parties agree to settle their dispute by this oath before the trial has begun, the settlement resembles a transactio, on which see can. 1925 ff. If the oath is demanded during the trial, it can be demanded of the other party only with the approval of the judge, but may be interposed at any moment or stage of the trial.

The decisive oath can be taken only in the following cases:

1. In matters admitting cession and transaction, provided they are not of too great importance or value for the litigants. The reason is the danger of perjury.

2. When the parties are capable of making cession and transaction, they may demand and give the oath, provided full proof has not been furnished.

3. Concerning knowledge of the fact, or concerning a fact connected with the party who has to swear; because this oath is one of truth, and not of credibility. Therefore they are supposed to swear de propria scientia.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This oath may be revoked by the party who demanded it, as long as it has not been taken; it may also be accepted or rejected, given or not given by the other party, or reversed by one party upon the other.

After the oath has been given, the case is settled according to the tenor of the formula, just as if cession or transaction had taken place. If the oath is refused — it may be refused for the reasons stated above — and not retorted upon the adversary, the judge should deliberate how much weight is to be attributed to this refusal, whether it was just or amounted to a confession of guilt.

Should the competitor upon whom the oath was retorted refuse to swear, he is defeated.

An oath may be retorted upon the adversary for the same reasons for which it may be demanded.

For the rest, this oath is to be treated in much the same way as the supplementary oath.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XI

INCIDENTAL QUESTIONS

Either at the beginning or in the process of a trial there may arise questions which have either a remote or proximate bearing upon the issue. Thus at the very beginning exception may be taken against an incompetent or suspected judge, or against the right of the other party to go to court, or against their attorney and counsel, or against the validity of the summons, and all these matters must be decided before the trial can proceed. In the course of the trial questions may arise concerning bail and sequestration, or the admission of evidence.[1] Hence this title is logically inserted after the different kinds of evidence have been set forth.

There are certain incidental questions which are common to all trials; these concern contempt and attempts, which are comprised under the present title.

DEFINITION, PROPOSAL AND ACCEPTANCE

CAN. 1837

Causa incidens habetur, quoties, incepto saltem per citationem iudicio, ab una ex partibus aut a promotore iustitiae vel vinculi defensore, si iudicio intersint, quaestio proponitur quae, tametsi libello, quo lis introducitur, non contineatur expresse, nihilominus ita

